It is difficult for some students of medical literature to reconcile apparent contradictions such as "mortal minds" in conjunction with the trite saying that there is but one mind in reality, even Divine Mind. "Changing intellectual state" is a far better expression than "mortal mind," and one far more easily comprehended. Intellect occupies in all of us an intermediate realm between the plane of intuition above and the realm of sense below. Our reason is amenable to influence from both sections of our spiritual anatomy, for it is clear to all thinkers that we can reason upon what is submitted to us intuitively and also sensuously. It is intellect which goes astray and needs curing or restoring to the righteous path. It is intellect also which needs training or disciplining so that it may become submissive to direction from above and capable of exercising authority over all below. We take it for granted that all our students wish to know truth and do right, but we cannot admit that so long as people are suffering from error they are walking in the way of rectitude. With wilful sin we have nothing to do in mental practice, as all questions exclusively pertaining to theology we leave outside our practice.

Having settled the ground between ourselves and our students regarding the ground legitimately and necessarily covered in mental practice, we invariably seek to set all doubters straight as regards the power vested in themselves for conquering all such ailments as they can be brought to see are clearly results of erroneous judgments by no means synonymous with wilful sin. The Golden Rule must be obeyed on three planes before we can demonstrate healing power suggestively and successfully. The entire reading of the Rule is: Think, speak and act toward every neighbor precisely as you desire any neighbor to act, speak and think toward you. There can be no legitimate self-control so long as there is any lurking desire to control others, and it is at this special point that many good-hearted people need instruction most. Every soul must find heaven for itself, and no one will ever find it so long as he is bound in slavery to the diction of a foreign will. "Do as I tell you" is a despotic order which, whenever obeyed, weakens and impoverishes even the person who performs a right action from so mean a motive. A great deal that is called rebellion in children is little more than reasonable self-assertiveness, and it cannot be long before parents must be prepared to adopt entirely new tactics with their children or else witness parental authority vanish into naught. Whatever is right is reasonable. Foolish fanatical commands which owe their origin to arbitrary caprice or love of despotism can never commend themselves to reason or sense of right in any one, consequently the most furious refusal to submit to a peremptory order the justice of which cannot be shown amounts to something entirely different from any species of sheer waywardness which might oppose a reasonable suggestion or request. Why should one soul seek to dominate another when all souls are potentially equal? If some are more highly educated or more perfectly unfolded than others, it is clear that the office and function of teacher is a lawful one, but the true teacher is never aggressive or harshly authoritative, but calm, logical, demonstrative, and ever desirous of proving to the pupil the truth of whatever he may declare. We cannot be self-poised, self-regulated or self-governed until we are completely free from the tyranny of submission to outside force. To coöperate should be ever a delight, but to submit must always prove a weakness. The true mental healer states the great truth involved in the abrupt and seemingly insolent words, "I'm as good as you are any day," in much pleasanter language, thus: "You are as good as I am any day."

The two forms of this one idea are simply two aspects of the primal truth of human solidarity. Too many people fear to trust themselves or exercise any judgment of their own, while they readily take advice from others who are certainly in no way superior to themselves. "Dare to be a Daniel, Dare to stand alone, Dare to have a purpose true, And dare to make it known" is one of the finest exhortations embodied in any literature. It is the daring to stand alone which is the key to all noble achievements in every conceivable line of occupation. All the distress occasioned by abnormal psychic experiences is fully preventable as the lesson of self-control is learned and put in practice; and in these days when all psychic questions are intensely to the fore, it is clearly incumbent upon all mental and moral healers to point out the path of safety as opposed to that of danger in pursuit of psychic knowledge. To the calm dispassionate logician there can be no sort of agreement between the idea of delightful and always welcome psychical experiences, such as intercourse or intercommunion between loving friends, and anything coercive, such as arbitrary control or dominating obsession. Individualization of character and furthered strength of will cannot possibly shut one off from intercourse with one's beloved friends whether in this world or any other; but it must certainly prove a panacea for those myriad mental ailments which are chronically associated with neurotic persons who are sensitive enough to be mediumistic but are not balanced enough to have their own say as to the sort of relation which shall subsist between themselves and unseen influences. The great need of polarization is never more strongly felt than in cases where undue nervous excitement or degeneracy accompanies the sensitive temperament. Mental healers can and do effect wondrous cures where harmonizing is most required, and so far as future exemption from old-time nervous ailments goes, there is nothing else that can possibly take the place of scientific (not hypnotic) mental suggestion.

As health cannot be conceived of apart from harmony and wholeness, it is always incorrect to single out any one element in human nature for special eulogy, and it is positively mischievous to teach that any ingredient in the entire human composition can ever be anything other than intrinsically good. Such phrases as "bad temper," "ill health" and many others in common vogue can never be employed by people who have attained to any large degree of mental insight, because they suggest radical misconceptions regarding the very essence of the universe. Badly tempered and out of health are permissible sayings, because they express intelligible and not irrational ideas. Well-tempered mortar is a good expression, as temper is whatever modulates. Where we are wisely tempered we are well-modulated individuals, and being such we are healthy, harmonious and happy. There is no use in beating around the bush and patronizing in a half-hearted way theories we cannot consistently endorse; far better is it at all times to come out strongly in advocacy of our extremest views and let our neighbors understand once for all that we employ a terminology of our own to express our sincere convictions. We find in ever-increasing measure the paramount necessity which now exists for employing a distinctive and thoroughly affirmative phraseology in mental treatment, no matter whether particular treatments are given silently or aloud.

The old system of denying away diseases by negative formulas has been carried much too far; we should now be glad to see it entirely superseded. We cannot possibly help people into healthy or harmonious states by suggesting to them what is adverse, even though we are ostensibly denying the power or even the very existence of the enemy. If there (in reality) be no foe, why name the illusory demon? If the real object in treatment is to establish a condition of concord, why give a thought to discord and suggest its presence by denying it? Single words are often all-sufficient formulas. Strength, courage, peace and many other simple words are, in our experience, amply sufficient to suggest and thereby to induce the exact mental attitude which must be established prior to a subsequent ultimation of order in the flesh, and finally in our surroundings.

Let all who wish to profit by concentrative and meditative exercises select a word or a brief expressive sentence and hold it steadily in thought until a feeling of repose or exhilaration, as the special case may demand, has resulted therefrom. If objective suggestion is a help, we are acting well within the limits of beneficial suggestive treatment. If we map out in any pleasing or artistic form the idea, we are seeking mentally to grasp and retain. A picture, a statue, a motto, or indeed anything convenient for the purpose, may serve as an introductory aid to mental imaging, and so long as the image portrays nothing contrary to the idea suggested by the will, you have carte blanche to select your own images. A statue of the Belvedere Apollo is sometimes used as an introduction to a lecture on anatomy and physiology, because that perfect Greek type of human symmetry represents the human frame in glorious natural perfection. Imperfection, except in a case of evolution from an incomplete to a ripened condition, is utterly pathological, and being so it must never be mapped out mentally or physically if it is our sincere desire to do practical work in the humane direction of establishing peace where war is now rampant, no matter whether our definite field of action embraces international arbitration or is confined to the much narrower domain of a single human organism as a starting point.

We would gladly demolish all ugly pictures and all hideous statues, and very gladly indeed would we burn up all hideous photographs and destroy all books and papers which contain almost nothing but harrowing accounts of misery and crime. No possible good is ever done by having a portrait of yourself at your worst to look at privately or exhibit among your friends; but a picture of you at your best may be a source of elevation to yourself and others. Paintings which show forth some of the visions of Dante while dreaming of an Inferno should never be encouraged as mural decorations, but the beautiful Beatrice and many scenes from the same author's entrancing visions of Paradise may be profitably selected to adorn the selectest home.

There is no work so ethically remunerative and none so truly advantageous in an all-round sense as that of suggesting harmony by first establishing it in your own thought-sphere as a tangible reality and then compelling outward things to assume a like complexion. As to how this rightful mental imaging produces correct external conditions ultimately may provoke much earnest questioning, and to the consideration of this most fertile and fascinating scheme we shall give special attention in the next lesson in the present series. Inward poise we must first establish, assured that outward harmony must perforce ensue.

LESSON IV

The Power of the Will Divine Realization in Maintaining Health

THOUGH volume after volume may be written concerning Will Power and its immeasurable potency, this subject is essentially inexhaustible because will and love are identical. We instinctively declare love to be the creative power throughout the universe, then when reason supplements instinct in our unfolding consciousness we begin to think out an intelligible definition of an axiomatic truth. Love organizes everything that is organized, and love and will are inseparable. We cannot even imagine one as abiding without the other. Will power is love in action. Love is the source; will is the radiation or emanation from that source, and, being its direct expression, must be of the same nature with it.

It is absolutely necessary to the student's progress in Mental Science or a true psychology that the intellect should be completely delivered from those false beliefs concerning will which cause multitudes of honest though misguided people to struggle against their own wills, thereby rendering themselves wretchedly inefficient in nearly all directions. It is, if possible, even more important to protect children against those same errors which cause parents and teachers (who are often sadly ignorant) to endeavor to break the wills of the children whose education is entrusted to their charge. We hesitate not to loudly affirm that no one who is so misguided as to attempt to break a child's will has developed even the most rudimentary qualifications for guarding and training youth. The stronger the will a person enjoys the firmer and more resolute that person assuredly is. It, therefore, inevitably follows that strong-willed people cannot be so easily driven as the weak-willed; but though they cannot be forced blindly, they can be lovingly and intelligently brought to see the most excellent paths and to walk in them with the full consciousness of rectitude and freedom.

It is continually asserted that every human being is in possession of two wills — one Divine, the other human. We take no radical objection to such a statement provided it is not followed by the absurdly pessimistic saying that of those two wills, one is good and the other evil. Such a declaration is totally unfounded, though, like all other fallacies, it undoubtedly originated with the falsification of some cardinal truth. The Eden allegory, or some similar story, is to be found in the sacred books of every clime and nation, and this universally disseminated story does truly set forth in pictorial imagery the varied elements which enter into the constitution of every human being. The figurative tales of the Orient are all couched in poetry and symbolism, and were never taken literally except by people far removed in distance, habits of thought and ways of life from Orient scenes in which the narratives originated. The serpent is the oldest symbol of matter, or the entire sensuous or outwardly objective plane of existence, therefore it inevitably figures very prominently in old mystical and occult writings. To "take up the serpent" is to accomplish the Rosicrucians' Magnum Opus, or work of transmutation, and if the serpent is to be uplifted by all initiates, it must necessarily be confronted by every candidate for hierophantic honors.

In every one of us there are two wills, the higher of which is permanent, the lower transitory. It is in the highest or inmost of his being that man is one with God, i. e., of the same nature with the Infinite. Every human being is an embryo divinity even in his present seemingly low condition of terrestrial embodiment. All the greatest works accomplished by the seers of the Orient have been performed by power of the higher will acting through the prepared channel of illuminated understanding. It is essential to our subject to remember that we act from the seat of our affections (will) through our understanding (intellect).

Every human being seeks good, and good only. "My soul is athirst for God, even for the living God. When shall I come to appear before the presence of God" is the universal soul-cry of the race, but though the deepest desire of every human being is for the one true living God, there is so much misapprehension in the realm of unfledged or fettered intellects that, though the primal love or root desire is identical in all, there is no approach to unanimity or concert of intellectual action until the outer mind, which is the medium through which the real entity acts, has become far enough unfolded and clarified to permit of the essential will making its way out into perfect exterior expression. "Ephraim is wedded to idols" is a very expressive definition of the average intellect. False beliefs or mental misconceptions do not eradicate our fundamental love and search for truth, but they serve as barriers between us and the acceptance or realization of the very good we inwardly desire.

To confound will-power with obstinacy is to fall into a most egregious mistake, for there is no relationship whatever between the two. Another fallacy very widely entertained is to the effect that will is a combative or destructive force, consequently it is supposed that to be very strong willed one must prove highly belligerent or pugilistic, and upon the basis of that fallacy there have been upreared many foolish and iconoclastic systems of so-called healing in which dangerous denials instead of invigorating affirmations have formed the staple. There is nothing whatever warlike in genuine will, which is a strong, beneficent, pacific force of unlimited attractive energy. Will attracts to itself that which it woos and draws by persistent expectation.

Will and faith are comrades, but will and strife are aliens. It is always a pitiful blunder to try and knock down obstacles, because whenever you oppose anything you waste your own strength and supply your adversary with your vitality as a weapon to use against you. Those who really know something of practical occultism are fully acquainted with the deep scientific lesson couched in the familiar Gospel words, "Resist not evil." We must, of course, complete the sentence and drink in the vital importance of "Overcome evil with good" before we can successfully perform a work of healing, but onward and upward steps have to be taken one by one.

The first step for most people is to disabuse their minds of the possessing fallacy that in order to be strongly wilful and, therefore, successfully operative in any line of work we elect to pursue, we must seek to batter down some formidable obstacle. Picture to yourselves a central microcosmic sun at the very centre of your own organism, either at the centre of the brain or at the solar plexus (the great ganglionic centre back of the abdomen) as you prefer; or, still better, picture to yourselves these two central luminaries electrically united and see one of them radiating its brilliance effluently through the entire brain, and the other emitting light which circulates to the extremities of the hands and feet, and envelops the entire surface of the frame with a soft, luminous sheen of aura. Then further picture forth the radiant beams of this aura passing far beyond the confines of your personality till they connect with whatever you specially desire to be united with. This exercise is always intensely helpful and highly beneficial provided you resolve to thus unite yourself with what is pure, wise and holy, either on this planet or in some other sphere.

Another very profitable exercise for those who engage in visualistic meditation is to see yourself surrounded with a perfect sheen of aura like unto a crystal mirror or a sea of glass, and in that bright environment of yourself behold the state or object you particularly desire to realize.

We give a needed warning to those who make the mistake of thinking they have a right to will other people to do as they desire. Such a course is altogether unlawful, as it savors of a crafty endeavor to subjugate the will of another, and being contrary to the perfect law of liberty enslaves in the meshes of coercive psychic influences whoever undertakes to practise it. It is always true that we must grant to our neighbors the same amount of freedom we claim for ourselves, or we cannot officiate successfully as liberators of ourselves or of our brethren who are in bonds.

Once having fully established the idea of Will as a magnet of illimitable ability and irrepressible activity, we shall be ready to consider practically the doctrine of spiritual conjunction. Almost all Spiritualists persist in speaking of guides, teachers and inspirers as "controls," and though we know there are many who use that term who are as much opposed to mental slavery as we are, we cannot justify the term as being expressive of anything like an ideal relation between the teacher and pupil, healer and patient, or sender and receiver of a mental message. All the objection to so-called hypnotism arises out of a not unnatural fear of yielding to some one else's control. And as there is a wide difference between pure and simple suggestion and what is generally understood by hypnosis, we are glad to be assured that many eminent physicians in England, as well as in America, have taken ground in favor of simple suggestion and against what they call hypnotism.

One of the tritest of sayings wherever mesmerism is broached is that to succeed in mesmeric experiments a strong-willed operator and a weak-willed subject are necessary, and every one who followed the career of widely advertised mind readers in America some years ago heard very much about Bishop and other sensitives being seriously injured nervously by submitting to the strain of psychic experiments which involved the yielding of a weaker to a stronger mentality. The practice of genuine mental therapeutics is diametrically opposed to all coerciveness, and though it be a fact that in probably ninety-nine cases out of every hundred the healer has a more fully developed will than the invalid who applies for treatment, the entire trend of beneficent suggestion is toward emancipating and strengthening, never toward enslaving or coercing the will of the sufferer. Mental treatments, when fully adminstered, are directed toward the intellect in full accordance with the wills of the patient and healer who act in concert.

Whenever you seek to obtain an increase of strength or happiness, or obtain deliverance from any kind of mental or physical distress, you are apt to allow the fallacy to dominate you that you cannot do the good and reasonable work you are wishful to accomplish. At this point the healer's will, united with his understanding (which may be greater than your own), comes to your rescue, and you are assured by the powerful suggestive treatment given you that you can accomplish whatsoever you will to do. I will accomplish that which I will to accomplish is an excellent model formula for self treatment. When you are treating others you merely change the pronoun in the sentence, substituting you or we for I.

The very highest act of will is its consecration to the noblest mission possible, that of blessing all humanity. Just as soon as people everywhere are brought to understand that it is through force of will working through expectation, burning as a steady, continuous, quenchless flame, that all desires can be fulfilled pacifically, wars will cease over all the earth. In the endeavor to heal it is always worse than futile to take up a resentful attitude either toward disease or the causes which are supposed to bring about disorderly conditions. Health is possible only as we dwell in peace and unity. We cannot be concentrating our attention steadily on the object of our supreme desire, and at the same time taking troubled cognizance of the annoyances and humiliations which threaten to prevent the fulfilment of our desire. One path or the other must be trodden, and no real progress can be made so long as we halt between any two opinions. Once fix in your thought-centre the idea of your ideal, then concentrate steadily and exclusively upon reaching the goal you wilfully pursue, and because of that complete centralizing of thought and fixity of mental gaze, you will find yourself growing so strong inwardly and radiating so much spiritual and personal force that disturbances hitherto apparently insurmountable will dissolve as ice melts under the torrid beams of a tropic sun.

Will must never be confounded with aught that opposes itself to the Divine influx which is our perpetual life. To realize this incessant influx is to attain to a state where fear of inherited taint and subsequent sinfulness can no longer fetter us, because we live no longer in the past, but in the vital present. The will to be well, happy, prosperous and useful is normal, and belongs to our true spiritual being, whereas all foolish and pernicious desires, which we must completely relinquish ere we can enter into a true realization of our ties with all that is Divine, pertain entirely to the unenlightened intellect, or "mortal vision," as it has often been termed by Christian Scientists.

Many people invent a difficulty in the path of spiritual healing by starting with the false assumption that temporary conceits and vagaries of the intellect are centred in the Will, when they have in reality no lodgment whatever there. A true exposition of the matter leads us to perceive that intellect can be either beclouded or enlightened, and as in every case it serves as a medium of communication between the plane of Will and the plane of Sense, whatever darkens the understanding is comparable to a solar eclipse when the sun itself is shining as brightly as though no dark object had come between its radiance and the earth. The real Will must be completely separated from its fictitious counterpart before we can give or receive true spiritual treatment, as all healing ministries must acknowledge coöperation of will versus competition of will.

If a person appears to take delight in some injurious indulgence, he does not take true pleasure in anything injurious, he merely believes through ignorance of law that he will derive some benefit or real enjoyment through a channel which entirely fails to connect with any spring of health or fountain of happiness. Regardless of whether your pupil-patient is yourself or another, boldly affirm that every human being really desires good only. Then proceed to treat yourself or the other thus: We all desire whatever makes for our best interest and naught besides; therefore, whatever fails to contribute to our true welfare is outside the pale of our real desires. We all love good and intend to harmonize with universal order. We are henceforth free from all illusions of belief, and unite ourselves wilfully with that alone which makes for righteousness.

We make no arbitrary rules for students to follow as to definite formulas to be employed, but we do declare that success in healing will always prove commensurate with a righteous view of human will and all pertaining to it. Humanity can only be impeded in its onward road to actualized nobility by the wretched heresies which present man to himself as an incarnate fiend instead of a bright archangel in process of evolution. We are all Divine at the very core or centre of our being, and the more forcibly we declare in favor of our royal birthright, the sooner shall we escape from the clutches of disease, poverty, vice and all that prevents our happy usefulness. Divine realization necessitates faith in the following tremendous statement: Every atom in our entire constitution is good, and it is our quenchless, unalterable will that all atoms entering into our economy shall be so polarized that perfect harmony shall stand revealed. Divine life is our inmost; we receive life continually from a pure source, through a pure channel. Health is now our complete inheritance. Use such affirmations persistently as breathing exercises and reap most blissful consequences.

LESSON V

The Power of the Will and Divine Realization in Maintaining Health

THOUGH almost every one believes to a large extent in the power of Will, there is frequently a seeming conflict between the religious idea of obedience to Divine Will and the purely rationalistic conception of the supremacy of the human will regardless of a superior Divine Will. These two ideas, however, are not mutually exclusive or contradictory, though in order to understand their agreement we must at once clearly define what we mean by the terms employed. The essential will of all humanity can be justly spoken of as good, because it is reasonable and in full accord with general human progress. We cannot rationally conceive of a Supreme Being who wills the injury of any portion of the Creation, but we can entertain a truly exalted idea of the Deity when we endorse the fine affirmation of an apostle: "This is the will of God, even your sanctification." To sanctify means to make whole, therefore to heal, for by healing is properly signified that perfect development of the individual which leaves nothing to be desired in his entire condition. We may gladly anticipate a time when there will be no sickness to cure, no crime to eradicate and no abject misery to relieve, but we can never think of a day when the work of education will have reached a final end.

Now, all children are born into a state of self-love in which they appear regardless of others; they are neither friendly nor unfriendly to their neighbors, for they think only of themselves and their own wants. This natural condition must in due season be outgrown, and when we begin to outgrow it we are conscious of a struggle, or conflict, between two opposing forces in our own economy. The universal story of Eden must have had its symbolic origin in this very real human experience; the serpent in us always urges upon us the supreme desirability of gratifying self regardless of neighbor, while the Divine voice, also within us, is continually urging us to seek the larger good of the social unit in preference to the smaller good of the personal unit. It is only while we are as yet unwise that we imagine these interests to be contradictory, for no sooner do we reach a point in our intellectual as well as moral education where we begin to see that neighbor includes self, though self does not include neighbor, than we perceive the working of one common good will in all and through all seeking to produce the best for all. The will to be well may be, but need not be, a purely selfish instinct; an individual may desire all that makes for his own welfare regardless of that of his neighbor, but he need not be thus regardless in order to secure his own welfare.

No more forcible example can be given than the prevailing theory of infection. Most people dread contagious disorders, therefore they feel aggrieved when their neighbors, through foolish neglect of sanitary precautions, allow themselves to become dangerously ill. No sensible person imagines that those who suffer from painful and serious ailments can enjoy their own sad condition; they can therefore have no possible interest in jeopardizing the health of the community, for were they in good health themselves, thereby capable of enjoying life, they could not spread disease among their neighbors.

The same reasoning applies with equal force to all intellectual, moral and spiritual attainments; the interest of all being clearly at stake in the mental, moral and spiritual elevation of each individual member of human society. There is a prevailing fallacy which needs to be forcibly corrected, namely, that in order to be well off ourselves we must to some extent swindle or impoverish our neighbors. This canker-worm at the very root of business ethics causes one set of mistaken people to neglect their own advancement, fearing that did they promote it they would harm others, while it leads another set of the equally misguided to resort to rascality, because they believe there is no promotion for them without it. These two errors committed by two morally-opposed classes of people are both mistakes of the intellect, neither proceeding from the will. Did the first-mentioned class see their way to personal success along a perfectly honest pathway, they would gladly reach the goal of success, and did the others see the same they would also travel along an honorable road.

We plainly see when we pause to investigate the essential nature of human will that there is nothing in it radically opposed to Divine Will. The theological supposition that man's will is evil while God's Will is good has proceeded from an ignorant failure to discriminate between essential human will, which is permanent, and transitory human desires, which only evidence a transitory frame of mind. We all desire health, and what does perfect health mean but complete equipment for the full discharge of all our varied duties, public and private? When we are perfectly well we are useful, good-natured, cheerful, intellectually brilliant, and in every way conducive to the well-being of all with whom we come in contact.

We will now consider a typical philanthropist, one as benevolent as John Howard, for example. Such a man lives only to do good, his eye is single to the welfare of his neighbors, he is continually engaged in devising schemes for the improvement of their condition, and in order to carry out these benevolent designs he must have strength of mind and body in large degree; any attack of illness must in some degree incapacitate such a man from doing the large good work his kindly spirit is ever seeking to accomplish. Such a man cannot help being happy because he is making others happy, and as nothing so greatly conduces to health as a contented mind, coupled with a cheerful disposition, the genuine philanthropist is likely to enjoy far better health than the self-pampering, sensuous man or woman, who is always seeking personal security and physical gratification. Truly may it be said that we do not enjoy health because we are continually seeking health, but we become healthy because we so live that we cannot feel the reverse.

No one who truly realizes the operation of Divine Will in his own will can separate or alienate himself from Omnipresent Divinity. Different ideas of God may be honestly entertained by various schools of thinkers, but the fundamental proposition which is that Good is supreme and universal must be held in common by all truly healthy, happy and useful people. We cannot be healthy and pessimistic at the same time, though we may enjoy health while holding to a fatalistic view of life, provided our fatalism is of a cheerful variety. The celebrated mottoes "God reigns" and "All's right with the world" may be employed to defend and set forth the doctrine of predestination, but it must be the predestination of Supreme Benevolence.

We do not advocate fatalism, but we do insist on optimism, by which we mean a philosophy of life which can be expressed in the following sentence: We can get every blessing we desire, provided we set about getting it in the right way. The law of the universe is both immutable and beneficent, therefore it is absurd to seek to change its operation, but as that operation cannot be improved, and we need but to become familiar with it to reverence it supremely, our only wise course is to acquaint ourselves therewith, and be at peace.

How shall we acquaint ourselves with universal order? is the greatest of questions. We can only learn it as the seers or prophets of old learned it, by communing with the Divine in the secret place of our own conscious being. "BE STILL AND KNOW" is a great precept, and by stillness is properly meant entire detachment from all ulterior objects of thought. There is ever a great mystery attaching to our unconscious relation with the spiritual universe. We are surrounded at all times not only by a crowd of witnesses but by a concourse of companions who are in the same inmost affection as ourselves. We need have no theoretical knowledge either of Spiritualism, Theosophy or Mental Science to be in the closest psychical communion with multitudes of spiritual beings because spiritual relationships depend almost entirely upon similarity of affection. Whatever you will, love or desire brings you, knowingly or unknowingly to yourself, into intimate relation with many others who love, desire or will the same. Spiritual spheres and psychical associations are thus constituted and held in form; so much so that whenever we deliberately embrace a new idea and cling to it with our affections we become introduced into a new spiritual society whose membership includes some who are yet on earth and others who have passed beyond mortal vision.

Many people complain of bad luck or chronic misfortune; they assure their friends that misfortune continually pursues them, while they are simply rendering their own unfortunate condition chronic by persistently adhering to the belief that it is so. Before we can emancipate ourselves from the dominion of the old mythological Fates and Furies we must acknowledge our primary relation with the absolutely Divine, no matter how many secondary relations we may have with mortal conditions. We have all two origins, one spiritual, the other carnal, and the latter must be subdued to the former. We have partaken of the peculiarities of our ancestors, we have been influenced by prenatal disturbances and by postnatal environments of all sorts; these have formed our coats of skin which we wear in the external world both visibly and invisibly, for it is a skin of several layers' thickness. But this skin is no part of our immortal nature which we are constantly deriving from the Divine Being whose life is communicated to us by incessant influx. We can only realize our relation to the Divine as we study the order of our breathing. All venerated scriptures declare that God breathes into man the breath of life, thereby constituting him a living soul. Breathing is a continuous process; it must be kept up moment by moment or we should die. Herein we trace an exact correspondence between the life of the soul and the animation of the body.

People continually strike against the rock of Heredity because they see no farther back than Adam; not knowing of their Divine inheritance, they think it necessary to fulfil in themselves all the foibles of their grandparents. Others, again, are committed to a false view of astrology, for, while not understanding the higher view of interstellar science, they accept the morbid conclusions of mediæval astrologers without looking behind those vagaries to the far loftier astrological science of remoter antiquity.

We must now consider the genesis of our desires. We desire what we desire because we are what we are, and we seek to express what we seek to express because we contain what we contain. You can desire to exercise a faculty or to employ a talent even though that talent be ever so deeply buried within you, but if it be not involved in your constitution you cannot feel its pulsation within you. A child may cry for the moon, and thereby give evidence of two distinct desires, both of which can be gratified; the lowest of these is simply an infant's wish for a bright, glistening plaything, the second and deeper desire is an astronomical inquiry which can soon be taken advantage of as a basis for astronomical studies. Were there no possibilities within us for finding things out we should have no desire to find them out. To be healthy is to be harmonious with one's environment, whatever that environment may be; we can therefore enjoy health on a comparatively low plane until we are awakened to something higher; then we become dissatisfied with what formerly contented us, and precisely at this point we are apt to get ill.

Now we know that we desire something higher than we have yet attained; we cannot go back to the old condition and we cannot be happy where we now are because we are being urged forward by a push from behind and a pull from before. Let us seek to adjust ourselves to our new requirements, and if we are wise we shall welcome the transitory upheaval which marks our passage from an outgrown state to one we have not yet grown into. Let us make sure of our will; let us retire into a silent retreat whenever practicable and question our own inmost aspirations, seeking to discover exactly what it is we really want. We must now be very cautious lest we be entangled in the meshes of other people's opinions, which are sure to be conflicting, and if followed by us will inevitably lead us astray. Every soul in a period of crisis must hear the Divine voice for itself, no one can hear it for another, though one may help to remove barriers which prevent another from hearing that voice for himself. Here comes in the place of mental healing free from all dictatorial presumption. The will of the patient must work with the will of the healer as the will of a pupil who wills to learn harmonizes completely with the will of a teacher who wills to teach.

Suppose I give you a treatment when you are in a quandary; if I treat you scientifically I address you about as follows: "My dear friend, listen to me. Your essential will is good; you truly desire only what is best; you wish to do good and get good; you desire to see the right way plainly, and, seeing it, to walk therein. I now affirm on your behalf that you do see your way plainly; that all-sufficient light now breaks in upon your understanding. You can now do exactly what is best for you to do now. The next step is already plain before you, and all successive steps which you need to take will be made plain one by one as occasion for taking them arrives." When your treatment has proved successful you leave the one most benefited by it in so tranquil a mental frame that he now clearly sees what it is best for him to immediately do; he feels freer by far than before you treated him; his own sense of individual freedom has been heightened; his dependence on Omnipresent Divine aid deepened; you have been to him as a gate-opening angel, for your instrumentality has caused unseen fetters to fall from spiritual limbs. You have not endowed an eagle with clear sight or with powerful wings, but you have broken the bars of an eagle's cage, and the now freed bird can expand its pinions and turn its uninterrupted gaze toward the Sun of Righteousness, which is always shining with healing in its beams. You will not always require the services of a spiritual janitor; you may henceforward dispense with them yourself, and become a janitor unto others who are yet in mental prison houses.

As your own will increases in conscious strength and freedom you become increasingly amiable and easy to get along with, for, though firm, you are sweet, and though very decided when conviction is at stake, you are very pliable in matters of no moral importance. Strong-willed, free-willed people are never unreasonable or capricious though they have well-made-up minds of their own, for they rejoice in their neighbor's liberty as much as in their own. We must redeem the word wilfulness. A wilful child is a very loving child and usually grows up, when not irrationally thwarted, into a singularly capable man or woman. One great secret of our frequent failures to accomplish our own lawful desires is our mean attempt to force other people to yield to our caprices while we bitterly resent all the efforts they may make to compel us to yield to theirs.

Free-will is a large word capable of no small application. If I wish to enslave another I conjoin myself with a slave's heaven, which is also a society of tyrants, for every slave wishes to tyrannize, and every tyrant is the slave of some other tyrant. Never cringe and never boss if you would be free yourself, for he who bosses will be bossed and he who cringes will be held in perpetual serfdom. When we have come to realize that we have only one Master — even the Supreme Spirit of Goodness — and this Divine Governor rules from within us, not from without, we shall not stumble any longer regarding a true definition of our own higher self. There is a Divine independence which is perfectly in accord with right dependence and mutual interdependence, for we are all brethren, and no brother can be his brother's superior or inferior in a last analysis of rank. Some members of the family may be senior and others junior, but they are all of one blood.

Will is a bloody thing, the flesh of which is the intellect; we must first have pure blood, then sound flesh and, finally, beautiful skin. So must we first have a clear conception of good-will, then a right understanding how to carry good-will into effect, and, finally, we shall attain unto the consummate fruit of our desires made manifest in a perfectly healthy organism and a perfectly satisfactory condition of surrounding affairs. The power of the will is a secret power; it is always acquired by occult force which works in and through all our behavior. The words of a truly strong-willed individual are always powerful to accomplish great results; not one of them is ever spoken in vain.

You may lay the foundation of a large, eminently successful business concern by selling a single newspaper to a chance customer in exactly the right way. It may be your deepest desire, so far as worldly affairs are concerned, to become the head of a great publishing house which will dispense far and wide the noblest and most instructive literature. You have no capital yet, but you are quite sure within yourself that the time is not distant when you will have abundance. You know you are qualified to conduct a large, benevolent business successfully, but you do not yet see how you are to realize your desires. At this particular moment all you need to do may be to sell a single copy of Science Siftings for a penny to the first person who asks you for one. That is quite enough for a beginning if you are in the right mental frame and your expectation is united with your will; you are now sowing a tiny seed which has within it the potencies of a gigantic tree. A man or woman who believes in small things and unimportant details is a very foolish and Godless individual, God-forsaken because God-forsaking. Such a small human insect should take a walk into the country on the first half-holiday and examine a non-human insect, then having discovered that the Infinite Intelligence working through all Nature has lavished as much symmetry and beauty upon an infinitesimal creature as upon an elephant, he should go back to his small details of petty business and pronounce them immense possibilities for displaying the highest skill and for achieving the most magnificent purposes.

Always compel your expectations to keep step as a second horse in harness with your decided will. All doubt is diabolical; you can never achieve greatness while you harbor a single doubt. Great men who have been called sceptics have been simply inquirers who were unsatisfied with the narrow views of the universe which had been presented to them in childhood. Scientific scepticism is merely a confession of relative ignorance while engaged in quest of absolute knowledge. In all times of doubt and threatened despondency make the following affirmations: My will is completely at one with the entire good-will of the universe. I desire only what it is best for me to obtain, and I have perfect faith that I shall obtain this in due season, and that season is immediately I am qualified to fulfil my part nobly. I rejoice in the freedom of all my neighbors as truly as in my own. I pledge myself to extend to all others the same measure of liberty I desire extended to myself. Seeing that my will is in harmony with the Divine Will, which is omnipotent, I exclaim, "May the Divine Will be done in me through the agency of my will, which is God's human executive."

Let such an attitude as the foregoing be persistently maintained, health of mind and body will ensue because it must. When we need to do something for the benefit of health we shall see exactly what to do and feel a distinct disposition to do it. All matters pertaining to food, raiment and shelter, as well as all needful advice concerning business and family affairs, will flow into our receptive understanding by means of an intuitive gateway.

It is a particularly good practice to set apart a certain brief space each day at a convenient time for withdrawal into privacy for the express purpose of receiving counsel from within, or if it be difficult in a very busy life to do this by day, before falling asleep at night let us always make the affirmation that during peaceful sleep we shall receive such interior enlightment as will cause us to rise in the morning fully equipped, morally, mentally and physically, for our next day's undertakings. During sleep, even when we sleep dreamlessly, we can receive the deepest spiritual illumination.

LESSON VI

Hypnotism, Sleep, Rest and Repose as Healing Agents

As all our students are doubtless well aware that though there is but one meaning properly attaching to the word Hypnotism, which is derived from the Greek Hypnos, meaning sleep, the popular idea of both Mesmeric and Hypnotic treatment, which are considered virtually the same, is entirely at variance with that full assertion of individual will which these lessons persistently advocate.

The literature of mesmerism is so copious and easily accessible that all who desire to do so can easily avail themselves of all the most important facts concerning Mesmer and his wonderful work performed in Europe a full century ago. Since his time multitudes of followers who have more or less closely adhered to his teachings have deluged the world with real or pretended exhibitions of so-called mesmeric power. Mesmer himself was undoubtedly a good and learned man, though his practice was by no means free from mistakes and absurdities; the chief drawback to his complete success as a magnetizer for the healing of disease consisted in his unwise method of connecting his patients magnetically, thereby running the risk of the transmission of disorder from one organism to another.

Deleuze, an eminent Frenchman, in his fine work, "Animal Magnetism," published in 1825, carried the theory of Mesmer to a safer and completer issue; but even he failed to rid the central mesmeric idea of those unnecessary accretions which have always hampered the beneficent employment of animal magnetism as a therapeutic agent. The well-known decision of a committee of French Academicians many years later than 1825, which was to the effect that animal magnetism was a non-existent quantity, the cures attributed to it being properly referable to the exercise of imagination both on the part of physician and patient, did much to pave the way for the doctrine and practice of the celebrated Englishman, Doctor Braid, of Manchester, who employed the word hypnotism to cover all the ground formerly traversed by mesmerists or animal magnetists.

During the past twenty years the popular interest in mesmerism, so-called, has steadily waned, while the interest in mental modes of treatment has wonderfully increased. There has, however, been a wide division among mental or suggestive practitioners, one party drifting into the abstract idealism known as Christian Science, another party verging toward Agnosticism and even Materialism in the practice of professed hypnotism, a third party endeavoring to take a wise middle course between the two extremes, gladly embracing the good in all systems of practice, but refusing to be bound in the trammels of any sect.

As the result of large experience with professors of various schools of mental and magnetic practice, the author of these lessons can safely affirm that much that passes under the name of hypnotism is pure and simple Mental Suggestion, in no way subversive of the individual liberty of the person who voluntarily yields to such suggestion, while, on the other hand, many attempts are made to compel submission to an operator's will on the part of unscrupulous practitioners. Let it once for all be understood that no amount of raving against hypnotism and its dangers, like that indulged in by the foolish among Christian Scientists and Theosophists, can possibly protect the weak and unwary against the machinations of those who seek to misemploy hypnotic ability. The only safeguard of an individual is that individual's own mental and moral superiority to any adverse influence with which he may be visibly or invisibly brought in contact.

There is a phase of hypnotism, speaking technically, which is an essential part of all proper mental treatment. Neurotic disorders always induce sleeplessness, and when insomnia has gone very far it borders closely on insanity, therefore it is highly necessary that a mental healer should know how to induce sleep in a sleepless patient. All opiates and anodynes are decidedly pernicious in their ultimate effect on the constitution, especially if their use be long continued, and it is a well-known fact that when sleeplessness becomes chronic the dose of chloral or opium has to be frequently increased, or it produces no result whatever. At this distracting point in the history of a victim of aggravated insomnia the strong, well-balanced mental healer can step in with the power of suggestion to entirely overcome these dangerous and distressing symptoms, and, in order to do what needs to be done, this mental healer must have a clear conception of the true place of the will in suggestive practice.

We all know that a case such as the one instanced desires sleep, but believes it impossible to obtain it. All confidence in material medicines has been lost because they have proved thoroughly ineffective, therefore the coast is clear for the work of the mental healer, who approaches the patient with an entirely new kind of remedy.

The first great essential is that healer and patient should make each other's friendly acquaintance. The healer, to be such in reality, must inspire confidence and communicate a sense of repose which only a reposeful person can do. Sometimes on the occasion of a first treatment it is desirable for the healer to take both of the patient's hands in his own, look steadily into the patient's eyes and clearly articulate the words in a firm, calm voice, "You will sleep perfectly to-night." This simple sentence can be repeated a number of times in succession, the voice of the speaker gradually lapsing into silence, when the treatment can be still continued without audible expression.

Whenever possible, it is highly desirable to give this treatment just before the patient retires for the night, or, when that is not practicable, during the treatment, the hour for retiring should be mentioned, the suggestive healer saying, for example, "You fall asleep to-night at eleven; you sleep soundly until seven." Of course, an earlier or later hour for retiring or rising can be substituted for eleven and seven at the wish or discretion of both parties concerned, but a wise limit of time for a night's rest is always eight hours, though ten or even twelve hours' profound slumber is none too much for one who has been subjected to the exhausting effects of long-continued insomnia.

Surely every intelligent person can see that such sleep-inducing treatment as is here advocated cannot possibly be other than in full accord with the will of the person treated as well as with the will of whoever gives the treatment. The case stands thus: You wish to sleep, but something has kept you from sleeping; the healer's intention is to assist you to enjoy the sleep you both want and need, and in order to do so he must conquer the obstacle or banish the unseen intruder which has been preventing your repose.

When you apply for mental treatment you should know exactly what you desire and you should communicate this desire to the healer whom you have called in and request him or her to treat you for the accomplishment of such desire. You know you need sleep; you have been trying in vain to obtain it in useless and undesirable ways; you have now made up your mind to make trial of a new and highly superior method which the mental healer understands and practises. Seeing that you are both agreed concerning the end in view, you do not place yourself in any attitude of slavish submission to another's will. On the contrary, you have engaged a friend to coöperate powerfully with you to fulfil your own legitimate desire, which is for quiet rest, a condition always necessary to health of mind and body.

Whoever gives a treatment for sleep to himself or to another must use the word sleep frequently during affirmation. The constant use of a word which is the distinct embodiment of some definite idea cannot fail to induce the result suggested by that word, provided the word is spoken faithfully and frequently. Mere formulated sentences without life or deep feeling in them produce very small results; the same words when employed by one who feels them intensely will produce consequences of great magnitude. In this fact we find revealed something of the meaning of the old phrase, "the Master's word," which can only be spoken by a master, for were the same syllables uttered by a servant only a servant's word would result. The true hierophant or adept is one who has learned to speak whatever word he utters with the full assurance of faith that it will accomplish the result for which it is intended.

We often hear about the strong will of the operator and the weak will of the subject; but we need not draw therefrom the false, though common, inference that a weak-willed person must be brought under control of the stronger-willed individual in order to receive benefit.

Weak wills need strengthening, and they can be most effectively strengthened by friendly contact with all wiser and stronger wills. It is therefore quite true that a successful healer possesses a very much more fully developed will than that of the weak-willed patient. The first impulse of the weaker may be to yield blindly to the strong one, as weak-willed people are very irresolute and in no condition to shoulder heavy responsibilities themselves.

When the healer is a conscientious, upright person, and only such can be a genuine healer, no possible harm can result should the patient fall into a magnetic trance and experience for the time being what is known as artificial somnambulism in place of ordinary sleep. This magnetically-induced repose will soon be followed by refreshing rest of the ordinary description, and though we do not advise mental practitioners to set to work to induce artificial slumber, when it spontaneously follows upon their suggestions there is no cause whatever for annoyance or alarm.

When the patient has fallen asleep suggestions should be steadily continued until the healer feels within himself that the treatment already given suffices for the present. When you feel that you have said all that you have to say do not attempt to continue the treatment longer, for all subsequent statements will grow weaker, and might even counteract, at least to some extent, the good accomplished by your earlier and stronger statements.

We all know that sleep follows naturally whenever it is needed, provided we are not in an anxious or care-worn mental frame. The wise healer, seeking to deliver a patient from the bondage of insomnia, will often say nothing whatever about sleep during his suggestive treatment, but will confine his statements to mention of peace of mind, mental tranquillity, inward repose, and freedom from care or anxious solicitude concerning business or family affairs. We must clearly understand that it is always right to begin at the causative end when giving mental treatment. The usual cause of sleeplessness is worry, which is the antithesis of mental repose, therefore the treatment must be given for mental repose. The word worry should not be brought into the suggestive formulas, because to make mention of the name of a disease constitutes oftentimes an adverse suggestion which is soon taken up by a sensitive patient and translated into an auto-suggestion which serves to engrain the thought of disorder more fully in the consciousness of the sufferer.

We all have some idea of electro-magnetic action in the human system. The successful electro-magnetic physician is always one whose harmonizing instrumentality serves to equalize the electric and magnetic currents of force in the human body, which is a great storage battery for universal energy. Direct mental suggestion aims at successfully accomplishing by exclusively mental processes precisely what the electro-magnetist seeks to bring about with or through the aid of some external appliances.

We confess to no sympathy with any attempt to reduce the hours of natural sleep to a minimum by artificial processes, though, as in the case of the great Napoleon Buonaparte, three or four hours of unusually profound slumber will accomplish far more for the restoration of mental and physical energy than a very much longer time spent in light or fitful repose. Persons of highly nervous temperament when in good health are very sound sleepers; being naturally intense, they do everything intensely, including sleeping. Such persons, although often seemingly delicate or fragile in personal build, can do an amazing amount of mental work without fatigue; they also recuperate very readily after hard manual exertion, provided they are allowed to sleep peacefully until they awake spontaneously, and they can usually sleep soundly in any place, quiet or noisy, where they can feel mentally at rest.

Sleep must, however, be regarded as intended by nature for vastly higher purposes than merely recuperative ones. During sleep, in these days as in olden times, we often hold communion with spiritual beings from whom we receive an immense amount of that interior information which comes to us through no external avenues. We all live two lives at once, an outer and an inner life. During sleep we are in the subjective or sub-conscious condition which is our psychical state of life; then when we awake we return to the objective or superficial plane of consciousness where we often employ the results of information received while in the psychic condition. Did our recollective faculty serve us so far as to enable us to remember in the one state all that we experience in the other we should be in the possession of continuous, unbroken consciousness. We are never really unconscious during sleep, though we may be otherwise and elsewhere conscious than when we are awake.

A bridge can be built mentally between these two states of consciousness, so that when we desire to recollect in our waking hours what we have gained during sleep we can do so, provided we accustom ourselves to make positive affirmations before falling asleep that we shall remember after we have awakened all that can prove of value to us during the ensuing day. Prophetic dreams and correct visions of distant persons, places and objects, which not infrequently come to sensitive people while asleep, prove that our psychic faculty, which is usually at rest during the day, is wide awake and active during the night; but in cases where highly mediumistic people, clairvoyants, clairaudients, psychometers and others see visions and hear voices during the daytime, there is in their cases an unusually close bond of sympathy between the two planes of consciousness.

The so-called "Rest Cure," with which the name of Dr. Weir Mitchell, of Philadelphia, has long been prominently associated, is, in our judgment, largely a mistake, because rest cannot be obtained in uninteresting idleness. It is often necessary that nervously-overwrought patients should be for a time secluded from all ordinary cares and duties, while all responsibility is removed from their shoulders; but there can be no true rest where the mind is fidgety and a sense of irksome physical restraint makes the invalid feel like a prisoner.

One day a month in bed has been found a great boon to many a heavily-taxed housekeeper, and many a business man who does not rise till late on Sunday afternoon and attends church or lecture hall only in the evening finds the weekly Sabbath a veritable day of rest, refreshing alike to mind and body.

It is quite impossible to further define rest as a healing agent than to declare it to be complete repose from care and anxiety, for inducing which suggestive treatment is often imperatively needed. We all have many duties to perform which we cannot honorably escape. We can, however, so completely change our mental attitude to those duties that we can call a duty a delight, converting into a privilege what was aforetime a burden heavy to be borne. Very much more depends upon the mental attitude we take toward the work we have to do than upon the nature of the work itself. We may enjoy perfect repose while walking, talking, writing, singing, or doing any kind of mental or manual work, provided we determine to look upon our employment as an agreeable means of employing energy, not as a tiresome way of wasting it. They who truly husband their energies are they who do whatever comes in their way to do with cheerful alacrity, taking their occupations one by one, doing each piece of work in turn as perfectly as possible without troubling over what will need to be done next.

When you retire at night refuse to allow the anxieties of your business to affect you in any measure, but if you have business perplexities awaiting solution on the morrow, quietly and steadily affirm that you will receive, while you are sleeping, all necessary guidance by way of enlightenment to enable you to so conduct your affairs that the greatest possible good to all parties interested will result from your behavior. When you have accustomed yourself to the use of so wise a nightcap you will always awake in the morning with a clear head, refreshed limbs, a tranquil spirit and a general ability to overcome difficulties instead of being overcome by them. The same people might have called upon you, the same propositions might have been made to you during the ensuing day had you suffered from broken rest, troublous dreams and hysterical nightmare the night before; but the loss of sleep and general mental perturbation would have quite unfitted you to deal sagaciously with the people you encountered or to act wisely in connection with the plans submitted for your consideration.

We do not always get precise directions from the spiritual world how to act in mundane matters, but when we are in the enjoyment of high and, therefore, elevating spiritual conjunctions, we become so tranquil and so lucid that our own judgment is unbeclouded; in that way we are truly helped to help ourselves. The accomplished seer can at any time go into mental privacy and fall asleep at will.

We know of no better advice to give to anxious and perplexed people than the following: Retire at the earliest opportunity to some sequestered place and suggest to yourself that you will enjoy a short period of profound repose during which you will receive exactly the enlightenment you require to enable you to pass through your present difficulty to a higher state beyond. If you cannot readily feel the force of your own suggestion, because of your present mental turbulence, you are in a condition where you greatly need the services of a tranquil, judicious friend who can make the needed suggestions on your behalf, inviting you to make them for yourself after they have been made for you by another.

Whoever wishes to induce repose in another must have brought himself by that time into a state where he is altogether superior to disturbance resulting from common sources of annoyance. You cannot reasonably expect to enjoy real spiritual enlightenment until you have first conquered all undue anxiety concerning material affairs. The highest use of sleep, no matter of what variety or how induced, is to liberate the spirit from oppressive thraldom to the senses.

The conscientious professor of hypnotism — who may be a good physician, like the eminent Doctor Gregory, of Edinburgh, whose work on animal magnetism is still a standard medical classic, though he calls his work by a doubtful name — is certainly rendering valuable and beneficent service to humanity. The use of hypnotic suggestion in connection with surgery and dentistry can be most fully justified, because while anæsthetics are never unattended with danger, and usually serve only to drug a sensitive person into seeming unconsciousness, intelligent suggestions made by wise and kindly men and women serve to raise a patient's thought and feeling above the state where suffering is felt when surgical instruments are brought in contact with the physical body.

Doctor Baker Fahenstock, of Philadelphia, in his most interesting and authentic work entitled "Statuvolism," has given a record of many instances where he, together with many of his students, has so entirely risen above sensibility to pain that difficult and ordinarily dangerous operations have been easily and successfully performed without suffering being occasioned to those operated upon, and entirely without the subsequent weakness which is often more dangerous than either the operation or the pain it occasions. The all-essential doctrine connected with this subject is the power of the embodied human spirit while here on earth to so determine its own seat of conscious functioning that it can regard its body of flesh as simply an instrument to be manipulated by it entirely at its own discretion.

Popular fallacies concerning the dangers of hypnotism will all vanish when a higher view than the ordinary comes to be taken of individual sovereignty. Then will intelligent mental coöperation universally succeed to the present painful and utterly false belief that some have the right to be tyrants, while others must submit as slaves in the social organism.

LESSON I.

Statement of Being: Relation of Man to Deity.

Laying aside all pre-judgments, we must at once acknowledge ourselves as in the one life of which the manifest universe is the harmonious expression—affirming God and man are one. The infinite All-Good is the only principle of being. Man is the expression of Deity. Being acknowledges no severed personalities, or separated entities, but each individual conscious unit maintains its true selfhood in, not out of, the infinite. First affirmation: Good is all; there is no evil. Every atom is spiritual and eternal; creation is integration; destruction is disintegration; therefore, as the wise among the Brahmans teach, the destroyer and reproducer are the same (Siva), the transformer is the right title to employ. When teaching persons who believe in evil as a power or entity, it is essential to show how two supreme powers cannot possibly exist, as only one power is infinite, and infinity is all. I affirm my own divinity. I claim my portion of living bread and water as the offspring of the source of supply from whom I can never for an instant be divided; I reverently but confidently exclaim, "I and my Father are one." Let the student affirm this sentence over and over till the pronunciation of the truth causes a vibratory response throughout the frame, and only cease affirming when the token is received. To explain the import of this statement, have recourse to physical science, which is true in correspondence, and you will learn how to discriminate clearly between being and existence. God is, I am. God is all. I am in God; the all includes me. God is good. I am His good child. God is love and wisdom. I am loving and wise. God is power, I am powerful. God is strength, I am strong. God is truth, I am truthful. God is purity, I am pure. God is perfection, I am perfect. These statements are absolutely true, but must be uttered again and again that they may be proved, as the rule in mathematics must be constantly applied to solve a problem. Let the scientist reason from atoms, and the theologian from God, and from both standpoints the allness of Good and the consequent nothingness of alleged evil must appear. If it be thought necessary to account for the appearance of evil, explain the law of contradictories, and argue from the premise that as good is positive, the great reality, that which is less than a complete manifestation of good, is negative. MAN KNOW THYSELF. Anthropology and theology are one. Science is knowledge; philosophy is only speculative. Study the natural sciences, and they will show you spiritual truth inverted as a reflection in a mirror. Health is harmony. All is good, but every atom in the universe has its rightful place, and can only demonstrate its goodness when in order. When we feel ill at ease we are ignorantly opposing right; therefore, all suffering is a sign of inharmony. I affirm concerning my body, that it is good, yes, very good. I affirm for my body order which is according to divine law. I have a body, but I am its master, and I will exercise my lawful magisterial claim over all its parts and functions. My body is the expression of my idea, as I am the expression of God's idea. I am an idea in the infinite mind, my body is that idea expressed in form. God is the only absolute thinker, but man receives life into himself as the fishes in the ocean drink the water in which they swim, or as the birds flying through the air breathe that air. These illustrations, carefully followed to their logical conclusion, will give every student a clear, concise, communicable conception of man's oneness with God. Good being the essential, primal and ultimate condition of every atom, we pronounce all atoms divine, and then we proceed to treat for harmony, as follows: I acknowledge the one sole God as infinite and eternal, as omniscient and omnipresent. Every atom is in God. Man is the word of God, the spoken logos. The Word is the life and light, and all men share it equally, as all men are included in the Grand Man. Love is expressed as will, wisdom as understanding. There is but one will, and that will is perfect love. Love is father, wisdom is mother. Love acts first in desire, which is will seeking expression. Wisdom is love's co-operating counterpart. In Man, will and understanding must go together to produce harmonious results. I declare myself subject only to infinite love and wisdom, whose child I am. I deny the possibility of my ever being in any other power, for there is no other. I declare myself the portential possessor of all knowledge, and my conscious effort shall make this manifest. "I will be that I will to be." My will is one with the divine will. I acknowledge my will as the talent entrusted to me by the All-Good, and I will use it. I now declare that my spoken word expresses itself in my intellect, and my body is my intellect made visible. The subjective desire of my inmost nature I declare expressed in my form. I will to express health, harmony, strength, peace, joy, and courage, and I know that I am healthful, harmonious, strong, peaceful, joyous, and courageous. I claim dominion over the three kingdoms of nature, for these kingdoms are within me. I am their governor. God rules the world through man (read and study the 8th Psalm). I refuse allegiance to any other law than the law of harmony; I am subject only to the Deity. This denial and affirmation in one is particularly useful to rebut the prevailing beliefs of weakness and susceptibility so prevalent everywhere.

Second Affirmation.—My body is the beautiful, harmonious expression of my will, and my will is one with the divine will. Anatomy and physiology are beautiful studies, but pathology must be rigorously excluded from our curriculum. Anatomy describes the perfect frame of man and woman; physiology explains the perfect functions of all the perfect organs. Though it is quite possible to grasp the truth of being spiritually through intuition without having recourse to any external aid, in these days, when the senses are being so continually appealed to in the externalisation of ideas, we can profitably map out the body in perfection, pronouncing it at every step very good. Teach yourselves and your children the natural lawful position and use of every portion of the body; the body is in reality wholly spiritual, and it continues to exist forever.

"There is a spiritual body." No matter what false conceptions any may have entertained, a clear, positive statement of the true spiritual body will rectify their errors, and such psychical and physical changes will take place in our outward forms as correspond to our thought about the true form. Unconscious thought has largely built the body hitherto; mankind must now arise and try the force of conscious thought to construct the body as a perfect instrument of spirit. We have all libelled and abused our bodies. We have not known our bodies as temples of the living God. Let us know our bodies as ultimations of our real selves, discarding all false beliefs about them. A very profitable exercise, especially for all who think their bodies weak and imperfect, is to pronounce every organ of the frame and every function thereof pure, beautiful, blessed, and holy. The Scriptures speak of the organs of the body as expressions of the power of the All-Holy, and declare the healing is "making whole" (entire, complete, symmetrical). Let the student who is seeking deliverance from weak thoughts concerning the body pronounce such a formula repeatedly as "I pronounce my body the perfect instrument of my soul, and my soul is an expression of Infinite Spirit. My body is very beautiful, and I admire it greatly, within and without; it is wonderfully constructed of living thoughts, and these thoughts are perpetually changing and weaving themselves into varied and ever still more charming combinations. My body grows stronger and more beautiful every time I think a thought in accordance with truth, and I will not think an impure thought; nothing can make me think unwisely, for there is but one absolute thinker—God." Be not afraid, dear students, to use these words of power and flame, they are words of peace and harmony. "Acknowledge God in all thy ways" and no evil can befall thee, for evil is but discord created by false thinking which right thinking immediately dispels. No man, woman, or child who can grasp the spirit of this lesson need wait an hour before beginning to teach or heal. Call your neighbours and friends together and read these statements to them, and as you assemble in the search for truth, you will receive power and guidance. Repeat the formulas until you feel them; take them to bed with you, and let them repose in you while you are asleep; thus you will find an increase of strength, a fuller measure of health than ever before. The writer of this lesson knows the power of the Word from actual experience, but no one demonstrates the science perfectly until every vestige of false belief is cast aside.

We have been crammed with error, and our intellects hold it tenaciously, while our divine will seeks freedom from all error. Harness the intellect as a swift steed to the chariot. Will is the driver; intellect is the horse. Deny precedent as necessary in any case to fortify your claims. There are six periods in regeneration as in generation, and this veiled truth is hidden in the opening statements in Genesis. The thought of to-day is in advance of all preceding ages, and we have a right to expect fulfilments undreamed of in the days of old. Formerly, once in awhile, a glorious hierophant mastered sense and worked wonders; but the mighty works he accomplished were all according to law. Man is an embodiment of law. Law is will, and will is law; there is but one will, there is but one law, and that is divine.

We laugh at gravitation when we support a falling body, yet gravity is undisturbed; we laugh at mountain storms when we climb above the clouds and the storm rages only in the valleys; so do we through the glorious science of Spirit, now for the first time in the records of humanity revealed to the masses, laugh at the spurious pessimism and antiquated folly of the representatives of respectable but depressing fossilism who tell us so and so has never been, and therefore never can be. Modern inventions daily give the lie to such abominable croaking. Reader, whoever you may be, I implore you for your own sake, and for the sake of all humanity, to read and ponder well the statements in this lesson, and now give you a word of mingled warning and encouragement. Whatever thought would hold you back from using these mighty affirmations of truth and denials of errors, however well intended such mistaken would-be adviser may be, will, if yielded to, depress your mentality and impair your health. Be strong to resist the specious sophistry which masquerades as wisdom, and would deter you from claiming your inheritance. Repeat frequently "I am subject only to the law of infinite good. I claim my right to health, to happiness, to spiritual wealth, and to my full measure of all external supply to meet my every need. My will is one with the goodwill of all humanity. Whatever I claim for myself, I claim for all. Dear humanity, I love you, I am inseparable from you; your welfare is mine, and mine is yours. We are one family forever. God is all in all."

LESSON II.

Prayer and Unction: A Study of Desire and Expectation.

Read and study the epistle of James, which contains a great deal of practical instruction concerning the necessary attitude of thought, and explains clearly the difference between mere belief (dead) and true faith (living). What is faith? We declare it to be perfect trust and confidence in the All-Good. Faith and prayer always go together. The "prayer cure" is with oil and prayer. We can test the efficacy of all instructive teachings by fairly using them. Oil in the early Church was used literally in connection with prayer, in all places where a material interpretation of the Word was given. Oil is a symbol of wisdom; a shadow of a deep spiritual reality. But what is a shadow? Some schools of metaphysicians declare all material things to be shadows; but a shadow can be cast only by a substance. There must be something intercepting the light to cause a shadow. If the physical world is only a shadow, where is the substance that casts it, what is the reality which is reflected? While the reflected face in the glass is nothing, a real form must be before the glass to be reflected. Matter if a shadow must be the shadow or reflection of something. Many homœopathists declare the highest attenuations to be the most potent with sensitive patients. Why? Surely because trituration is a mental as well as a physical process. It extracts hidden potency from the drug by refining away the outer covering of its psychic essence. Everything in nature generates an aura, but the potency is not in the aura, of which the outward form is the grossest crystallization, but in the vitalising element, which is invisible. We do not believe in saying indiscriminately, "You can take anything you wish," to everybody, because wishes are results of mental states. When our food serves us, we are nourished; anything may prove injurious to us if we do not dominate it, and dominion comes through knowledge of law. When we desire or will that the will of God be done, our will becomes one with the will of God, and harmony results in our bodies and surroundings. Oil, we repeat, corresponds to illumination, light, understanding. True prayer is aspiration rather than supplication. When we pray truly we fervently aspire. Montgomery said truly, "Prayer is the ladder Jacob saw." Aspirations are angels going up the celestial ladder, while inspirations are angels coming down the same ladder. We must aspire in order to inspire; we cannot inspire till we aspire. An angel never comes down till an angel has gone up. All good thoughts are angelic forms, and brings us into close relationship with all who think rightly.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire." All Desire is prayer! When prayer is accompanied by anointing with oil, symbolically oil signifies spiritual unction. Oil literally calms, soothes, molifies. It so far calms the waters that it can be made to control the waves of the stormiest sea, and is now often carried in vessels for that purpose. It also represents the healing power of calm thought. Trust always produces tranquillity. Whatever we love we desire. A person in the love of holiness earnestly desires to be holy. Love is made manifest in prayer, while oil typifies the wisdom which must accompany affection. In healing, love and wisdom must always be united as working counterparts. Some healers accomplish nearly all their work through wisdom only, with others success is nearly all due to love. Most people are greatly lacking in one or other of these equally necessary elements, which must be equally developed before healing can be perfectly demonstrated. Every prayer will be fulfilled if we support our sincere desire with firm expectancy. When we confidently and continuously expect our desires to be fulfilled, they will be. We often desire something quite strongly and yet fail to obtain it; the reason for this is that we do not expect to have our prayer answered, even while we try to hope that our petition will be granted. If we do not sustain our desires with expectancy they will not blossom in fruition. Prayer is planting, but ground must also be watered. Irrigate your desires constantly. God gives the increase only after the planting and watering has been done by us.

At prayer meetings the participants often give God a large amount of miscellaneous information, chiefly concerning the gossip of the place. Often, after prayers have been offered for the reform of a drunkard, the people who prayed would be greatly astonished if he reformed; they asked for his conversion without really expecting an answer. We sometimes ignorantly ask for things we would not know what to do with if we had them; therefore ought we not to pray that God's will may be done on earth, i.e., in all external states, as well as in the interiors of our affections (heavens). Asking God to will and do of His good pleasure in us, is asking Him to use us to do His will. Let our motive in prayer be, "Oh, God, use us this and every day, in thought, word, and deed, to lead others out of temptation into righteousness." Unscrupulous persons play upon others' weaknesses to lead their neighbours astray. Why do we not play upon susceptibilities so as to lift the weak ones up, instead of pushing them down, by expecting them to fall, which is a sure way to work their downfall? If your boy is subject to evil influence because of weakness, why do you not exert a powerful good influence over him, and thus direct his susceptibility aright? Why not put temptation to righteousness instead of to sin before him? Weak people are easily benefited by mental treatment, but they do not usually remain healed unless instructed. We often love our friends when we do not believe in them; therefore our affection weakens instead of strengthening them. Never think that anybody can be led into evil, but not into good. If you tell people disease is floating in the air, almost everybody will believe you, but comparatively few believe that good health is infectious. No one can pray the prayer of faith while believing in the power of any devil. We declare there is but one Omnipresent Energy filling the whole universe, and we declare this energy is GOOD. Overcome evil by denying error through a clear statement of the opposite truth, but you cannot destroy its influence by merely ignoring it. Denying it is to bravely meet it, face it, and declare it has no power. Until good flows in and puts out evil (erroneous belief), which is always due to ignorance, disorder will stay where it is and appear invincible. Let the warrior (your true self) fight in you! Let the fresh air in and the impure will go out. Let your light shine; let the breezes in. Why should anybody be short of breath when there is plenty of air for all to breathe freely? Timidity is the answer. Cowardice and deceit go together. Honesty and bravery go together. By positively affirming good, we deny away evil. Denial is only the reverse side of affirmation; it is counter-statement; it is only necessary to tell the truth and trust to it to slay falsehood.

People can believe as they please, but never allow yourselves to be bullied into believing or pretending to believe anything. Stand up for whatever you know to be the truth everywhere and on all occasions. When the time comes to make a positive statement, sow the seed of the right word in love and gentleness, but with all possible firmness. When we are truly individualised, unwelcome magnetism or undesired hypnotism can have no power whatever over us. By yielding to spiritual thought, you naturally unfold the secret spiritual power within yourself. This dominant power is God's will, expressed in our consciousness through the medium of our human WILL.

Jesus said, in effect, "I will that God's will be done in and through me." The Gospel says, "Everyone that asketh receiveth," and it is so with the unselfish acquisition of personal health. We cannot gain anything by depriving anybody else. The way to conquer all limitations is to realise your perfect oneness with all mankind. Man rightfully has dominion over all things. Prayer is only answered according to law. The Universe says, "When you know how to obtain any blessing you can freely enjoy it!" If you lack wisdom "ask of God, who giveth liberally and upbraideth not." We have to know precisely what we want before we can obtain it. Was there an earthly castle ever built that was not a castle in air first? You must hold steadily the thing you desire before your mental eye; you must map out a perfect plan in thought, and realising that Will is architect, while Intellect is builder, keep the design of whatever you desire to see actualised immovably before your mental vision, and then, through the law of attraction, you will call to you the means whereby this model will be rendered objective to sense. If a home is needed you will get the money to build it, in thoroughly legitimate, natural ways, after you have held steadily for some time to the right thought concerning it. If you steadily place yourself in thought in any situation, in due time you will be in that position literally. See what you want and hold firmly to the vision. Do whatever work offers itself to you as a means of livelihood till you get to where you would be. All will literally come right if you are unfaltering in your desire and expectation. Black stoves and wash windows, but keep the desired goal always in view and you will get to it. Anything that comes to you will take you a step nearer the goal, if you will regard the incident as an experience on your journey to the state you are determined to attain.

The life of prayer is the life of continual aspiration, coupled with unfaltering expectation of the desired result. Spiritual blessings you are sure to get; and "God will give more than we can ask or think." In meditating upon anything you desire to obtain, remember that the law of attraction works unfalteringly, but no positive results can be secured without fixity of purpose. The road to conquest over all difficulties is to meet doubt in mortal combat and lay it low with the sword of denial, remembering always that continued, positive affirmation of what you do want is the most effectual denial of whatever you wish to remove. "All things whatsoever you ask in prayer believing (confidently expecting) you will receive." In treating yourself or another, do not try to diagnose disease or discover causes of weakness, but see yourself or patient as the already happy possessor of every blessing. It is only by affirming and re-affirming, whenever doubts assail, that you can win the victory of faith. Revert constantly to first lesson to study and practise the sample formulas till you prove their power, as you certainly will if you are persistent.

LESSON III.

Faith: Its True Nature and Efficacy.

In the 11th chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, faith is defined in various excellent ways, and all distinguished characters of the Old Testament are said to have accomplished all they did through faith. It is surely needless to remind any one who has studied the gospels that the importance of faith is the keynote of all the teaching of Jesus; howbeit he teaches that faith without expression is dead, and on this point James agrees with Jesus unmistakably. Faith is, first, FIDELITY; second, TRUST; third, SPIRITUAL VISION. Fidelity begets trust, and trust begets seership or prophecy. Faith in its advanced stage is the beholding of things unseen by the bodily eye, and also uncomprehended by the intellect. It is soul-sight, and being such it cannot be cultivated except by walking in the way of the spirit, and not according to the desires of the flesh. Healing through faith is threefold. In the first place it is the result of perfect fidelity to inward conviction, and this means moral and mental independence, which results in freedom from the influence of fear, race belief, and the mistaken opinions of one's neighbours. Freedom is essential to health. Contagion is nothing but an effect of servility; if we never cringed to prevailing misbeliefs and fears we should be absolutely proof against contagion.

Race belief affects the child in the womb through the mother, therefore it behooves every teacher of tokology to carefully instruct the future mothers of the race in regard to the influence of their thoughts upon unborn offspring. Children before birth, and to a large extent during the lacteal period also, are influenced unconsciously through the mother; it is only when they begin to reason for themselves that their own thoughts affect them to any great degree. A young child is not responsible because conscious thought has not yet asserted itself, and without conscious thought and reasoning there can be no faith. Even belief, which is much less than true faith, is a result of reasoning to some extent, for we can refuse to believe or choose to believe what we are told. Even strong evidence can be rejected as well as accepted. "I will believe," is a logical statement of determination to arrive at a certain conclusion, but such an attitude is usually unwise, as it generally results from blind intoxication consequent upon absorbing the thoughts of others. Voluntary acceptance or rejection of an idea implies discrimination, and this faculty is universal, and proves itself the constructive agent everywhere. We cannot expect anyone to build intelligently without correct knowledge of the elements he employs, therefore be ever ready to give a valid reason for the convictions you entertain. By faith we hold on to things with invincible tenacity, as when a person says of a friend, I will trust him no matter how appearances go against him. Having intellectually accepted the propositions stated in the first lesson, the student will often encounter doubts, which must be met and argued down, and there is no real victory where there has been no struggle. All growth is accomplished through effort solely. Do not fear to face a doubt, for only the torpid or mentally blind are free from doubt; in their earlier stages of mental progress all thinkers are sceptics, but doubt can and must be mastered; it is only a shadow, and pertains exclusively to ignorance.

Faith in God is confidence in universal good. Trust in good supremely; place implicit reliance on truth, and thereby demonstrate the nothingness of error, which is but shadow. Moral sense differs in degree in different persons, only because some are more fully developed than others. Savages have no such ethical conceptions as ourselves, because they are not morally evolved as far as we are. There is no sin, and there are no sinners from the standpoint of absolute truth, but the fruits on the tree of life are in various stages of ripeness. Never condemn yourself or anybody, for condemnation savours of weakness, and invariably tends to beget or increase whatever it recognises. Luther was right at the core when he taught justification by faith, and Calvin also, when he proclaimed the "perseverance of saints." "God is able to keep us from falling," and "We are justified by faith," are true and important sentences. The view of faith we are endeavouring to present is that we must TRUST IMPLICITLY IN GOOD; place unswerving confidence in right. In case of perplexity, it is always well to retire into complete privacy and affirm, "I desire only to know and do RIGHT, and I affirm that whatever is right is invincible." You may be in a fog, and wonder how to decide a question that compels a speedy answer; you may be perplexed at apparent injustice and feel crushed under it. Go into the silent chamber and RISE ABOVE IT, and this can only be done by placing unwavering trust in good. "Faith grasps the blessings she desires." "Faith is the gift of God," but it is free to all who seek it. There is a well-spring of power in every soul; when this is recognised it is ours to use, but until we acknowledge it, it is only ours potentially. To actualise, manifest, and utilise it, we must go down into deepest consciousness, and there find our true life, which is divine. Jesus taught this to the woman of Samaria, and it is the special truth above all others indispensable for us to lay hold upon in the work of healing. Treasures have just as much intrinsic value while buried as after they are unearthed, but we cannot find what remains hidden in the ground. So it is with our spiritual life: we are all alike children of God, but most of us do not know it. We possess the capacity to manifest unlimited power, but lay claim to weakness; boundless knowledge is within our grasp, but we claim ignorance: and with what result? We act out these false estimates of ourselves and appear as mental and moral pigmies when we might show forth as giants. Self-depreciation is as harmful as it is to depreciate the worth of others. We are all members of one family, in which a word spoken against one reflects dishonour on all. Never allow yourself to think badly of yourself, for if you encourage pessimism in thought you will surely act it out in deed, and you cannot help others unless you are strong in yourself. Renunciation of anything but error is utterly wrong and foolish. Self-culture is the only practical stepping-stone to real usefulness. Health, happiness, strength, and knowledge constitute our real birthright, and we must not barter it. False belief asserts itself in spurious philosophy and specious sophistry, such as vaunted willingness to be annihilated for the good of others; but how much good could you do to anyone if you ceased to exist? Service is possible to you because you live; therefore the true altruist affirms and enjoys conscious individual immortality; he revels in the might of his strength and in the depth of his knowledge: he glories in his divine beauty as he sees in selfhood found in God (not lost) a means of perpetually adding to the joy and beauty of the universe of conscious life, of which he is part. If you will study the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, and trace out the workings of lively faith in the lives of all the characters enumerated by the author, you will see plainly that faith to his mind was vital recognition of saving truth and conscious realisation of infinite power (love). All results are, and ever must be, according to unchanging law; a so-called miracle is only a mighty work accomplished through the agency of law, never against or without it. Humanity is incarnate law. Law works through animals without their conscious co-operation, thus they are endowed with instinct, which is unreasoning obedience. Obedience to intuition is conscious co-operation with law spiritually and instantly perceived. This is above reason, while instinct is below reason, as the term is commonly employed. The spiritual realm is everywhere; we are already immortal; every faculty we can develop in eternity is now germinally ours, but the seed must sprout, and we must furnish conditions necessary for growth. Lay hold with all the force of your affection or will upon the great essential truth of Being—Good is All. When we entirely cease from attributing power to error, it dissolves and soon disappears, for it is indeed nothing when viewed from the standpoint of reality. This declaration of truth is thereby scientific, and is practically confirmed in every department of scientific research. To make this plain to the students of the doctrine of evolution, we call attention to the atomic theory accepted as a working hypothesis almost universally. Atoms are indestructible; they change their places, but not one ever perishes; when harmoniously grouped they form perfect organisms, but when misplaced they constitute disorderly forms. Order being necessary to harmony, and man being a builder or organiser, it becomes necessary for him to learn the law of order, so as to secure harmony, and this the true self knows, but the lower self needs instruction. The real ego never changes, it neither advances nor retrogrades, but it continually manifests itself more and more perfectly. Outward existence is expression, and we learn to express perfectly only through repeated experiment. The divine soul knows everything, and the intellect must be its willing pupil. The highest knowledge comes through seership, which is far beyond ordinary mediumship, as illumination far exceeds inspiration. When we know truth, belief is unnecessary, for belief at best is only twilight, while knowledge is broad daylight.

Perfect fidelity to conviction releases us from all false dependence one upon another, and as we cease to be unduly connected with the psychic and personal spheres of our neighbours we cease to reflect or participate in their adverse conditions. One of the most perplexing doctrines taught by those who do not fully comprehend the actual workings of the law of attraction in its universal operation is, that as all sickness is due to sin (transgression of law), therefore every invalid must be a great sinner. This imputation is false, and unkind in many instances, as it leads many times to the cruel inference that malice rather than weakness is the chief source of suffering. Violent inflammatory disorders are frequently brought about by rage; but yielding people, who are altogether too submissive to others, are frequently afflicted by reason of their too negative attitude. Faith is strong, courageous, positive; and for this reason, if for no other, the faithful are far healthier than the faithless. "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin" evidently means that when we act against or apart from convictions we act out of accord with the law of harmony. Prevailing weaknesses in society are due to general lack of individuality. When La Grippe, or Russian Influenza, attacks a few, a multitude soon fall victims on account of being "Mrs. Grundy's" satellites. In our general customs we imitate and follow, while to be healthy and vigorous we must originate and lead. Faith in God is supreme confidence in GOOD, no matter what special conception of Deity one may entertain. Reverence for right is the beginning of wisdom; this is called "fear of the Lord" in the Bible. In the old sense of the word fear means reverence, not dread or terror. Belief is untrustworthy and its effects invariably uncertain, for if we only believe what is true and do not know it as truth, we may at any time come to disbelieve it. Never confound faith with belief; this one mistake has deluged the earth with blood in many times of persecution for mere opinion's sake. Infidelity is breach of trust, betrayal of friends, breaking of vows, etc. Infidel is a term of reproach, and should never be applied to an honest person. Independence in thought, word, and deed is the only passport to health. Children must never be scolded or frightened, nor have we any right to expect blind obedience from them. Education is a natural process of unfolding the human faculty of judgment, and unless we acknowledge the talent lying latent and seek to call it into expression, we shall never train but abnormally force the young. The "rod of correction" is a staff to rest upon, not a scourge to afflict with. Perfect sincerity in thought and conduct is essential to health. There must be no simulation; never pretend to endorse what you disagree with. Cowardice is disloyalty to truth; multitudes pay heavy penalties for hypocrisy. We can account for "faith cure" rationally as follows: In an atmosphere of trust, sensitive people become trustful, and as their trust in God is awakened they become negative to divine thought and positive against its opposite. If their faith is but temporarily aroused by the earnest appeal of a preacher or mental healer, they backslide and have relapses, but if they have personally laid hold upon the principle of truth, they remain converted and go on to sanctification. Blind faith is not adequate to insure permanent results; faith with its eyes open is alone reliable. "Add to your faith knowledge." Make acts of faith continually, especially when you feel oppressed with surrounding fears or depressed by the false beliefs of others. Deny vigorously the power of any error to affect you or your patient. Deny away weakness by resolutely affirming strength. Affirm with determination to realise what you proclaim—I have perfect faith in God. Good is all, therefore there can be no real evil. I affirm truth to be the only power, therefore there is no power in error. I will trust in supreme goodness, and nothing can shake my confidence.

I am subject to divine law only and always. In giving treatment to another, remember that you are acknowledging universal truth for him. The life principle can be temporarily aroused in you by another's appeal to it in your behalf, but it must never be forgotten that your permanent regeneration is impossible until your individual consciousness lays hold upon truth and translates it by active conscious thought into permanent expression. Our bodies are solidified thought, therefore every radical change in our thinking must effect a decided transformation in them. We must constantly hold in thought the full expression of what our spiritual perception realises as our ideal. An ideal constantly held before the intellect enables the intellect to gradually externalise this ideal in objective bodily form; but only as we constantly hold before our mental vision our highest ideal can we accomplish its perfect actualisation. All physiologists teach that the body is in a state of perpetual flux, and it is impossible for us to transform our bodies except in accordance with the steady, regular working of the law of attraction. But though physiology tells us of constant changes in our physique, it does not explain the law of attraction sufficiently; this further explanation it is the province of mental science to supply. Faith enables us to draw to us whatever we actively trust in. Confide in God; acknowledge the omnipotence of goodness, and no thought can embody itself in your frame which does not correspond to your ideal of goodness. Faith is an invincible magnet and attracts to itself whatsoever it fervently and persistently desires. Owing to lack of faith our strongest wishes are often unfulfilled; it behoves us, therefore, if we seek success in our endeavours to work with all our might to cultivate genuine SAVING FAITH, which is now coming to be understood as not even a distant relative of blind belief reposed in other people's say-so.

LESSON IV.

CHEMICALISATION OR CRISIS.

DEATH OF ERROR AND BIRTH OF THE NEW LIFE IN MAN.

AFTER carefully digesting the preceding lesson, the student may with profit read and study the epistle to the Romans. The word chemicalisation is found in much Christian Science literature; it is dwelt upon at length in that excellent manual, "Christian Science Healing," by Frances Lord, but he have never seen the true suggestiveness of the word worked out in the sense in which we understand it. Mrs. Eddy, who introduced the term, uses the illustration in "Science and Health" of two chemicals uniting to form a third element, which is practically a new creation, the result of two differing, but no antagonising existences blending to produce an ampler and worthier substance than either one of them. Chemicalisation is, therefore, the marriage of elements, and must be so understood to be rightly comprehended. Spiritual Science bases all its conclusions on its fundamental declaration—All is good; there is no evil; but unlike some metaphysical systems, it does not ignore or repudiate the external universe or the personal man, but accounts for both and explains their origin, use, and destiny. Spirit itself is altogether pure and beautiful, incapable of sin, sickness, or death. The real spiritual self of man is divine, the true ego is imperishable; its individual immortality consists in its being a distinct thought in the one Universal Mind, outside of which there can be nothing, as the One Mind is infinite. Man has not always thought about himself, thus he has not always had a self-conscious existence. Existence is distinct from being, for it is a showing forth of being. "I think therefore I am," might be altered to "I think, therefore, I am conscious that I am." There is no unconscious mind, but the human intellect of which the visible body, whether psychical or physical, is the manifest expression, is acted upon until it acts for itself. Unconscious growth does not imply unconscious spirit, but intellect seems unconscious if not yet awakened to a realising sense of itself as the child and servant of the spirit. To prevent confusion in the student's mind, it is necessary to affirm and reaffirm constantly, that though the essential man is spiritually perfect, the man of expression is continually advancing toward perfection. Perfection pertains to spirit in its true and pure essence only; perfectibility is the distinguishing attribute of the intellect.

The story of Pygmalion and Galatea may serve as an illustration. A sculptor fashions a statue and endows it with his own life; it has thus become a living, breathing thing, with seemingly an independent consciousness and will, yet its life is derived from its former's life. God alone is the infinite life and giver of life; from Him alone can we derive our Life, which flows into our interiors by unceasing influx; but when this life has been received by man, man sets to work to express this life by fashioning an outward form, and this form is the body of intelligence or human mind, of which the mortal body is the final ultimation. Seek to realise yourselves as divine in your inmost nature, as containing every capability of strength and beauty, only waiting to be recognised, to be shown forth in perfect bodily expression. Never confound the latent spiritual perfection of man with his ever-increasing recognition and manifestation of this perfection. "Be ye perfect," is a command based upon understanding of human capability.

The essential will is always to do right, for all sentient creatures seek health, happiness, and harmony; not one among the countless multitudes who people this planet would say, "I love disease and sorrow and prefer them to health and happiness." All sin is a result of ignorance, "they know not what they do." For thousands of years the human intellect has been striving to find the way to accomplish the desires of the soul. The love of good is universal; nobody loves evil, but countless are the mistakes made by the pursuers of happiness. All know in one sense what they want; all are agreed in the search for joy, but how to reach the goal is the disputed question. It is imperatively necessary that in treating yourself or another you should pay just tribute to the goodness and sanctity of universal human will, for if you blunder at this stage in thought you loose your footing and have no solid rock beneath your statements; nor can you speak sincere words of power and assurance, if you fail to realise what you are appealing from and appealing to. Say, for example, that a person applies to you for relief from chronic nervousness, rheumatism, or any other fixed ailment which he desires to be rid of. You recognise two conditions at once; the one real, the other superficial. The desire to express health, strength, and symmetry is natural and normal, and should therefore be respected and sympathised with; the wise healer necessarily sympathises with the patient against the disease, and what is an ailment but a picturing out of error, an intellectual mistake or weakness rendered objective in body, which is a product and statement of intellect. Now here is the occasion for conflict; desire to be well pulls one way, false belief or mistaken opinion pulls the other.

Chemicalisation is the crisis reached when one is compelled to decide or make a choice between two possible courses of action, and upon the wisdom or folly of the choice depends recovery or an increase of malady. Healers must be inwardly married themselves before they can explain true marriage to their patients and assist them to consummate it. "The lion and the lamb must lie down together" and be led by the divine child, or there can be no golden age for the patient in his mental or physical economy. The wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove must be blended, or there will be power alone or gentleness alone; wisdom alone or love alone, and the two must become one in the consciousness of the healer before he is entitled to this appellation. Healing is harmonising, but transformation and transmutation must precede the demonstration of harmony. Now the healer knows more than the patient because of his larger experience with reference to the subject with which he undertakes to deal. Mere acquaintance with external facts is not vital knowledge of truth, therefore D.D.'s, M.D.'s, and many other titled classes of people are as sickly and weakly as the most illiterate peasants, and frequently far less healthy, virtuous, and happy than the unschooled persons who do their manual drudgery. Those who pursue any science or art do so in pursuit of happiness; the truest altruist seeks the welfare of the race, and finds his keenest joy in serving others; but he is the greatest seeker after happiness among us, for he desires the largest amount of good for the largest number. The intellectual tussle with old beliefs and opinions is not on the score of what is primarily or ultimately demanded, but as to the true method of obtaining blessings. Sacrifice always signifies exchange, giving up one thing for another; but till wisdom is displayed in choice there is no benefit derived from choosing beyond the experience gained through a palpable demonstration of error as the contradictory of truth. All experience is valuable because the effort put forward in acquiring it results in positive gain and growth. No matter how mistakenly one may have laboured, all effort develops mental muscle and this development remains though the phantom pursued be proved an illusion. Never treat physical conditions; they are simply effects and cannot be dispensed with while their causes remain unmoved. Deal with all visible states as appearances on the surface betokening false belief or wrong opinion entertained in the realm of thought. To destroy error, it is necessary to supplant it; it will never leave of its own accord; it must be driven forth, and this process is the real casting out of devils. We are told in the Gospels that Jesus and His apostles cast out blind, deaf, dumb, lame, and insane demons. Many people to-day lay great stress on these narratives as favouring a theory of obsession, which is that all who are seriously afflicted are under the malign influence of unscrupulous spirits. Such a view of the case would be very depressing if the antidote to "obsession" were unknown; but spiritual science teaches us exactly how to act in all such cases, viz., to treat the sufferer to understand that only through the law of attraction is it possible for any influence to approach, much less to dominate, anybody. Now this law of attraction must be understood in its manifold bearings before we can account for the sufferings of "saints" as well as "sinners." We attract whatever we expect, whether we desire it or not, and as fear plays a very large part in expectancy, it is easy to see how "good" people suffer as well as "bad." Weakness of will and mistaken judgment will account for every ailment on earth. Animals suffer through fear and anger, and the animal man is subject to these emotions and suffers likewise. Many negative hyper-sensitive people are considered very spiritual because they are delicate and refined in organism and take delight in the æsthetic side of religion, but no one can be truly well who is not positively spiritual; it is between positive and negative spirituality that a very distinct line needs to be drawn. A graceful, timid woman is often married to a coarse, imperious man who holds her in subjection to his masterful desires; not knowing the hidden potency of her own spirit, she fears him and yields unwillingly, and it may be unconsciously to his thought, which would never attract her except through the fascination which power always holds over weakness. Such a woman is psychologised by the simple fact that her husband knows his power far better than she knows hers; he claims strength and exercises it, she confesses to fear and weakness and yields in unequal combat. It is for the healer to arouse the dormant energies of this slumbering woman, and get her to see that weakness of will is the cause of her distress. When first appealed to, she will doubtless declare that she dare not awaken her husband's wrath by asserting her own individuality; she will whine over the prospect of a domestic rupture and talk nonsense about "keeping peace" when peace is the very thing she stands in need of and of which she has none at all. Stagnation is not peace, it is death; and surely slavery is not the ideal of those who love peace and pursue it.

True and false peace are vividly contrasted in the sayings of Jesus. False, stagnant, misnamed peace is to be slain with the sword of truth, which divides asunder and severs the parasite from the plant at any cost of temporary upheaval. True peace makes its abode in the temple after all dishonest traders have been cast out; but until the purging is effected, mortification is often misnamed peace. No compromise with error must be our battle-cry. Better separation than death, and though we claim that it is the province of truth to unite all its disciples, still we must not be astonished or dismayed if errors sometimes fight vigorously and die hard. A serpent wounded at daybreak does not die till sunset; the most luxuriant expression of vegetation often occurs at the very moment before the plant expires. So we must not be terrified or disheartened if we find our seeming conditions growing worse, while, in reality, an important and even rapid forward move is being made. False belief says, speaking through the married woman, "it is my duty to obey my husband," or if she be not bound by that belief, a graver error presents itself and says, "I dare not disobey him." Every human being has a right to his or her true and entire individual expression, and under no circumstances is it any more lawful to allow yourself to be imposed upon than it is to impose on others. If we allow a wrong to be done to us, we patronise injustice by tame submission. To stand for right is never to tyrannise, but tyranny being wrong, the weak-willed slave is the servant of error in common with the lawless tyrant. Principle must be carried out in all things, great and small; nothing is too ordinary to exhibit it, and when we acknowledge our allegiance to universal right in all things we shall break all our bonds and become complete conquerors over fate. Patients ought not to be driven;

they must be led; but on no account should a professing healer portray weakness, fear, or indecision in speaking out plainly whatever he feels may be of assistance to a patient. Silent and even absent treatment may be all-sufficing in most instances; but in cases where treatments are given absently, it is very desirable for the healer and patient to correspond frequently by letter, that advice may be given pointedly with reference to special difficulties. The attitude one must take in healing is a very strong and yet a thoroughly charitable one. There must be no harsh judgment or unkind censure, no imputing of unworthy motives. The golden rule must be adhered to in thought, word, and deed perpetually. On the other hand, weak concessions to error will weaken the hold over it the healer might otherwise demonstrate, as concessions encourage the continuance of false beliefs and habits through failure to point out their fallacy. Mistakes must be clearly shown up as such, though in the kindest temper. If a person tells you Boston is in Texas, when you know it is in Massachusetts, you do not call your misinformant a deliberate falsifier, but you do emphatically contradict his statement. If you know from actual experience that the last train between New York and Boston leaves at midnight and someone assures you it leaves at 1 or 2 a.m., you do not think for a moment that a wilful lie is told; still you do not permit yourself to be misled, and for the sake of others who might be inconvenienced through believing an incorrect statement to be correct, you plainly assert your knowledge of the hour. All chronic ailments are exhibitions of fixed errors, and these show forth in all sorts of false practices, which must not be encouraged, but decidedly laid aside once and forever.

It is a noteworthy fact that chronic invalids are ridiculously rigid in their observance of all sorts of foolish ceremonies. To cater to their depraved appetites is cruel, though it appears kind, for all these inflexible customs are palpable signs of bondage, and whenever a ceremony is performed it fastens the idea back of it upon the mind of the ceremonialist. It is necessary in treating to assail prejudices, not violently as though you recognised them as powerful entities to be attacked, but through a clear and direct presentation of the true course of action to which such prejudices are opposed. Now it cannot be desirable to court air and sunshine and to take exercise freely, and at the same time be permissible to shut one's self up in a dungeon. Never be afraid of proclaiming in thought, word, and deed the necessity for perfect liberty; then if in the statement of the law of health, which is the science of true living, you antagonise old misconceptions, and through this revulsion of feeling the patient becomes excited—look upon the whole matter as a phase of house-cleaning and rejoice to see the removal of all that is opposed to cleanliness and order.

Until the intellect has been educated to follow the will, and to comprehend the law of supply and demand, there will doubtless be a strenuous battle between genuine truth and error mistaken for truth. If any violent opposing symptoms appear, regard them as encouraging tokens. Beliefs long cherished have related their entertainers to similar beliefs in others wherever such may exist; thus through psychic affinity most invalids are in relation with many undesirable states and conditions. To break these chains is the work which needs to be done; not to do it, is to fail to heal. Persons of loving dispositions and with strong convictions coupled with decided mentality are the most effective healers and do their work most speedily. No specified time is required to complete a cure.

Seven treatments are usually given in succession, but sometimes two or three do all that is needed. Several courses are required in obstinate cases. Some patients experience nothing whatever of chemicalisation, for they are ready to embrace truth as soon as it is presented to them, and those having no inflexible hold on error let go easily and gladly of whatever has been holding them. Hypnotism is totally distinct from spiritual treatment; a true healer never practices or endorses the claim that one will should dominate another. In cases where insane people are difficult to hypnotise, the hypnotist encounters more than his equal, for insanity is often the result of bondage to others, and confusion to the point of irrationality often results from such slavery. Spiritual healing is accomplished through speaking directly to the patient's real self and causing it to respond intelligently when appealed to. Do not look for a trying crisis, but if one appears be prepared to see in it nothing but falsehood driven out through the powerful agency of admitted truth. Hypnotism signifies the philosophy, art, or science of inducing sleep, if its derivation from the Greek hypnos is considered. Spiritual healing acts on the principle embodied in the words, "Awake thou that sleepest"; still it leads to the enjoyment of as much sleep as will prove beneficial in all cases.

LESSON V.

Divine and Human Will: Their Essential Agreement.

There is no greater mistake than to suppose that we must surrender our will in order to come out of darkness into light. On the contrary it is only through will that any progress whatever can be made in any desirable direction, as all growth is through desire, and desire is but the expression of will. Will is first and last our divine inheritance. Now, whence comes the belief so widely prevalent, that man's will is always in opposition to God, and must therefore be crushed down or rooted out? It is a lingering relic of barbarism, a figment of gross, enslaving superstition, born in an age of tyranny when a few men were supposed to be in rightful authority over all others, even to the extent of putting others to death if they so decreed. The human will, when it first appears before us in a state of savagery, seems a totally selfish thing, each individual seeming to have concern only for his personal maintenance; but, as civilisation dawns, this undeveloped aspect and crude behaviour of will vanishes, each man is found to desire his neighbour's welfare as much as his own. "Love your neighbour as yourself" is the foundation of all true civilisation, but the words of Jesus, "Love one another as I have loved you," is a far higher command, as it means be ready at any seeming cost or sacrifice to devote yourself to your neighbour's weal, and call every human being neighbour. Love is the only source of will. The student must accustom himself thoroughly to this idea, and then he will see that all the good things said about good will (benevolence) are pronounced concerning love expressed in action.

Now, just as there is a limited personal manifestation of will, which seems tyrannical and obstinate, so is there a dwarfed and dwarfing expression of love, the tendency of which is narrowing and belittling, and it is to the larger growth and wider scope of love that we must look for every phase of reformation and regeneration. The real crisis a patient has to undergo is quite frequently, in his own consciousness, a struggle between a smaller and a larger love—the love of self only and the love of a great many neighbours; the desire to gratify one's own caprices and the prompting of the true ego to sink self in work for humanity. It is just here that the real conflict comes, and at this point we need to be particularly clear in our definitions and distinctions, for during a crisis we are between two rocks and must steer boldly, but very evenly, or we shall strike against one or the other. We always say, gratify desire, do not depress it; but we must not forget that during a stage of transition, when one state of consciousness is dying or being transmuted, and another is being born, we feel two sets of desires within us. The primitive man has only one set of desires, viz., animal appetites; these he fully gratifies, and lives, in consequence, a life appropriate to the animal-man he is; but as the moral sense awakens, there comes a growing sensitiveness to higher desires, and it is necessary for man if he wishes to rise higher than he has yet risen in the scale of conscious growth, to cultivate those higher desires which are beginning to stir within him. Mortification of the flesh is a mistake, because the thought of the one who mortifies it is centred upon it, and thoughts about the flesh profit nothing when the spiritual man is awakening into consciousness. No directions as to material diet will help a student or patient at this point; no advice regarding bodily exercise or bathing will avail anything, because the step to be taken now is on and out into a realisation of the true ego, which is the man himself always latent, but hitherto undeclared. All nations have pictured scenes of temptation and always made them take place in gardens, as a garden is a spot where many varieties of vegetation are within reach, and the gift of choice must now be exercised to select those most adapted to man's expanding consciousness. As long as desires are simply automatic and can be gratified through unreasoning instinct, they give no trouble and cause no perplexity; they are regulated by nature and all goes well, as all things serve the purposes for which they are evidently intended; but when the opportunity presents itself to select one of two or more courses, when it becomes possible either to master desire on the lower plane and manifest power in consequence of such mastery, in a higher direction, or else go on living like an animal but troubled incessantly with an inward yearning to be more than an animal—at this juncture man feels two opposing wills within him, or as though God's will and man's were diametrically opposed in nature. Now we must revert in all hours of perplexity to our first foundation, ALL IS GOOD, then proceed to deal with the problem that assails us from this standpoint. The lower desire is good in its place, but it has only a limited sphere of use and only a limited time to endure; the law of the survival of the fittest must move it away when its successor is ready to appear. John the Baptist must always retire at the coming of the Christ. The hardest struggle for many persons is to snap their bonds and pronounce themselves free from old associations when they feel capable of higher attainments. We are all to some extent creatures of habit, led by custom, and not knowing by any means enough concerning the psychology of the stupid fashions we think we are following of our own accord, when we are blindly led by others. An irritated person is always fretting against restraint, but does not usually know what it is that restrains him. Children and adults often cry and feel wretched at something which is a profound mystery to them, and then grow exacting and disagreeable to their best friends, and seek to domineer over the liberties of their companions. These symptoms are signs of hypnotic influence, consciously or unconsciously exerted by present or absent, visible or invisible operators. All violent phases of insanity, epilepsy, and hosts of kindred disturbances are due to the dominion of one will over another, or of several wills over one, and as these cases are frequently brought to mental scientists—and they can never be cured except through an understanding of the rightful province and freedom of the will—we deem the understanding of this topic to be of vital moment to everybody, and positively indispensable to healers. In treating a case of "obsession," which may be only a result of repressed or thwarted will (it is often due to the tyrannical influence of some extraneous unknown will), hold firmly to the statement that all will is divinely free, and that no one can effectually tamper with individual sovereignty. All attempts at forcible "exorcism" are mistakes, as it is not by violently thrusting aside any outside influence, but by strengthening the patient's own self-will and self-reliance, that you establish conditions conducive to permanent equilibrium. In training a child never forget that the self-will, so much and so wrongly opposed by ignorant and tyrannical parents and guardians, is the child's true divinity reaching out for expression, and though desire may be trained and educated as to its methods of fulfilment—or rather the dawning intelligence of the conscious intellect may be thus tutored—all desire is essentially perfect, for nothing but good is really desired at heart by anyone, no matter how mistaken may be the means employed to secure the object of some desire. We all desire strength, happiness, prosperity, and beauty; in a word, we all desire perfect health. Let us dismiss for ever the ridiculous assumption that it may be God's will that we should be infirm and miserable, and also the equally absurd fancy that it may help others for us to remain wretched. Away with such arrant folly; the good of each is the good of all, and this is distinctly proven in numberless instances of every-day occurrence. Wisdom, health, joy, or any blessing possessed by one member of a community is so much real wealth added to everybody's store, while the depletion or injury of one is a detriment to the progress of all. Never tolerate the falsehood that anything contrary to your own best welfare can honour God or serve mankind. Having argued yourself or your patient out of the delusion that God sends us sickness, poverty, and a host of other miserable negations, affirm your right to every good thing and fortify the position taken by Scripture texts and everything else bearing on the subject which increases your confidence in the certainty that divine will makes for good universally; then declare your will to be one with divine will: thus can you shake yourself free of the bondage of fear, which holds so many to the belief that their wills may be antagonistic to God's.

Man desires good only, but errs through ignorance in his endeavour to fulfil his desires. Be alone for a while wherever you can feel most retired, whenever you are in perplexity, and while in solitude make use of some formula like the following: MY WILL IS FOR GOOD ONLY; I claim all the good I can possibly use; I claim I am entitled to all knowledge requisite to enable me to carry my good desires into effect, and I will henceforth trust perfectly and implicitly that the way will be shown me for carrying out all my good desires. While it is the province and just prerogative of every soul to claim perfect freedom for itself, no soul has any right to dominate another soul, therefore in your exercise of free will, never forget that all human wills are as sacred as your own. Why many people fail to accomplish their ends is because they intrude upon the sanctity of other people's rights, and thus produce a conflict which can never result from calm reliance upon the strength of will to accomplish rightful purposes. In our present state of partial enlightenment, we do not as a rule know enough to enter into details and methods for accomplishing our desires, therefore, we should leave the question of method open. You desire health, but do not know by what outward means it can be most readily secured; keep on claiming health as your birthright; go on affirming, I will manifest health and nothing can prevent my manifesting it. Refuse to tolerate discouraging thoughts, and in the face of all opposition persist in holding your ground. I WILL EXPRESS HEALTH. But as you do not know what external course is best for you to pursue, do not dictate or strive to bring about particular outward conditions. You properly desire to work wherever there is the largest field for usefulness, but you may not know where that field is. Affirm persistently, I shall find my true field and mode of action, nothing and no one can come between me and my life-work. Confidently expect to find your sphere and to fulfil your mission, but do not single out in thought any special country or city, or even mentally select an employment, though you may rest assured that wherever there is a special talent, its possessor's life-work requires its exercise. With regard to financial matters, do not claim or expect a certain amount of money, but vigorously hold to the conviction that you will receive all that it is desirable for you to possess. Never expect to reach anything through a miracle, only through the way of healthful normal work. Claim happiness, health, beauty, prosperity, and usefulness ALWAYS; then with the understanding that your root desire or true will goes no further than this, hold yourself completely passive to such guidance as you may receive as to the best methods for externalising your desires. Never make concessions from fear, not even from fear of wounding people's feelings, for loyalty to principle demands the doing away of all sycophancy and servility. A malady like la grippe is in the air and very fashionable; all Mrs. Grundy's satellites take it one from the other. Such infection will continue unavoidable so long as eating, dressing, and everything else is patterned after some stereotyped model. Insist on having your own way in all personal matters; but there stop, remembering that every human being has an equal right to liberty with yourself. A costume which beautifully becomes one person looks hideous on another; certain food which is delicious to one palate is repulsive to another. Mental scientists give no absolute dietary directions; but we say to all, consult and follow the unbiased promptings of your natural appetites, and you will select with wise discrimination precisely those things best adapted to your needs. Sunlight, air, and exercise are as natural as food and water to all healthy creatures, and nothing but false belief, prejudice, or fear ever protests against or banishes them.

WILL is the most courageous thing in the universe; it knows absolutely no fear, it is the very soul of dauntless energy. To be willful is as divine as to be faithful; to seek to break a will is to attempt to reduce a person to the level of a drivelling idiot. Persons with crushed or broken wills are fit for nothing. Selfhood is divine; there is nothing virtuous in fear and cringing. Devils are said to tremble, while angels know nothing of fear, for in angelic societies perfect love renders fear impossible. There is no such thing as crushing a human will for the glory of God. Will is a talent to be improved, the complete consecration of will demands its fullest exercise, never its emasculation. Glorify human will as God's best gift to man; say to yourself over and over, "My will is God's voice in me; my will is all pure and upright, for I desire good only, and I cannot desire anything besides." As you regard your will as a mirror in which God's will is reflected, all contention will cease, and there will soon come into your life a perfect calm. Know that you desire only what is good, and persistently honour your desire (and health in the fullest sense is the best for all) and you will certainly secure the prize, as you hold to the identity of your will with divine will. God and one always constitute an invincible majority.

LESSON VI.

THE CREATIVE WORK OF THOUGHT: OUR THOUGHTS BUILD OUR BODIES.

THAT every building has an architect is universally admitted; no structure is erected by chance; no edifice is reared except in accord with a predetermined design. Throughout the realm of nature all forms are constructed to serve definite uses; therefore, as soon as the use for anything ceases, a form becomes extinct. This being the unmistakable order in evolution, we observe no departures from it in any field of scientific investigation. Science disproves rather than proves a limited personal God, but it demonstrates with ever-increasing clearness the incessant operation of infinite Spirit as the supreme power directing all things. Every thinker testifies to unvarying law, and denies the foolish claims of chance. Luck, fortune, and similar ignorant words have no meaning for the scientist; therefore let us not employ them. In these lessons we are endeavouring to prove to the student that every human will is free to act exactly in proportion to its knowledge of immutable order; consequently we insist that will and intelligence are like two horses required to draw a chariot. If these steeds invariably pull together, the carriage is conducted safely along the road to the desired destination—health and happiness; if, on the contrary, one horse pulls in one direction and the other horse in the opposite, there cannot fail to be trouble; and this we call disease or discord, the reverse of peace and harmony. The student must never for a moment lose sight of the truth that all will is essentially divine; there is no such thing in the whole universe as a human will discording at root with divine will. All will is in essence one, and the one is All-Good. Now, if anyone doubts this statement because of its flagrant opposition to prevailing fallacies mistaken for truth, let him examine his own desires and question everybody he meets as to theirs, and see if he can find a solitary instance where desire is not fundamentally reasonable. We have yet to find the man, woman, child, or animal who prefers misery to joy or sickness to health; every desire expressed is for happiness and health, while constant and numberless complaints are made against illness and misery. When treatment is given to self or another, healer and patient must stand shoulder to shoulder on the score of desire; there must not be the faintest twinge of suspicion on the healer's part that he is acting against the will of the patient, nor must the patient tolerate the thought that the healer is treating him against or even without the consent of his own will. Having cleared the coast by denying all libels brought against the will, and having established ourselves in a firm, common-sense position, we proceed to work. A typical patient feels and looks very miserable; her body is emaciated and her expression dejected; physicians have told her she cannot possibly get well, and her lungs and other important organs have nearly all wasted away; she must therefore make her last will and testament and prepare to depart to another state of existence. In her extremity a vigorous mental scientist calls to see her, and, totally unlike her family and acquaintances, says, "You have no need to die unless you wish to," and then proceeds to relate experience after experience, adding testimony to testimony, all to the effect that over and over again persons have been raised from the very borders of the grave by the simple assertion of their will to recover, coupled with the firm expectation of seeing their desires actually fulfilled. A dialogue something like the following is apt to ensue if the invalid is an orthodox religious woman, and shares the common false beliefs concerning God and the government of the universe. She soon begins to question the piety of her new friends' position, and her first objection is stated thus: "But if God has sent me this sickness to bear, and He may be employing it as a means to call me home to Himself, ought I not to bear it patiently and accept my lot with resignation? If I cannot (wretched worm that I am) feel at present thankful for this affliction"—the remainder of the speech is choked with tears and coughing, but the mental scientist hears enough of the almost inarticulate murmurings to detect the words, "very, very hard to be obliged to leave my poor, dear children. Who will take care of them when I am gone?" The teacher of truth now feels the time has fully come for rebutting the false theology and spurious philosophy of the poor, mistaken sufferer, so she breaks out with such words as these: "You may rest assured that as God has given you life He means you to hold on to it, and as to your children, for their sake, if not for your own, arouse yourself and say, 'I can live and I will live.'" The scientist here finds it desirable to give a very emphatic silent treatment in addition to the verbal one, and this she does by recognising her afflicted friend's true spiritual nature and its latent capability, all of which the weak negative sufferer has never been taught to recognise for herself. The patient, who is very sensitive and susceptible to the thoughts of others, and has been living for a long time in a most injuriously depressing mental atmosphere, now feels a thrill running through her entire frame as though she were receiving a powerful electric treatment; she feels mentally far brighter and more hopeful, then soon in a better condition physically. If she needs sleep she feels like going to sleep, and when a healer sees her patient disposed to doze she quietly takes her departure. Up to this point the patient has been simply subject to thought transference; she has been like a sponge, absorbing blindly and unresistingly anything and everything that came in her way, and though the mental treatment she has just received has been of great assistance to her, and is surely calculated to help her advance to a stronger and freer position, she is still liable to sink again under the thought of the family physician, who says she cannot recover, and the nurse, who has been trained to shake her head ominously and echo every sentiment expressed by the physician; and in addition to these important and formidable functionaries, who are constantly at her bedside, she is also the recipient of countless depressing thoughts concerning her condition from the entire rank and file of her family and acquaintances, the mental scientist being the only person who visits her who is determined or even able to stand up with her true desires and help her to put to flight the miasmatic vapours of false belief which crowd around her. Knowing that expectation fulfils itself in outward conditions as well as desire, we must make it an imperative rule never to allow ourselves to expect a single thing to take place contrary to our desire. Unless the student grasps this point thoroughly and holds it firmly after he has seized it, he will make but little progress in mastering his body; and by mastering it we mean perfecting it, not crucifying it, for the body is a good and useful instrument of the spirit, and for that reason should be cherished, not destroyed. We hope that the student has by this time read enough between the lines to see that the thoughts which build our bodies are by no means exclusively our own thoughts, nor can they be entirely such until we have reached a point in individualisation far beyond our present attainment. But we must not fold our hands and idly wait the coming of a higher condition, its advent being far more a question of effort than of time. We are working by the piece, not on time; a short, resolute, desperate effort can accomplish more for us in a week than we could gain in years by dilly-dallying. It seems almost needless to say that the air is everywhere full of thought emanations, and that infectious disorders easily strike negative people who think nothing about them, simply because they are in a state of chronic susceptibility. Mons. Charcot and other eminent authorities on hypnotism have clearly shown that hysterical persons are the most ready subjects of undesired hypnotic influence, while persons of much individual character cannot be hypnotised against their will, though the most positive person imaginable might yield to any influence if he wished to, because he wished to. We wish to state very plainly that no one should permit himself, under any circumstances, to yield to any kind of influence against his will, or even without the full consent of his positive desire. This position does not decry the exercise of mediumship under proper conditions, but it does utterly destroy the hold of obsession or demoniacal possession on the popular mind. If Emerson rightly styled the prevailing social mentality "a mush of concession," we can readily see how and why it is that we suffer from so many conditions we detest. Fear is the root of nearly all our disorders. Now, what we fear is the very opposite of what we desire; nevertheless we obtain what we fear, because expectation fulfils fear as well as hope, and we insist that it is at this point more than at any other that we particularly need to guard ourselves from remaining in the dark spheres of thought sanctioned by established usage. The prevalent belief is that accidents will happen because they must. There is a strong belief in fatality in the public mind, though increased education is doing much to modify it. We have already told the student that there is no place for the devil in the universe, because God is all in all. With the eviction of the devil from theology, and as a direct consequence thereof, we may reasonably anticipate an enormous improvement in the general condition of the race, as that terrific bugbear, fear, departs finally when the last vestige of belief in a power of evil departs. There is in reality but one law, and that is the law of attraction, and attraction is due to love. Remember always that love and will are inseparable; thus God is love, and God is will. Love is the Supreme Power, and so is will, for the apparent two are in reality but one. To be destitute of a sufficiency of love or will is to be in a weak, negative condition, at the mercy of everything that comes along; and that is the precise condition in which the bulk of humanity is at present. Fear is a negative state and always accompanies weakness. Love overcomes fear, because will overcomes weakness. "Oh, I am so weak!"—do we not hear these prostrating words continually issuing from each other's lips, and do we not foolishly echo them and confess to feeling weak also? No one attracts microbes intentionally through love of them, but bacteria have their own way with poor negative creatures who fear the worst even while they crave the best. Good intentions are not by any means sufficient, though of course they possess a certain efficiency and we could not get along at all without them, but no one gets anywhere by simply desiring; he must put his desire into expression, and this means the very effort from which the indolent and timid shrink. Marie Corelli, in her "Romance of Two Worlds," has illustrated the power of a living, active will most forcibly and truly. She speaks much of human electricity, as Lytton, in the "Coming Race," dwelt much on Vril. Vril, from Vir, a man superior to Homo, really means human electricity, or magnetism, as it signifies the peculiar psychic force generated by human beings by virtue of their super-animal nature. Zara, one of the heroines in the "Romance of Two Worlds," though thirty-eight years of age, did not appear more than twenty-one, and it is said that when she was asleep her dearest friend could not approach within several feet of her bed, so perfectly was she protected by an aura which encircled her and extended a long distance beyond her person. If any reasonable person studies that narrative he must see that the science of the subject is as follows: When the real nature of a man or woman is called into expression, not only is the entire frame thoroughly vitalised, but an encircling aura protects the body from the approach of everything calculated to disturb or harm it. Spiritualists invariably insist that some people have unseen protectors, but if angels shield some, why not all, particularly if (as the Catholic Church teaches) everybody has a guardian angel? We are compelled by the logic of facts to fall back upon the immutability of law, and acknowledge that every soul must work out its own salvation; we do not say without assistance, but we do declare that nothing commonly called mediumship exempts people from sickness, and for that very reason we have been determined to search for something higher than simple yielding to the unseen. Theosophists teach that Oriental adepts have their bodies perfectly at command, and the Bible states in numberless places that a few individuals in the past have done most wonderful things through subduing the flesh to the spirit; but nowhere do we find a record of great achievement without a correspondingly great effort. Daniel and his three companions serve as typical illustrations of the working of the law, as those four young Hebrews refused to conform to any of the customs of Nebuchadnezzar's court; they drank no wine, they ate no meat, they plunged into no dissipations, and they were consequently healthier, handsomer, wiser, and capable of enduring immensely more than any of the sycophants who pampered their appetites and conformed to the licentious customs of Babylonian court society. The Jews in Europe, during the Middle Ages, escaped the plague, from which their Gentile neighbours suffered most severely, because they conformed in all things to the requirements of the Thorah; but though we state this unhesitatingly, we declare in the next breath that we do not care a fig for many of the old dietary laws, and we should certainly establish none whatever of the ancient type in a Spiritual Science Sanitarium. Spiritual protection and strength flowing from strict adherence to conviction, in spite of all obstacles, is not a consequence of living on vegetables and water, or a result of abstaining from pork and shell-fish and never cooking meat with milk or butter; it springs from a determination to do what one feels to be right, no matter if the whole world thinks differently and stands ready to persecute. Many chronic dyspeptics are very abstemious in diet, and grow steadily weaker; but they are frugal through the dominance of fear, which acts as a poison, turning fruit acid and milk sour in the system. There is actually no diet question whatever when one has mastered mental science, because the natural instinct which serves the animals serves man also when he permits it to assert itself. It is not what we eat, but what we assimilate that nourishes us. We have known of several cases where physicians could not get their patients to keep anything, whether food or medicine, on their stomachs, until a mental healer had changed the patient's mental condition; then food was gladly accepted and easily digested. In some states of mind it is possible to live and thrive upon scarcely any food at all, while in other mental conditions four hearty meals a day are wanted. The celebrated Italian faster, Succi, who went forty-five days without anything to eat, in New York, in the late autumn of 1890, is an example of what can be done if anybody determines to do it in the way of compelling the mind to dictate terms to the body. Succi's fast was a success, though he had no end o obstacles placed in his way by people who were determined he should break down. He would have had a much easier time of it, of course, if the bulk of his visitors had aided instead of hindering him. We do not advise anybody to try any such experiment, as psychic energy can be displayed in far more useful ways; still such an evidence of mental triumph should be honoured rather than laughed at. Miserable penny-a-liners, whose intelligence is at zero, if the bosh they scribble reveals their cranial vacuity, can always be found to hash up rubbish to please the countless idiots who berate every attempt to prove the power of will over the physique. It is useless to disguise a truth by covering it up in a cloud of ambiguous semi-religious phraseology. The truth remains that every mental cure ever accomplished is a direct or indirect, a conscious or unconscious, result of will power. Let the "pure Christian Scientist" of the Eddy school deny it as much as he pleases. There is no cure ever performed except through the action of will; somewhere or other the will is to be found. Frenchmen always inquire, in case of a disturbance, "Where is the woman?" We always look for the will wherever any good is accomplished; but will acts in concert with intelligence whenever lasting good is the result of its activity on the objective plane. Our most religious friends are quite ready to attribute every blessing to divine will. "Very well," we say to them, "just put your will in line with divine will and expect that every good and only good will befall you." The law of attraction works universally on every plane of action, and we attract whatever we desire or expect. If we desire one thing and expect another, we become like houses divided against themselves, which are quickly brought to desolation. Determine resolutely to expect only what you desire; then you will attract nothing but what you really wish for. To re-state our ground of universal agreement: We all desire health, strength, harmony, happiness, and beauty; we have always desired good and good only. Now we will compel our expectation to keep step with our desire. Thus shall we unceasingly attain nearer, ever nearer, our ideal condition and outgrow every vestige of sickness and deformity, no matter on what plane an ailment may have been expressed.

Thoughts are entities. Thoughts have colour, form, size, odour, flavour, texture—in a word, every attribute pertaining to what we call matter. Persons who are sufficiently sensitive, and at the same time adequately intelligent, can vouch for these assertions, for their own experience amply verifies them. Carry any kind of thought you please about with you, and so long as you retain it, no matter how you roam over land or sea, you will unceasingly attract to yourself, knowingly or inadvertently, exactly and only what corresponds to your own dominant quality of thought. Thoughts are our private property, and we can regulate them to suit our taste entirely by steadily recognising our ability so to do.

LESSON VII.

Telepathy, or Thought Transference and Hypnotism; with Practical Directions and Statement of Benefits.

Since Mr. W. T. Stead, editor of the Review of Reviews, published his admirable Christmas story concerning the World's Fair, "From the Old World to the New," innumerable have been the queries propounded concerning the possibility of the occurrences therein related. Though many of the statements are astonishing, none of them are incredible, and we shall certainly make an effort to bring the philosophy of this subject within the grasp of all our students. If, as we claim, thoughts are entities and can be perceived by all who are sensitive enough to detect them, there is nothing more likely than that some few persons whose sensitiveness is unusually pronounced should have experiences like those related by Mr. Stead, though that gentleman, and many others, whose experiences have been somewhat the same, may truthfully declare they in no way anticipated or desired the phenomena which have come to them, though in Mr. Stead's case, at least, it is plain to see that whatever the communicating or operating power may be, it in no way interferes with a person's rightful command of his own body. Mr. Stead's hand can be moved to write messages from the living and the departed, provided he lends his hand for the purpose, but not otherwise. This is as it should be, for though there is nothing whatever dangerous or undesirable in mediumship per se, it is disorderly and humiliating to lose control of our own organism, though we have a right to lend our hands for psychic messages if we choose to do so. "Mr. Compton" and "Mrs. Irwin," two leading characters in "From the Old World to the New," are singularly interesting types, for they are both strongly drawn, and embody many desirable moral traits, as well as intellectual qualifications, and we have always contended that the strongest characters make the best sensitives or telepathists when they throw their wills in that direction. We are confronted now, almost every day, with some new electrical device, proving man's added conquest over the elements, and electricity is only the servant of thought, even though it is its highest universal exponent. If telepathic experiences were always entirely voluntary, and never came without invitation, the question would be settled that they were invariably due to the conscious voluntary mental action of the receiver alone, the transmitter alone, or of the transmitter and receiver combined, as evidence might prove; but the baffling element in the subject is that many messages are sent and received apparently without any desire whatever on the part of either sender or receiver. The theory of man's dual, triple, and even multiple individuality has been started, and is now running the rounds, but though he may be dual, three-fold, four-fold, or seven-fold in constitution, it seems hardly likely that the different selves of the same individual act entirely apart from each other. It is far more likely the case that our memory is more defective than we realise, and as we gain victories over this erratic faculty we shall know far more about ourselves than we do at present. The theory of different selves is very vague and perplexing, and often misleading in the extreme, though it is easy to admit consonantly with the firmest tenure of the doctrine of individual unity, that the ego functions on several distinct planes, and operates in several distinct degrees of manifestation. The sub-self constantly alluded to by hypnotists seems to be an interior or superior plane of consciousness, where action is far more normal and rational than it usually is on the surface plane of consciousness; and as correspondences are universal, this is not amazing, for throughout the realms of nature and mechanics we find the seat of power and tranquillity far from the surface points, which are always the seat of least power and greatest agitation. Thought is evidently generated through the agency of the brain by act of intelligence, and this thought is a force which can be transmitted from place to place through the agency of atomic or molecular vibration. Motion and vibration are two words most frequently used in modern scientific treatises, but many psychists overlook the fact that vibration or motion pre-supposes, as a necessity, something substantial, though invisible, which vibrates or moves. What is this universal something which is perpetually in motion? Though we may not be able to finally define it, we will call it ether for the want of a better or less ancient term. Ether being universally distributed through space (more properly infinity), must be the medium upon and through which thought acts. Mental impulsions produce etheric waves, and these tremulous, undulating wave-currents, set in motion with purposeful intent in a given direction, go on vibrating till they reach the shore which offers them resistance. Telegraphy seems a perfect illustration of telepathy, and surely as the mind of man discovers how to construct and use both wires and cables, so may that same mind learn to manipulate unseen apparatus by means of which messages may be conducted from place to place with still greater velocity, and at length with absolutely unerring accuracy. We are yet but in the early infancy of the period which may truly be styled a telepathic age; our methods as yet are clumsy; we are bungling apprentices, but we have much on every hand to encourage us, as signs multiply daily in demonstration of the central proposition that thought can be sent from place to place without the intervention of any material conductor. Though we may not now be able to fully elucidate the method from the theoretic standpoint, we can certainly collect much valuable information bearing on the practical side of telepathy, and when we are in possession of the facts, theories will no doubt soon be born to account for them. Well, the thoroughly ascertained facts in the case which have sprung from our own personal experiences would fill many large volumes. We shall, therefore, make no attempt to narrate or classify them in detail, but will give a few test cases to prove the statements we are enunciating, and select those in particular which serve to illustrate the truth of mental healing in the most convincing and vivid manner. Mental cries for help; signals of distress; importunate appeals for aid in dire necessity; transmission of messages in times of great intensity of feeling, etc., etc., are so thoroughly well known to all students of psychic science that their reality is questioned to-day by very few persons who have taken even the most superficial interest in the subject, but the much greater and far more practical query as to the prospective employment of telepathic suggestion in daily life with reference to ordinary affairs, is of course quite beyond the average ken of present supposition, though not a few eminent scientists are seriously engaged in making minute and careful observations, with a view to establishing the feasibility of using thought transference in almost every matter of ordinary as well as extraordinary importance. We do not bow to the decision of self-appointed or delegated authorities, as we strictly maintain the right and duty of every individual to experiment with nature on his own account and arrive at original conclusions based on personal experience. At the same time we trust we are not so foolish as to refuse to weigh evidence presented by our neighbours, or so blind to the result of painstaking investigation as to refuse credence to stories, no matter how wonderful or entirely beyond our own experience, related in good faith by intelligent, trustworthy informants. Our position is that no one should permit himself to be limited by his own or anybody's ignorance. If a friend tells you he has seen many things you have overlooked in your journey through life, his statement is extremely probable; but if he should tell you you cannot have seen something simply because he has not seen it, his position would be idiotic. The public is now challenged to investigate the claims of telepathy, which differs in many respects from hypnotism, and that widely, though the latter word is often confounded with the former. The real difference in idea is to be found by studying the derivation and proper signification of both terms. However broad may be the meaning read into the words hypnotism, hypnosis, hypnotist, etc., they all have distinct and exclusive etymological relation to sleep, as they are directly derived from the Greek hypnos (sleep), while telepathy, telepathist, etc., have no connection with sleep, and can be fairly employed in all cases where transfer by mental suggestion not inducing sleep is concerned. Hypnotism is good enough in its place, and in the hands of intelligent, moral practitioners is already proving of great use and value in the treatment of aggravated forms of hysteria and other intense nervous derangements, as well as in cases of surgery where ordinary anæsthetics are considered dangerous; then again, if insomnia is the ailment to be counteracted, the truly hypnotic formula, "you do sleep; you are sleeping; you sleep peacefully," etc., may properly be used with decided benefit; and still further, in cases where immorality is flagrant and the peace and safety of the social organism is endangered, it is quite legitimate to use hypnotic suggestion if other and better reformatory measures are not consciously at hand. We take back nothing we have ever said or written on the inviolable sanctity of a human will and the goodness of the essential or root desire of all humanity, but we hope our students exercise enough intelligence to discriminate between fundamentals and accidentals in cases where the real desire is for happiness, no doubt, but the actual conduct is so insane that if it be permitted to continue it thwarts instead of accomplishing the primal design. Then it must never be forgotten, that human rights being essentially equal in all respects, it can never be allowable to permit lawlessness, which interferes with human rights. I have a right to do as I please with my own property, but I have no right to jeopardise your property. A man may have a barbaric right to get drunk, but no right whatever to beat his wife or maltreat his children; therefore, though the best and highest mode of mental treatment is to appeal to, so as to arouse the latent manhood within the man, who is actually worse than a beast, in cases of emergency we must all use the best means at our immediate command. Thus, if violence be ever attempted or persistent invasion of the rights of others be persisted in, and hypnotic influence can be brought to bear to stop an injustice, the hypnotist is a friend to society and a foe to nothing but iniquity. While we should all strive to ultimate the very highest we can perceive, there are many intermediary steps to be taken between the base and the summit of the ladder, and though we consider simple hypnotism one of the lower rungs and telepathy proper a much higher rung, they are both rungs on the same ladder. As to the dangers attending any mental process, are there no dangers in medicine, surgery, telegraphy, the use of fire, etc., etc.?

Let no one be alarmed at a scarecrow; danger lurks everywhere in the path of the unwary, but it is the height of folly, if nothing worse, to raise a cry of "malicious mesmerism" and other phantasms of disordered imaginations to account for such hysterical ebullitions as proceed from the unstrung or overstrung condition of the nervous system in persons who are afraid of everything and have always at hand a convenient scapegoat-theory on which they saddle everything which displeases them, even though it emanates exclusively from their own disordered mentality. We are very glad to learn that Mr. Stead, who has been much interviewed concerning his remarkable telepathic experiences,, always declares that he sustains no injury whatever from yielding voluntarily to outside influences, and he never yields involuntarily, and in this he displays his wisdom, because blind yielding to anything is a sign of weakness, and whenever we indulge a tendency whose cause is weakness, the effect of such indulgence is to increase weakness; likewise to indulge a habit born of strength is to increase the strength which gave the habit birth. Our own memory of mental suggestion, supported somewhat by personal clairvoyance, is as follows: Thoughts assume form, or are in form, when they emanate from our minds. According to their quality will be the nature of the forms they assume, and as the law of attraction is absolutely universal, when they are not consciously directed in any given line, they go as a matter of course where they are most attracted, and the line of greatest attraction is perforce that of least resistance. Now it is more than probable that in family or group of friends there will be one person, at least, who has had many uncomprehended but by no means incomprehensible telepathic experiences of a startling nature, as, for example, while busily engaged in writing or attending to some ordinary household or business affair, seeing a distant friend with the mental eyes as though he were bodily present, or so strongly sensing his presence as to feel actual contact with him. Such experiences are not rare, and they are not difficult to investigate and explain, provided one has no strained and unnatural theory to support, for if THOUGHTS ARE THINGS, as we claim they are, they can be perceived as though they were the actual persons from whom they emanate, as thoughts coming from us take our form frequently, especially in cases where our desire is to communicate freely in a purely human face-to-face manner with an absent friend. Memory we consider an artful dodger, and such it will continue to be until it is trained and disciplined to be the obedient servant of the will; it is now with most persons like a frolicsome puppy, utterly unrestrained, but with all the capacity for developing into a fine, useful dog; and memory should sustain to will precisely the relation of dog to master. No one is ever really unconscious for a single moment, but consciousness operates on various planes, and when functioning on one plane often communicates nothing to the records kept on another plane. Swedenborg and a few other very remarkable seers have been consciously in two worlds, or on two planes of consciousness at once. Swedenborg could be conversing with a friend in one city and see a fire burning in another city many miles distant; he could also be engaged in conversation with a friend in his garden at Stockholm and at the same instant be in direct communication with the spiritual world, which is all around us, whether we see it or not. Telepathy will soon greatly revolutionise spiritualistic as well as materialistic phraseology, and a revision in language is greatly needed everywhere, for innumerable misunderstandings are the upshot of incorrect employment of words. It is an excellent rule to abide by, never to say what you do not mean, and never to mean what you do not say. Symbolical or metaphorical language may be true to correspondence, and therefore should not be vetoed; but it is always a mark of imbecility to say something, and then, when questioned concerning it, to answer, "Oh, I didn't mean that"; then we reply, if you did not mean it you ought not to have said it, for speech is abused when it disguises thought; its proper use is to express thought with the utmost clearness. In strict science, no one should ever give or take a joke, though humour has its due place in conversation and literature. Spirit-return is a very loose expression; spiritual communion is rigidly scientific. "Do spirits ever come back?" is a rather stupid phrase, and as a question is exceedingly ambiguous. "Can we hold communion with the departed?" is thoroughly good language and admits of a definite demonstrable affirmative reply. In a paper read before the London Spiritual Alliance, Mr. Stead related instances where he had received messages from the living and the so-called dead in precisely the same way and with equal facility, and he has even gone so far as to suggest a central telepathic bureau, where competent telepathists can act as mediums, so that people can go to a sort of headquarters if they choose to make inquiries whether any messages have been received for them from distant or departed friends. It is not at all out of the way to propose such an establishment, and if the right persons can be brought together to carry out its wise and benevolent intent, much practical good will doubtless result from it. In mental science it is most important to distinguish between simple telepathic suggestion, accomplished by the transference of thought from one person to another, and the false method often pursued of seeking to bring a patient into blind submission to a healer's will; at the same time this point needs careful elucidation, and to this end a somewhat elaborate dissertation on two sides of the subject may be necessary. In foregoing lessons we have endeavoured to state as clearly as possible what is the nature of essential desire, and we shall never take back a single word we have said on the score of the real divinity of all desire at the source; but when a student has grasped this point fully, he needs further instructions on how to discriminate between essential and accidental desire, for though the former is entirely good, the latter is often a fruitful source of intense misery. Let us again re-state our position on the WILL. We all desire happiness, strength, and every other blessing, but we do not always know how to obtain the object of our search; we therefore err, not in motive but in method, and from the side of method, though not from the side of motive, all invalids are sinners, and so are all who seek gratification in harmful ways, such as strong drink, gambling, etc. If you wish to become an intelligent and efficient telepathist and employ your ability to project your thoughts for truly good ends, you must discriminate between what your patient really wants and what he falsely believes he wants, and it is just here that confusion arises in many minds and self-contradictions are apparent though unreal. I take for example a man who is intentionally seeking happiness while actually he is ignorantly pursuing misery; he is a victim of the passion for strong drink, opium, or some other absurd substitute for what will really aid him in finding the good he intentionally seeks. Such a man wants a good time, and gets only a bad time. In his extremity he appeals to a mental healer, with the hope of being relieved of the pain and horror attendant upon delirium tremens, or some equally frightful and detestable disorder. He is too ignorant and fuddled to know what course to pursue to extricate himself from his dilemma, and in his dazed, besotted condition, he is in no state to respond to conversational argument, so the healer must commence with MENTAL SUGGESTION. Remember, the man has applied to you for relief, and you must use your own discretion how to apply it; were he in a rational condition you would talk to him or write him a good strong letter, full of plain, sensible advice, but he is not ready for that yet, so you only suggest to him mentally the means of improvement. A sample argument or declaration may be phrased thus:

"My dear friend, listen to me; you desire happiness: to this you are entitled and this you can surely find, but it is only to be found in a life of temperance and sobriety. You do not love intoxicating liquors; you have been under a delusion with regard to them; you are in pursuit of happiness and they only land you in misery; therefore I declare unto you, that you do NOT desire them. You desire whatever is for your good because it is for your good, and furthermore, you are a member of a vast social organism, and being a member thereof, you desire whatever is best for the entire human race. You can and will secure happiness by pursuing a path of temperance in all things, and this course is dictated to you by your own reason and conscience, and you know it. Listen to me. I repeat this truth to you—you desire GOOD and GOOD ONLY. I pronounce you absolutely free from the false desire for liquor and from the pursuit of anything whatsoever that could possibly retard your progress toward the goal of perfect happiness which you desire to reach. I pronounce you free from whatever could induce you to take a single step detrimental to the welfare of yourself or any other member of the great human family to which we all alike belong. Listen to me. YOU ARE FREE; you do not love liquor; you love whatever conduces to human welfare, and naught beside. You are free to resist all temptation to folly, and henceforth you will never be led against your will to do anything. YOU ARE FREE; GOD IS WITH YOU."

No student need use those exact words. The ideas conveyed in them are essential, and unless the reader is exceptionally obtuse it seems almost impossible that he or she should misconstrue the plain teaching of this lesson. There are in appearance two wills, but in reality there is only one will, and the one will is always desiring good: the false will is destroyed immediately the dark cloud of ignorance which produced and sustains it is dissipated by the clear presentation of truth to the interiors of the understanding, and teaching, to be effectual, must appeal to the interior degrees of the mind at first and then flow outward to the exterior.

Though this volume of lessons is compiled chiefly to give definite practical instruction in mental healing, the therapeutic aspects of telepathy are so closely allied to the social that we can hardly offer any useful suggestions without embracing the varied aspects of this fascinating theme, and though at the expense, possibly, of a little tautology, we will not conclude this essay without presenting a condensed review of the subject at large as it appeals to us. We allude frequently to Mr. Stead's writings because they are the most accessible of any on this subject to the general reader. The prevailing opinion on the part of persons well informed on the subject is entirely against the pessimistic predilections of ill-informed people, who see in hypnosis nothing but black magic and other frightful abominations. Spiritualism for the past fifty-two years has been abundantly demonstrating to the public of the entire civilised world the fact of communion with the so-called departed. Telepathy does not invalidate spiritualistic conclusions in the least; it merely calls attention to other possibilities of mental communion than those usually dwelt upon by Spiritualists. Thus it is possible to be either a Spiritualist or a Telepathist, but the widest experience leads to brave thinkers becoming both.

Telepathy is the art of thought-projection, and accomplishes psychically what telegraphy accomplishes physically; for, just as we send messages by use of electricity from one part of the world to another when we are sufficiently acquainted with electrical action to construct and operate necessary apparatus, so when we discover the law of thought-transference, we can dispense with visible wires and cables and rely solely on psychic appliances. The science of telepathy is not new to the few, but it is startlingly novel to the many, and will probably remain a mystery to the crowd until the art of concentration is far more developed than at present among the masses. Let it be distinctly understood that the old mesmeric terms, subject and operator, are usually misleading, as they are supposed to convey the idea of a strong-willed person at one end of a line and a weak-willed person at the other. Washington Irving Bishop and several other "mind-readers" got into trouble through ignorance and carelessness, but when experiments are conducted aright there is no danger.

The true way to conduct a telepathic experiment is for two friendly fellow students to appoint a time for sending mental telegrams to each other; and to prevent the impression that one controls the other, let the sender to-day be the receiver to-morrow. The best time is whenever one feels most quiet and free from likelihood of interruption. The best place is wherever the atmosphere is most congenial; and the best condition is when one feels mentally at ease, calm and good natured. Having taken the most comfortable position possible, sitting or reclining, let the one who is acting as sender call mentally the name of the one with whom he seeks to communicate (much as we operate with a telephone); then, clearly articulating, silently, every syllable of the message, send it forth on the psychic current, with simple assurance that it will reach its destination; there must be no doubt or flurry if the best result is to be secured. Let whoever is acting as receiver take a similar attitude of ease wherever he may be, and quietly anticipate a message without permitting himself to expect any special kind of communication. If, as in the case of Mr. Stead, messages are written automatically through the receiver's hand, it is well to always sit at a table, with pencil and paper, and allow the hand to move as it will, taking no notice of what is being written till the hand ceases to write.

At first, messages may come slowly and doubtfully, and mistakes may occur; but if the course above suggested is persisted in by any two persons who are really attached to each other, and mutually interested in proving telepathy, satisfactory results will eventually be forthcoming, though some persons get to this point sooner than others in consequence of unusual sensitiveness, coupled with more than ordinary ability to keep the mind centred unwaveringly on a given object.

Hypnotism is related to telepathy, but as this word is derived from hypnos (sleep) it has only a limited relation to telepathy, which is a much broader term. Hypnotism is a true cure for insomnia and an efficient and desirable subtitute for anæsthetics in surgery, as the most delicate patients can submit to its action with decided benefit, if the administrator operates scientifically. The will of both parties to the result must be in accord—for example, one wishes to sleep, and the other agreeing with that wish, suggests mentally "you do sleep; you are sleeping;" there is concurrence of desire, and thus no weakening but rather strengthening, of individuality. While hypnotism is of special interest to the medical faculty, and is destined to be the sovereign anæsthetic of the near future, telepathy is of the utmost interest to everybody, and promises to become a priceless boon to humanity at large. The telepathic age on which we are entering is the necessary successor of the materialistic era which is rapidly closing. The end of an age is indeed upon us, and mammon-worshippers may have to vacate their thrones, while imposition will be seen for what it is, and therefore discredited. No one whose motives are pure has anything to fear, but on the contrary very much to gain by welcoming and cultivating the new telepathic sense, which is next door neighbour to the psychometric; and we are now entering a psychometric as well as a telepathic age. While telepathy is the science of mental telegraphy, psychometry is a more interior method of penetrating the psychic zone. Telepathy does not necessarily do more than establish communion between two centres of intelligence, but psychometry enters the mysterious arcana of the invisible realm, and there discovers the recorded history of many centuries and milleniums. The earth's atmosphere is a marvellous palimpsest, written over and over with the history of all that has been said, done, and even thought by all the races that have dwelt upon this planet. This faithful book of remembrance is open to the eye of the gifted seer, who can read its inscriptions as the learned archæologist can decipher characters upon ancient monuments and scrolls. What is often called "astral light" photographs everything upon the "astral atmosphere," which is interior to the outer atmosphere of the globe, interpenetrating or saturating every point in space. Not only has the world its atmosphere, but all living creatures have theirs, which are ever changing; every change in thought producing its vibratory effect upon the ether.

It would not do in the present imperfect stage of psychometric development to recklessly resort to psychic impression in serious cases, but the chief reason why there is so little evidence brought before the public positively confirmatory of this "science of the soul" is that, like all "occult" science, it can only be experimentally demonstrated by exceptionally developed seers, and in exceptional quietude. Public exhibitions of psychometry are usually too vague and general to be of much scientific interest, but this can be remedied if spectators will approach the subject in a scientific spirit. Far too often "psychometric readings" are given in a crowded hall, to a very miscellaneous, unquiet audience, who pile all sorts of personal articles in confusion on a platform desk, and expect a sensitive to give each one in a multitude a personal test. Once in a while some person of unusually decided individuality gets convincing information, but the really valuable experiments are in the private study of the scientific observer, who never presses a sensitive with several divergent questions at once.

The psychometric gift may be latent in all, but on an average about one person in seven can develop it sufficiently to make it practically available. First impressions in coming in contact with an object usually concern present conditions; historical associations can be detected by prolonged contact. A passive expectant mental attitude throughout all experiments is a sine quâ non.

LESSON VIII.

Intuition the True Educator.

The word intuition, though frequently employed, is seldom clearly interpreted. It literally signifies inward or interior teaching, i.e., instruction received in ways unknown to outward sense. Let us look at this great subject as simply as one can. People often confound intuition with impression, but the two are widely dissimilar; the distinction between them may be expressed thus: When you enter a room for the first time, certain objects in it immediately strike your eyes, and you unhesitatingly affirm I see such and such things; you do not feel in the least doubtful or distrustful of your senses; you instinctively regard yourself in the light of a competent observer and arrive instantly at the unargued conclusion that your observations are correct. On the psychic or spiritual plane, intuition does for us what vision does on the so-called physical plane, and what intellectual discrimination does on the strictly mental plane. Impression is something received by way of impress from without; it is hearsay evidence, proffered testimony, about which we may reasonably argue, and which we are at full liberty to accept or reject after due deliberation and inquiry. There are no absolutely certain impressions, and there can be no uncertain intuition.

The two great lights, the greater of which rules our mental and moral day, the lesser of which rules our mental and moral night, differ from each other exactly at the point where we accept truth for authority, or authority for truth. Jesus said to the multitude, "If I proclaim truth, why do ye not accept it?" So have all truly illumined teachers addressed the throng before them, for the great teacher, the veritable master is he who discerns in all humanity both the love of truth and the capacity to embrace it. Were we to claim possession of all truth we should indeed be vain braggarts, senseless egotists, but we have the right to claim, and also the ability to receive, all necessary truth. No word is more commonly employed than duty; we say flippantly that we ought to do certain things, without pausing to inquire into the nature and origin of duty. Obligation implies ability, no one can reasonably be expected to perform a task beyond his power; therefore the simile of the horse and the goat is always apropos. The reason why it can never be the duty of a goat to do a horse's work is because the goat is constitutionally unfitted to perform such heavy labour, and just law never expects any creature to transcend its possibilities, though divine law expects us all to live up to them instead of grovelling, as we so often do, far beneath them. Impressions received from without are seldom lasting unless there is a response within to an outward appeal. Present educational methods are in many instances worse than useless; they are positively detrimental, as forcing and cramming are still shamefully in vogue both in ordinary schools and distinguished universities. Teachers are not usually very much to blame for this bad state of affairs, as they are almost invariably painfully fettered in the iron-clad bondage of a prescribed curriculum. Froebel taught that no more than fifteen children should ever be allotted to a single teacher, and that every study should be made delightful to the pupils, and be in the truest sense educational. Education and evolution mean almost the same, as the former word is derived from educere, to lead out, and the latter from evolvere, to unroll. Now, can it be possible to lead out what is not already in, or to unroll what is not infolded? To prate of evolution and ignore involution is to argue in favour of a self-evident absurdity, contradicted by the growth of every seed and the universal phenomena of nature. Emerson taught that the soul is mature in the infant, and so it is. Education is the process of leading forth into manifest expression the latent properties of the germ. We possess all things, but we sometimes feel we have nothing, for we are like people who live on land richly stored with precious metals and priceless gems, but by reason of ignorance, indolence, or both, they subsist in penury. Penuriousness is the fruit of faithlessness or idleness, and should never be encouraged or permitted, as it saps the very springs of health at their source. Though interdependence is the law of life, there is a glorious sense of independence in every soul, and when it comes to a realisation of its dormant potencies it throws overboard every prop on which it formerly leaned and henceforward steers its own course with the aid of no other pilot than the light within. Cowardice masquerading as humility is a veritable wolf in sheep's clothing; for while humility is rightly esteemed a virtue, its counterfeit is decidedly a vice. Reliance upon God is a much misunderstood and frequently misapplied term, for people insist upon reliance upon outside aids when they claim to be trusting implicitly in the Infinite, who is no respecter of persons, times or places. Churches, Bibles, schools and all such agencies are helps when they are diaphanous, but only hindrances when they are opaque. Kindred souls can profitably unite for study into the deepest mysteries of being, but one must never assume the role of dictator to the rest. It is surely no more presumptuous to declare that the Most High can speak to us than to our neighbours, for we are all alike, God's children. Two grave errors must be contradicted before the channel will be open to permit the water of life to flow in an uninterrupted healing stream. These twin errors are pride and false humility. Pride bars the door to the advent of truth by proclaiming "I am holier than thou;" false humility bars it by saying, "You can receive a message from the eternal, but I cannot;" but if not, why not? We have all conceded to ourselves and others the right to use our own eyes, ears, palate, nostrils, and touch irrespective of the use made of such faculties or members by our brethren. Each one claims the right to exclaim, "I see, hear, taste, touch, smell," and in every law court in the civilised world individual testimony furnished by an eye witness is regarded as far more conclusive than second-hand information. There is a perfect correspondence between the visible and the invisible. The ancient hermetic axiom, "As above, so below," or its equivalent, "As within, so without," is unmistakably accurate, and whoever trusts it fully will never miscalculate. The outer world appears to each one of us as though there were never another spectator of the scene; we individually venture to pass judgment upon all that we behold, and with what delighted exultation does the seer pronounce the word "Eureka" (I have found it). Shall we dare to use and gratefully employ our outer faculties and then refuse to recognise or enjoy deeper and diviner means of perception pertaining to the soul, with which we are as unmistakably, yea, far more certainly endowed? What is vaguely called imagination is a portion of our spiritual dower, only the idealist can be true inventor or discoverer, a poet, an artist, or a musical composer in the least creative or original. Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Handel and a score of other well-known names are reminiscent of intuitive genius, while De Koven and other modern composers of light opera airs are the interpreters of the imitative school unfortunately so popular in this ridiculous age, which has for its most popular fad servile copying of the past in spite of the tremendous effort which a few brave adventurous souls are resolutely making to stem the degenerating current and manfully embody the ideal. Weak eyes, weak lungs, weak back, weak everything is imitative cynicism and pessimism incarnated; strong mind, strong body, pure morals, robust health all spring from launching out boldly into the deep, strong, wide current of fearless originality. The gospel must be preached in its original simplicity; fidelity to the inner light and our backs turned on tradition can alone save us from the ever-enlarging consequences of the prevailing false methods of tuition which hurry many a promising student to the insane asylum, if not to the grave. Memory is eulogised as though it were the all-in-all, when it is the veriest bondservant of the senses, a servant made to obey that imperial master will, which should never for an instant allow this subordinate to assume control of a single department in the temple of human enterprise. Govern your memory, compel it to serve you, use it as you would a memorandum book in which you record exactly what you please for future reference, and then when it has served you and you no longer need its aid, retire it, only to bring it forth again if fresh contingencies arise where its services can be of decided value. Many a young married couple make shipwreck of their happiness as their vessels strike on the pointed, jagged rocks of memory. New situations involve new responsibilities necessitating new illumination. Memory tabulates the records of the past, but it gives us no advice how to proceed in a fresh contingency. Intuition is a lamp to our feet, a light on our path at all times, and its divine guidance can be successfully invoked whenever and wherever we choose to call upon it, provided we are prepared to relinquish all prejudice and allow immediate perception of truth to be our honoured guide. Whenever you are in any doubt as to the course you should pursue, after you have turned to every outward means of guidance, let the inward eye see, let the inward ear hear, and allow this simple, natural, beautiful process to go on unimpeded by questionings or doubts.

Exactly as you permit the outer senses to testify to what they come in contact with, and you welcome the reports they bring to the citadel of your consciousness, so let the soul-sense, interior perception, not looking at, but looking through as well as into, guide you in all these otherwise grievously perplexing situations where you feel perfectly stranded unless you betake yourselves to this only reliable guide. We could recommend the following simple rules which many earnest truth-seekers have found extremely helpful and productive of the most desirable and practically beneficial results. When you wish to let something into your mental treasure house, read it or listen to it once only, and then give it your supremely undivided attention. Affirm at the outset, "I will become acquainted with these facts, and I will be able to recall this information whenever I require it." Having thus directed not only your intention but your confident expectation, take the easiest, most comfortable position you can possibly assume. Wear no tight garments and permit no mental strain; think of yourself as approaching what you desire to learn; let information flow into you as rain soaks into the earth when it offers no resistance to the shower. If you give absolutely undivided attention to the work in hand, you will be able to review a book thoroughly after once reading it, and be in a position to successfully pass a cross-examination upon its contents, for when in the presence of the examiner you will feel as though the book were within you, and though you may use your own language you will faithfully give forth the author's views in every particular, and also graphically relate any important incident in the tale. This is not verbal memory, and it is in no sense a mechanical process. Recitations are entirely overdone, and if we carry these mere memory-acts much further we shall have succeeded in stamping out what little originality is yet remaining in our literature. Why should anyone copy anyone? Are all flowers alike because all are beautiful? Have all song-birds the self-same note because all can warble sweetly? Let us at any cost become original, but what is the price we need to pay for this unspeakable deliverance from blind servitude to fallacious custom? Go where you will, complaints of sickness rend the air; untold miseries multiply on every hand; pessimism gains ground among the wealthy and the cultured fully as much as among the poverty-stricken and illiterate. Why? Surely because the fountain of inspiration is sealed. If Tennyson's "Higher Pantheism" gives anything like a true statement of our relation to Deity; if the Supreme Power is nearer to us than our own hands and feet; if it be true that God is the infinite Energy which Herbert Spencer so freely acknowledges as omnipresent, then we need but one sentence by way of affirmation to carry with us into the silence, and that is, "GOD IS NOW HERE." Through whatever channel the Divine Life reaches us it is nevertheless the breath of the Almighty which we inhale, for there is but one Life, the All-in-All of Being. Existences are but expressions of this sole Being which is eternal. I need not breathe the air at second-hand; I can let my own nostrils dilate and drink in the vital breath as though no other creature breathed in all the universe, and I can have just so much but no more of this universal air than my present lung capacity permits. By constant and judicious exercise I can do exactly this as concerns my spiritual relations. In the lives of all of us there are times when we grow desperate if we believe in the hampering force of uncontrollable circumstances; we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of our slavery to blind, relentless fate; luck, destiny, fortune are at such times detestable words in our ears, sounding the death-knell of all our hopes. The cruellest thing of all is misdirected sympathy, for it is the sentence of doom, the knell of despair. In all dark hours and times of unwonted perplexity we need to follow one simple direction, found, as all needed directions can be found, in the dear old gospel, which so many read, but, alas! so few interpret. "Enter into thine inner chamber and shut the door." Does this mean that we must literally betake ourselves to a private closet with a key in the door? If it did, then the command could never be obeyed in the open air, on land or sea, and the Christ loved the lakes and the forests far better than the cramping rooms of city dwelling-houses; still his counsels are so wide-reaching that there is no spot on earth and no conceivable situation in which any of us may be placed where we cannot follow them. One of the most deeply intuitive men we ever met had a desk in a city office where several other gentlemen were doing business constantly, and often talking loudly. Entirely undisturbed by the many various sounds about him, this self-centred, faithful man would, in any moment of perplexity, draw the curtains of privacy so completely about him that he would be as fully enclosed in his own psychic aura, and thereby effectually removed from all distractions, as though he were alone in some primeval wood. Taking his difficulty with him into the mystic silence in the form of a direct question, to which he expected a certain answer, he would remain utterly passive until the reply came, and never once, through many years' experience, did he find himself disappointed or misled. Intuitive perceptions of truth are the daily bread to satisfy our daily hunger; they come like the manna in the desert day by day, each day brings adequate supply for that day's need only. They must be followed instantly, for dalliance with them means their obscuration, and the more we dally the more do we invite erroneous impressions to cover intuition with a pall of conflicting mortal phantasy, born of the illusions of the terrene will. One condition is imposed by universal law, and this we must obey. Put all wishes aside save the one desire to know truth; couple with this one demand the fully consecrated determination to follow what is distinctly perceived as truth immediately it is revealed. No other affection must be permitted to share the field with this all-absorbing love of truth for its own sake. Obey this one direction, and never forget that expectation and desire are bride and bridegroom and for ever inseparable, and you will soon find your hitherto darkened way grow luminous with celestial radiance, for with the heaven within, all heavens without incessantly co-operate. Retire to rest with the confident assurance of divine illumination, and the gift of vision will displace all earth-born dreams. Health and happiness come, not by seeking for them specifically, but by seeking that nobler quality of living that produces them as a result.

To receive education spiritually while the body is resting in sleep is a perfectly normal and orderly experience, and would occur definitely and satisfactorily in the lives of all of us if we paid more attention to internal and consequently less to external states with their supposed but unreal necessities. Sleep is intended for recuperation and instruction obtained in a state of active rest or restful activity from the subjective standpoint. Many people endorse the groundless assertion that all action is physical; this is a most harmful error, as it leads to undue concern for speech and behaviour, coupled with disregard of thought and motive; it leads as a consequence to the multiplication of false appearances and every phase of hypocrisy. Our thoughts make us what we are here and hereafter, and our thoughts are often busier by night than by day, for when we are asleep to the exterior we can be wide awake to the interior world, and the unseen world is a SUBSTANTIAL PLACE, the conditions of which are entirely regulated by mental and moral attainments. When we are not deriving information through outward avenues of sensation, we are receiving instruction through interior channels of perception, and when this fact is understood for what it is worth, it will become a universal custom for persons to take to sleep with them the special subject on which they most earnestly desire particular instruction. The Pharaoh type of person dreams, and so does his butler and baker, but the Joseph type, which is that of the truly gifted seer, both dreams and interprets. Let us all seek health and instruction through the watches of the night as well as the day, and we shall learn by practical experience to testify to the truth of the wonderful double-barrelled text, "He giveth His beloved sleep," which can also be correctly translated, "He giveth to his beloved while they are sleeping." The restless fever of the world can only be assuaged as INTUITION leads the intellect into deeper truth than sense can apprehend, and as a direct consequence builds the outer body into strength and symmetry.

LESSON IX.

DIAGNOSIS.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MENTAL AND PHYSICAL CONDITIONS.

AMONG the innumerable questions put to us by students and correspondents no questions occur more frequently than those relating to diagnosis. By diagnosis is usually meant the discovery of some special ailment from which a patient is suffering. Looking into the body to find the nature and location of disorders is a very painful and disgusting process, tending to the aggravation of maladies rather than to their cure. Health is order, disease is disorder; when you have said that you have said all, and we do not feel by any means sure that one form of disorder is necessarily much worse than another. Health is our goal; we do not wish to be ill in any respect, and as we desire that all our organs and functions shall be harmonious we have no special desire, when ailing, to be cured of any particular ailment. I will to be well, and if I apply to a healer I expect that healer to see me perfect in thought, and, by conveying to me mentally a picture of ideal perfection, to aid and encourage me toward the realisation of my complete desire. Every part of the human body does no doubt exactly correspond to some special department of the mind, and it is therefore quite possible to formulate a system of treatment based on physiological correspondences; but for practical purposes this is generally unnecessary. There are, however, some broad classifications which can be clearly stated with decided advantage, and many more will doubtless suggest themselves to the student. Internal disorders of complicated and baffling types are evidently the offspring of long secreted error. "Secret sin" usually means some physical malpractice, but Mental Science strikes deeper and lays the axe at the root—erroneous thought. The New Testament is very emphatic on this point, so much so that some of its statements appear to many persons unwarrantably extreme; the fact nevertheless remains that our inmost thoughts do and must show forth in our bodily conditions. Fear is the greatest bugbear of the race; some dread, entertained in secret and held on to as a nightmare, perpetually menacing, is the cause of a multitude of internal difficulties for which a great many people are ineffectually treated by physicians and mental healers alike. The bulk of mental treatments are only palliative, in consequence of failure on the part of healers to teach, as well as treat their patients, and the indisposition of many patients to even listen to any doctrine calculated to unsettle their old beliefs. Mrs. Helen Wilmans, in her experience with coloured people in the Southern States of America, has found many cases where she could not do her best work owing to the unwillingness of the superstitious, creed-bound people to even consider anything which they feared would upset their "faith." If all our beliefs were exactly right we should be perfectly well; therefore it is arrant folly to seek to hold on to every ancient theory and at the same time attain to a higher condition than you have yet reached. Healing means making whole; anything less than this is only surface benefit, and does not permanently endure. The controversy in the Episcopal Church between the strictly orthodox and liberal clergy is on the score of "resurrection," which is perpetually confounded with resuscitation, a word of widely different meaning. Recovery is far less than we intend to be satisfied with; we aim much higher than to merely regain a lost estate; our anticipations are toward a future which shall completely eclipse the past, therefore we desire to forget what lies behind and reach forward continually. Old habits of erroneous thought actualise themselves in gouty and rheumatic systems; stiffness of limbs and joints is often due to a perverse retention of fossilised opinions and their accompanying practices; it is only by cutting entirely loose from these bonds that we can rise to newness of life, either inwardly or outwardly, and interior advance must precede all enduring external improvement. You will all probably think up cases of "sweet unselfish sufferers" whose ailments seem to point unmistakably away from themselves to the sins of others; in such instances mental weakness is the cause of suffering, an accession of moral backbone, the only relief. We can take in the disease of others through sympathetic complicity with their mental states, and from this cause spring numberless diseases of weak, but well-meaning people. A wife, for instance, weeps over her husband's peccadilloes, she feels obliged to submit to him in all things right or wrong, she permits herself to be victimised by injustice, and, as a consequence, she suffers from afflictions which are the natural penalties of his vices. Her only salvation is in conquering her susceptibility to fear and anxiety; she must immediately assert her true womanhood, and by rising above mental depression and decrepitude she will grow to a height from which she can bend down to him and save him from his own follies. We cannot successfully help others until we have lifted ourselves from the negative to the positive pole of our existence, and to do this requires energy and effort. Some healers suffer intensely while in the presence of sufferers, because of their own lack of individuality; every healer must learn to insulate himself from his surroundings, and this can be done most effectually by picturing oneself to oneself, as surrounded with an aura or atmosphere entirely to one's own liking. If you have a favourite colour wear it, and above all accustom yourself to seeing yourself psychically wrapped in it, so will you gain confidence in your own ability to attract to yourself whatever you desire, and envelop yourself in the aura of your choice. Every sound and colour has a special signification, and whether you can produce the tone or colour in your outward sphere or not, insist upon having it with you subjectively; by this means you make the air subservient to your needs, and you are then in a condition to extract from it whatever you please and naught besides; thus you secure freedom from the parasites of disorder, as no one consciously or willingly invites them. Attraction is universal, but we attract through fear and expectation as well as through desire. Inflammatory disorders are common, chiefly to excitable people, but those who permit themselves to come under the influence of others' excitement are co-victims. In treating against internal difficulties, treat for perfect frankness; for as people open their minds freely they will overcome hysteria and all bowel derangements. To overcome fevers, the most perfect tranquillity is needed; but any state which is counterfeited by assuming what one does not really feel is non-effectual, because the undercurrent of your thought reaches your patient. Many parents and other doting relatives wish their dear ones well, and treat them while hoping against despair; often in such cases the doubts and fears of the would-be healer are transmitted to the patient, and a cure does not result. All petty worries and anxieties are apt to produce irritation of the skin. Dandruff and pimples come and go with nervous irritability occasioned by small vine-spoiling foxes. The hair is most visibly affected by sudden emotions, and the teeth and nails are often influenced similarly. Nervous headache and toothache usually spring from teasing and allowing oneself to be teased by external things; vinegar and other pungent applications are called remedies, but at best they can only afford slight temporary relief. Whenever a healer receives intuitively any light on a case he should act out his highest conviction regardless of any theories of precedent; we must daily and hourly expect new revelations to meet new requirements. All error shows forth in some disorder, and we surely need deliverance from every form of sickness, therefore if in spiritual treatment ANY error is detected, it should immediately be faced and denied down. Denial is an erasive process totally different from the negative stand taken by those who simply ignore a difficulty; to ignore is to evade, and no satisfactory results can ever be reached through attempts at dodging. When the student has thoroughly mastered the theory that diseases are often contracted by negative persons through mental weakness, a disorder is often seen to be a reflected one. For instance, your patient is a pure-minded woman of tender susceptibilities, but her husband is a libertine, and she suffers from a disorder traceable only to animal excesses. She is apparently the guiltless victim of another's sin, but the actual explanation of her case is that her lack of self-assertion is the cause of her trouble; for were she a truly individualised woman she could not suffer from a complaint due to folly not her own. To trace the general or original correspondence of mental and physical states is not very difficult, it is in the discovery of the special avenues through which "bacteria" enter that complications arise. To proclaim PERFECT HARMONY is to sound the trumpet of freedom in tones adapted to all occasions. Liberty from bondage must be absolute ere health is perfectly manifested, therefore it is in vain that we peer into dark recesses to hunt up special errors. We must pronounce ourselves and others totally free from all slavery, and only particularise in statement when a special need arises before us. Diagnosis ought to be quick discernment of how to supply the most pressing need of one who comes to us for help, not mapping out deflections. I am well; I am strong; I am beautiful, etc., are sentences that state our most interior condition. We are really all this, but we are potentially vastly more than we have actualised. I must call forth the divinity within me by acknowledging it, for I cannot express for use more than I recognise. You cannot have too high an appreciation of self, provided you depreciate nobody. Self appreciation is a virtue, depreciation of others is a crime.

We shall never grow strong or beautiful outwardly until we claim strength and beauty as already within. All growth in nature is from within to without, therefore recognition of interior perfection leads to its expression. In cases where some particular organ is specially affected, it is well to hold very firmly to the ideal perfection of the special faculty whose expression is faulty. For the improvement of bodily sight, dwell on spiritual vision stedfastly, and do not let your thoughts dwell on your eyes; pay as little attention to the physical orbs as possible, and concentrate the mental gaze on spiritual realities. Where hearing is defective do not worry about the ears, but turn to the idea of perfect hearing in spirit. In outward effect we shall often witness a seeming refutation of correspondence; take the following example: A telegram is received by four persons simultaneously; they are all painfully affected by the news; but instead of all four being affected similarly, one gets a severe headache, the second has an attack of neuralgia, the third gets palpitation of the heart, and the fourth has a violent fit of coughing. These four persons represent four degrees or phases of susceptibility, and each took the ailment to which he was most predisposed. It is a predisposition that often manifests in a correspondence of physical to mental states. Any disturbance will arouse a slumbering susceptibility, but no amount of provocation can awaken what is not within. La grippe grips literally the sensitive creatures who fear or anticipate it, and especially numerous among its victims are slaves of fashion and people in general who submit to tyranny, stand in awe of customs, or fail to live a truly independent life in thought and action. In the South a belief in the influence of "Hoodoo" is deeply engrafted in the coloured people and many white people share it; this is nothing other than an effect of long-time oppression. Negroes are the easiest to mesmerise and the hardest to teach of almost any people; this is an effect of their servitude; a servile attitude is one which must be conquered before truth can take an abiding hold and permanently heal the one who has embraced it. Truth alone makes free; without love of freedom and determination to be free little progress can be made in spiritual healing.

Liberal Jews and Unitarians are usually easier to treat than "Orthodox" persons, because fear of hell and a devil does not hold them; they also grasp the idea of the unity of all life more readily. Microbes are no proper part of the world's population; they only represent inversion of force; they are primarily effects, though secondarily they may be causes of disease; under the microscope their activities can be interestingly observed, and in the voracity of certain species and their hostility to their neighbours we can see a perfect out-picturing of human rapacity and discord. Emulation is good; all desire to excel is lawful, but competitive strife must be outgrown before we can secure health in the human body. If men and women live like sharks and tigers they must share their destiny, for it is only on the basis of a new and higher life for mankind that perfect health can be predicted. There is absolutely no danger whatever in trusting the directing voice of one's own true self, but blind submission to outside influences paralyses the will and opens the door to manifold delusions. Spiritual healing takes unseen influences into account, but boldly declares we can be controlled by nothing unless we wish to be. If you have never made a declaration of moral and mental independence make it at once, for all safety and salvation is in it, and until we declare ourselves free we are bound by race beliefs and errors of every description. Selfishness expressed in miserliness is a fruitful source of misery. Many confirmed rheumatics must be brought out of niggardliness or they cannot be delivered from their infirmity. Again and again we have known healers to fail because they did not attack the error at its source; for this reason we refuse to cater to selfishness in any form, and stinginess is a very common and contemptible form of this prevailing vice. Do all the free work you like among the poor, but do not permit anyone to boast of receiving free treatment from a mental healer when the patient is the wife of a millionaire glittering with diamonds, and the healer is a hard-working woman earning her own and her children's livelihood. "Freely ye have received, freely give" applies on both sides. "The workman is worthy of his recompense." In spiritual work the same divine principle of equity must govern in small things and in great; business transactions can and must be adjusted to the Golden Rule, and it is for those who see deeper into the truth than the majority to wed business to equity in so unmistakable a manner that their word and moral influence will be felt in commercial as well as in religious circles. Though special disorders proceeded originally from special wrongs, we are to-day caught in the meshes of a race web, and must extricate ourselves therefrom by uncompromising assertion of will. I will to be free, therefore I am free; I will not be held by error, therefore I cannot be. Use these pregnant, forceful sentences with bold determination to accomplish your release, and never forget that if only one soul stands up for freedom all souls are helped to freedom in consequence, for we are all members one of another. No one ever gains a real moral or intellectual victory over sense-limitations without making the road easier and the incentive greater for all strugglers who come after.

LESSON X.

A Practical Lesson on the Most Direct Method of Spiritual Healing.

As healing means making whole, entire, perfect, no work which falls short of bringing into expression enough of man's latent spiritual energy to make him "every whit whole" is adequate healing. We all toddle before we walk, and as the state of childhood is good while it lasts, but is destined to melt into a riper condition, so in our study of Spiritual Science and in our endeavour to apply its theorems and axioms in daily practice, we must grow perpetually in what theologians call grace, which is the law of Spirit as opposed to the ever-changing illusive laws of mortal ordinance. There is but one Life and but one Law; the sooner we give up all attempts to live by more rules than one, the better it will be for all of us. In the world to-day there is a widespread belief that we are under the dominion of two opposing forces, and so far does mortal thought travel on this false and illogical track, that we hear from leading theosophists and other "advanced" thinkers, as well as from "orthodox" people, that the physical nature is at war with the spiritual, and that what builds up the one antagonises the other. This view is entirely erroneous and can only be accounted for by propounding one of two incomprehensible theories; either that of so-called Christian Science, which is that the external man is but an illusion and has no existence whatever out of the sense dream in which we all are existing, or that there is a devil almost equal to God, and that our bodies come from him, while our spirits are divine. To declare opposition between man's interior and exterior nature, is to land the student in hopeless confusion; to proclaim and demonstrate harmony is the task allotted to healer and teacher alike. Here let us emphasise our strongest statement with regard to healing, viz., that it is inseparable from teaching; no one who is "healed but not taught" is in reality healed at all. Everybody desires health, and health means harmony within and without; harmony in social and business life, as well as freedom from mental distress and bodily pain; and as this harmony can only come through giving oneself up unreservedly to the affirmation ALL IS GOOD and everything it implies, any halting or compromise is disastrous and throws the would-be demonstrator back into the nethermost hell or slough of despond from which a few preliminary lessons or treatments may have partially lifted him. Never forget that conformity to the follies of the age can never lead you higher than the level of those to whose stupidity you conform; therefore pride yourself upon the maintenance of your true individuality. The more unlike other people you are the better, and this you will soon discover when an epidemic breaks out and your negative fashion-led neighbours "take it" while you steadfastly and successfully decline it. You should have no concern whatever with the opinions and beliefs of people about you when you are studying Mental Science. A man of business has the gout; a housekeeper is a martyr to rheumatism; a clergyman is too hoarse to preach; and so it goes through a long list of prominent people in religious and literary circles, while you dare to declare for yourself freedom from the ills of all these people. Your declaration of independence is nonsensical, however, if only made with the tongue; to say one thing and feel or do another, is to deceive yourself more than anybody else, for other people see your inconsistencies and ridicule them. In the first place, then, let us set out with a dauntless resolve to differ from the aching, groaning, self-confessed sinners about us, and deny once for all the necessity for aches and groans. Our first step will be our most desperate one, and possibly the most trying, for it means a wrenching away from much that we have been taught to believe is God's holy will, viz.: That man should suffer with patient resignation every ill he is called upon to bear. We must substitute overcome for suffer, and effort for resignation, then we can read Job to good advantage. Many theosophists say publicly that a vegetarian diet is the only lawful one, but they eat flesh to sustain their bodily health and vigour: such a position is utterly misleading, as it contradicts the cardinal basis of ethics, which is, that the lower nature can only be preserved and perfected by obedience to the demands of the higher. A physician or anybody who recommends any form of licentiousness is utterly unfit to teach anything concerning health, and the experience gained in his own profession ought to teach him that to govern lower appetites is the only way to make them serve the intellect. The vast amount of force now expended in passional indulgence will in a better state of society be turned to enrich the brain, and made available for every good and worthy purpose. Eating and drinking are natural processes and do not go against conviction; there is nothing repulsive in the thought of taking the fruits of the earth and appropriating them to our service; but if a mixed form of diet is looked upon as sinful by any set of people, let them live according to the strictest rule of Buddhism and eat no meat and drink no wine. These matters when treated from an external standpoint are no part of spiritual instruction, but when dwelt upon from the vantage ground of principle they are all included in the direction given to students never to let a lower influence interfere with a higher one. In place of the old adage, "Of two evils choose the lesser," let us suggest "Of two goods choose the greater," by which we mean that whenever it seems as though we must quell our appetites or quench the spirit, always say to the Spirit of Truth, YOU ARE MY ONLY AUTHORITY; then remain silent until your inward eyes are opened wide enough to let you discern the better path. There is but one road to health, and that is to acknowledge but one absolute guide. Spiritualists and others frequently err in setting up personalities as idols, and though they have a perfect right to communicate with those miscalled "the departed," we must never deem any voice infallible except the voice of God in our own inmost nature. We must advance from priests to prophets before we can become successful ministers of the everlasting gospel. Formulas are valuable for beginners, but we soon weary of formal repetitions, thus as we advance in practice we discard old sentences and vary our words with the need and inspirations of the hour. To pledge oneself to do as somebody else does, is to submit to stultification and to stand purposely still while even our idol may be progressing. In giving a bare skeleton of the method of treating common to all metaphysical healers we are obliged to use terse language which often appears sententious, but the student must never lose sight of the fact that "a sound form of words" is an exact statement of ascertained truth, and growth beyond certain limits does not imply that we shall unlearn or change our opinions about what we once knew. God is strength; I am strong because I am God's child, and being such I can never know weakness. Here, for instance, is an example of a pattern formula; it is a good model and deserves careful study. If you wish to test its efficacy in cases of weariness, the best way to experiment is to take it up and hold it, repeating it over and over until the language interprets itself to you and you feel the power of the idea which created such speech as its symbol-garment. God is perfect peace. I, His child, can never know strife or feel the least disturbed, no matter what may happen; this is another sample form of affirmation coupled with denial of error which necessarily grows out of it. Use this likewise and feel the rest and sense of security it will bring—then branch out beyond all stated words and use whatever words come to you. If we would let in the songs of birds and odours of flowers as well as the light and air, we must open our casements. If windows and doors have been tightly sealed for a long time they are often hard to unclose, but the effort required to open them the first time is the greatest we shall have to make; they will soon open easily if opened frequently. Most of us live in cages behind bars, and as we were born in captivity we take our confinement as a matter of course; still as our caged condition is unnatural, we suffer like birds and animals in captivity from numerous artificial disorders unknown in a state of nature. Anybody can free you from the outside if you are willing to be freed, but the mere act of taking you out of prison does not furnish you with strength to walk or means to earn a livelihood. It is better to drop chains gradually than to have them taken off by another and then put them on again or let someone else put them back for you. Spectacles, ear-trumpets, bandages, trusses, etc., are all impossible to anyone who has clearly seen the light and means to walk in it. Medicines are detestable to persons in a healthy mental condition; but all these things must be discarded by the patient himself when he has grown to see a better way; to take them away from him while he continues to believe in their efficacy, and therefore wishes to hold on to them, would be to arouse antagonism and fasten his affection upon them all the more. A question often asked us is, Can you treat in conjunction with a physician? Our answer is, We do not recognise medicine, therefore its use is no obstacle to our giving mental treatment when asked to do so; were we asked to pay clandestine visits to a doctor's patient and be smuggled into the house unbeknown to the family we should decline to be parties to a deceitful act, the result of which could only engender fear of detection and other base emotions in the patient and the persons who summoned us. We regard medicine as worthless in the presence of truth acknowledged; but we do not esteem cowardice a virtue nor will we countenance duplicity. Another query has reference to treating people without their knowledge or consent; there's another point of difference among scientists. We stand for straightforwardness all the time and should no more desire to take mental than physical liberties. Offer your services wherever you choose, but never force them; and bear in mind that coercion is utterly unscientific, and though hypnotists under various names effect temporary cures, they are not healers when they work in the dark, for they do not permanently benefit their subjects. The average health of most people is very unsatisfactory, therefore it is not a herculean task to restore people to their so-called normal health which is far below par. Spiritual healing means lifting one to a height never before scaled; it is not a mere substitute for a footbath and hot compresses in case of cold, or in place of ice on the head and hot baths for the feet in fever. Our ordinary negative condition keeps us in a state of chronic depletion and liability to derangement under the slightest provocation; we desire to be made whole, which means that we would fain reach a higher level than any we have gained yet. A Spiritual healer and teacher is not content with curing a cold or headache, or driving away pains from any part of the system; his aim being to induce the real self of the sufferer to respond to an intelligent appeal and put his own house in order. In housekeeping, if you are a sloven, though a neighbour is always coming in to tidy you up, your rooms never remain in order, for you soon disarrange their contents; your body is like your house; you have the management of it and must learn how to keep it in order after your friend who has been treating you has been trying to help you. Lessons learned in a cooking school give us a hint how to set about healing; any good teacher of the culinary art does a thing herself and then shows the pupils how to repeat the experiment successfully. People too lazy to learn and too indolent to apply the science of health must call upon mental healers when they are ailing, which is likely to be often, but strong, vigorous thinkers who are resolved to master conditions for themselves will find how unnecessary it is to be always on anyone's books or in anyone's hands. I will here give you an item of personal experience. The writer of this lesson was a public lecturer at sixteen years of age, travelled extensively, and spoke under inspiration; but though mental illumination was rarely lacking, physical conditions (draughts, wet feet, etc.) would induce severe throat difficulty, often disabling from work. Several years ago someone lent me "Science and Health" by Mrs. Eddy, and from the very hour I grasped the underlying truth of "Christian Science." I saw the way out of colds and hoarseness, and year by year I grow freer and freer from even the slightest tendency to any pulmonary or vocal difficulty. Both my parents were afflicted with bronchial trouble and other nervous affections which I seemingly inherited; BUT I HAVE CONQUERED THEM, and in days to come I know I shall vanquish whatever remains for me to put down, with the firm foot of determined resolution. I find myself able to accomplish hundreds of things I could never have done had it not been for my resolve to live down the errors which hampered me and seriously impeded my progress through childhood. I do not wish to intrude my personality; but as nothing helps students like individual testimony, I will tell them a little of what I know. I was formerly diffident in the extreme and though my vocal organs were nearly perfect I would stammer painfully in the presence of strangers, though I could chatter by the hour when not embarrassed, without the least impediment. I overcame nervousness by affirming my perfect fearlessness and asserting my power to hold all rightful sway over all the organs of my body. I can if necessary lecture fourteen or fifteen times a week besides travelling and doing a pile of literary work without any fatigue whatever; I confess, I do not get along as easily if I am placed in the midst of a number of depressing croakers, but directly I realise the stupidity of their position, simply by rejoicing in my superior intelligence I ward off their otherwise depressing "magnetism" and then am ready to help them to get above their low condition. A teacher or healer who cringes and sympathises with disease takes on everything undesirable and is thus unfitted for work of any kind. To be in proper condition for work one must be extremely self-assertive and yet not in the least antagonistic or unduly masterful, for we must respect everybody else's rights as fully as our own. This being the only safe and proper rule of conduct, we can easily see how it is that so many people fail in bringing harmony to pass in their homes and business life. The old error confronting all of us which we need incessantly to rebut, is that people wish to do wrong; instead of that they are simply ignorant. Sin is another word for ignorant misdemeanour; the real self never sins and never wishes to. In treating yourself or another you must never judge by appearances; they must be steadily ignored as the true self is held up to view. If you think of anyone with whom you are in any relation as being aught that is disagreeable, you conjure up a picture of the very state you wish to annihilate. It may not be easy at first to look upon everybody kindly and sweetly, but it must be done if we would really help others and effectually protect ourselves. Sympathy must be reserved for the objects we approve and never wasted upon delusions or allowed to intensify the very ailments we seek to destroy. I sympathise with your desire to be healthy, strong, happy, prosperous, well and usefully employed, etc., etc., and I will do all in my power to render you assistance to attain your end; but I refuse to sympathise with your sufferings, as you and I both want to overcome them, and conquest is gained only through resolute defiance. A cowardly cur will snap at you and show a pretended disposition to bite if he feels that you are weak enough to fear him—for an animal's quick instinct reads your fear sooner than you detect it yourself—while the most courageous beast will run off if you give him a dose of vril from your human eyes, which dispense lightning when you have grown to man's estate, but not so long as you remain in mental babyhood. Will and intelligence, though seemingly two, are in reality one; they must be cultivated and used jointly. Desire and expectation must work together in all things or there is a missing link in your chain, or at least a weak link, and no one can dispute the fact that a single weak link in a very long and otherwise strong chain renders it practically valueless. Let us face up our besetting weaknesses and we shall soon see what special point in our armour needs strengthening most. With one it is fear that is the bugbear; with another it is covetousness, revenge, or some other base impulse proving that the animal is not yet subjugated. Remember, you will lose your dog if there is one weak link in the chain by which you hold him, as when he pulls at it that link breaks though all others are strong, and off he runs. To be always lamenting one's weakness is sheer folly, and moreover it is a most depressing practice; but to have sense enough to repair the chain where it most needs it, is to do the one thing needful; both confidence and docility are therefore needed. We must be brave, yet teachable; ever ready to confess our relative ignorance and at the same time hold on with tenacity to the only rope by which we can be drawn out of the river of weakness, on to the bank of strength, which is confidence in our divinity. God and man are one; be not afraid to proclaim human nature divine; but while declaring on behalf of man's inseparableness from Deity shun utterly the ridiculous belief that you or any other special persons are any nearer to the Infinite than all your brothers and sisters throughout the universe. Read all bibles and gladly pay tribute to whatever is helpful in all literature, but never permit the thought that the last word of divine revelation will ever be given to man. As we contrast the immeasurable vastness of continuous revelation with orthodox contractions we feel to cry out to the whole world—How can you remain another instant in a cellar when all the light and glory of heaven's sunshine is your portion if you will but leave your holes and come forth into the gardens? Man is a limitless being, the potencies of life immortal are within him; he has but to declare his birthright; then when he realises the divinity of his true will he can banish every obstacle from his path for ever. God's will and mine are one. In this all-powerful sentence the key is found to all genuine progress here and hereafter. In order to assist those among our students who may feel the necessity of having some clearly printed formulas for suggestive use, we close this lesson with some profitable sentences which, in substance, if not in exact language, have long been in use by many successful practitioners of our acquaintance and which we have often used in our own class-rooms with manifest good results.

STATEMENT OF BEING.

One Supreme Creator.
One Basis of Life—Spirit.
One Governing Law—Love.

God is { The-All. / Good. / Spirit. }

God is { Omnipotent. / Omniscient. / Omnipresent. }

God is Spirit. I, in my real being, am spiritual, governed by Love; therefore whole, happy and harmonious.

DENIALS.

I deny as realities	Evil,	because	God,	The-All	is	Good.
	Matter,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Spirit.
	Sin,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Holiness.
	Error,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Truth.
	Sickness,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Health.
	Sorrow,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Gladness.
	Death,	,,	,,	,,	,,	Life.

MEDITATION.

It is not in matter we can look for life, substance, or intelligence. These are attributes of Spirit. God, Infinite Spirit, is The-All; hence there is no matter as an eternal reality.

Sin, sickness, sorrow, and death are not realities, because God, Infinite Good, fills all space to the exclusion of all that is unlike Himself. Sin is error; sickness is caused by the belief that matter can feel; sorrow results from belief in the reality of something other than good; the sense of death is belief that life can cease, when life is in truth immortal.

AFFIRMATIONS.

God is all Life, Love, Light, Truth, Power, Goodness, Harmony.

I am a child of God, a special thought of the Most High, and in His Love I live and move and have my being.

Like God, I am spirit and I reflect His love, goodness, intelligence.

I am governed by His law of love. In my real being I cannot sin or suffer for sin, or fear sin, sickness, or death.

God works through me to will and to do whatever I ought to do.

I no longer fear that evil can enter my life, that health can fail me, or strength leave me. Thou, O God, art my present help.

LESSON XI.

Concentration: Its Development and Use.

THE REAL ANTIDOTE TO HYSTERIA.

No erroneous expression more frequently reaches our ears than the absurd phrase, "I cannot concentrate upon anything," when the very persons who most frequently make the remark, are constantly engaged in the very act of concentration they declare themselves unable to perform. There is, however, a vast difference between the unprofitable objects upon which they concentrate time and attention and the highly profitable themes upon which it is necessary for them to concentrate if they sincerely desire to practically demonstrate the teachings of mental or spiritual science. Our special attention has recently been called in the most marked degree to the utter absorption in material engagements falsely called duties of multitudes of men and women, who wonder why they do not progress more rapidly in metaphysical attainments and ask for information from teachers as to the special error which is detaining them in grievous bondage to the senses. We are not fanatics, we do not advocate self-starvation, going without decent clothing, proper furniture or anything else which is reasonable in our present external states. But we do declare most emphatically that the world is going to take a decided turn toward beautiful simplicity and discard all the absurdities with which it is now uselessly bedecked. Two directly opposite features of civilisation are prominently displayed everywhere. The first of these tendencies is in the wise and proper direction of all sorts of labour-saving appliances calculated to free humanity from most of the monotonous humdrum of housekeeping, etc.; the other tendency is to a luxury equal to that of old Babylon or the Roman Empire, just before its fall. Nature is beautiful; beauty is natural and orderly and should be cultivated everywhere. Health is beautiful, while disease is hideous, but beauty does not consist in false appendages and savage decorations; it is to be found only in the perfect order and delightful symmetry which invariably characterises the true home maker as well as the genuine home. Home makers are Marys, housekeepers are Marthas, and they are widely different persons. Concentration is never difficult when we pay close attention for any length of time to whatever engrosses our affections. Persons who are in the love of externals and are just beginning to seek interior development, are not close reasoners and they are certainly not given to profound studies; moreover the inner chambers of their consciousness are nearly closed; for these reasons and many others they find the attempt to concentrate upon anything more important than frivolity, a hard task, as all new tasks appear hard, but the difficulties attending them at the outset, soon vanish if we steadily apply ourselves to continuing their performance. Metaphysical studies carry the students at once entirely beyond the plane of sense; they invite deep thought on new lines; they call for serious independent study away from the landing stages of established precedent; for that reason if for no other they call for efforts along new lines. Unless new paths of thought are trodden there is no logical or reasonable ground for expecting real improvement in our outward conditions. Generation and regeneration are alike from within outward, seeking to heal the physical body as such, by mental methods directly is an inversive process, but scientific mental healing is not thus attempted or accomplished. Mental states are reproduced in the physique and that is all that needs to be known concerning them by persons engaging in mental therapeutic practice, but persons entirely ignorant of the science of correspondences having no conception whatever of the law of intercourse between soul and body are very apt to do a good deal of blind and bungling work unless they keep strictly to a purely spiritual idea of man as a spiritual entity, perfect in his real being, and ignore the body altogether. Instantaneous cures form the topic of much speculation and a good deal of confused thinking, among people who look for immediate results and are greatly in love with magic. There are no doubt many cases where a single treatment will start a permanent cure and not only start it, but prove it is an actual occurrence there and then; but such cases are usually of persons whose ailments are either not very deep seated or of long standing, or they are the experiences of people who may have had hundreds of treatments in various ways before, and are now just ready to respond instantly to the ray of sunshine which does the finishing stroke in bringing a bud to bloom. We have all seen advanced buds open under our very eyes in the bright hot sunshine, but on the same twig of the tree many other buds less mature have not opened widely though they have been equally kissed by the same sunbeam; our reason has told us very plainly in the presence of so natural and frequent a phenomenon that the buds which burst forth so suddenly into blossoms were in an advanced stage of growth, while the other buds were less mature; exactly so it is when a ray of healing truth touches a brightened intellect, if that mind is ready to respond instantly it has long been emerging from its night; if it responds but slowly it may be equally receptive to the solar radiance but more work has to be accomplished before a manifest result is forthcoming. Whenever anyone is sincere in his desire to bless and the individual he appeals to is honestly ready to respond to a call of truth, positive good results from treatment, but we can fix no time for perfect manifestation; and neither the New Testament or any work which records great wonders of healing leads the reader to infer that similar results as to time were always forthcoming. There is certainly a gospel record of people getting well very quickly who had been grievously afflicted for long periods, twelve years, and thirty-eight years are periods distinctly named as covering the duration of seemingly incurable infirmities which seemed to have yielded at once to the call of the spirit, but a glance at such narratives opens a vast field of profitable research into mental qualifications for immediate or rapid restoration to health. The woman with an issue of blood had tried everything known to physical science, had been everywhere and done everything, as people say for the benefit of her health which did not improve but grew steadily worse; her purse became empty and her faith in physical aid vanished to a point. One by one she had been forced to relinquish her hold on matter, her only remaining chance of deliverance was in SPIRIT and though her case might appear not only desperate but incurable from the physical standpoint she was in a far more receptive condition in the presence of a truly spiritual healer than were those who carry a medicine bottle in one hand and reach out the other for mental treatment. Though it is a disgraceful statement to make that any disease is incurable, it is quite true that many diseases cannot be even palliated with drugs, thus from the standpoint of the pharmacist with his wretchedly limited resources they are incurable. Assigning to medicine its rightful place and honourably crediting it with all its advocates say it can accomplish, there remains an ever increasing residue of ailments which it cannot possibly relieve, and these are multiplying in consequence of the peculiar psychic and other changes now going on among all classes of the community. Scalds, burns, sprains, bruises and all such things are amenable to lotions, poultices and the general papaphernalia of medicine, but these are only superficial ailments arising it is true from lack of balance and therefore attributable primarily to mental weakness, or carelessness; but the heavy burden of sickness now resting on the race is hysterical in its nature. Regular physicians are quite right in referring the bulk of modern difficulties to hysteria, but what hysteria is, and how to overcome it, is by no means a settled question in the schools. Everybody considers hysteria a nervous derangement, but what is the cause of nervous derangement is the question demanding the reply it does not receive from the majority of schoolmen who, as a rule, are not well enough versed in casuistry to trace nervous effects to their mental causes though they frequently see clearly enough how physical derangements proceed from distorted nerves. Mental science proceeds to deal with hysteria scientifically, not by recognising the ailment and fixing the attention upon it, but by diverting the sufferer's mind entirely from it, which can only be done by holding up for fixed attention an opposite idea. Henry Wood has very clearly shown the value of the true method of mental suggestion in his admirable treatise on the subject published by Lee and Shephard of Boston. The true method as outlined in that book and practised by all truly successful mental healers, is to concentrate one's own mental gaze upon a beautiful picture—the special one if possible in all your mental gallery whose suggestiveness most nearly accords with your own or your patient's special immediate necessity. We hope our students have by this time learned that we operate through the law of contradictories; thus, if a person is suffering the results of mental starvation, you proceed to judiciously administer appropriate mental food; if he is suffering from heart-hunger you evince honest affection and proceed to lead the patient to eat and drink of the true bread and water of life immortal. NEVER PICTURE A DISEASE AND NEVER FIGHT ONE. Mental diagnosis is diagnosis of NECESSITY; it bears no relation to diagnosis of ailments, yet it furnishes the only weapon wherewith disorders can be slain. It literally overcomes evil with good. When good enters our interiors it does its work there; how foolish and blind then are those who seek to vanquish errors by attacking them; let good and truth enter your affections and your intellects and permit results to follow in undisturbed course. Concentration upon disease is a deadly infernal process; concentration upon health is celestial. If people who seek to study mental therapeutics would but master the idea of influx and how to regulate it, they would not be all astray as they are, floundering about among vain devices for killing sin by looking at it, which is a hideously disorderly process, frequently resulting in the would-be healer's suffering from contamination himself, while the person he seeks to relieve does not recover. Clairvoyant diagnosis of disease is not orderly but diagnosis of NECESSITY is intensely profitable; we do not by any means discourage the practice of clairvoyance, but we do seek to direct it into upper channels. Clairvoyance is so wide a word that it covers the sight of a cat playing with cockroaches and hunting mice in the dark, and a perception of how to save a human being from suicide and despair. When we are honest with ourselves we acknowledge that we often find ourselves concentrating involuntarily upon such things as are most intimately conjoined with our affections and such discoveries are very useful if we steer clear of the false practice of many, which is to dwell upon these low conjunctions, pronounce them inevitable by reason of heredity or something else, and then confirm ourselves in the evil of them through a confession of weakness which is unreal. We never need continue to dwell upon anything unless we wish to, for the human will is supreme in man as Divine Will is supreme in the Universe. The Law of Being is no more absolute in infinity than is the human will in its own domain; every human entity is possessed of individual will which is so potent in the sphere which the individual occupies, that it governs his entire relation to the universe. Will grows by what it feeds upon; all its tendencies are strengthened by exercise, and no sooner does a man or woman, or even a little child, will to accomplish a result than a magnet is set in operation to attract whatever may be stedfastly desired. Hysteria proceeds from a sense of impotent or thwarted will; the only radical permanent cure is to give the hysterieist distinctly to understand that nothing can come between him and the fulfilment of his just desires, if he will but persistently regard every event which transpires as a means of carrying him nearer his goal or bringing nearer to him the object he is pursuing with desire. Concentration to be really worthful must not only be rightful as to its object, but persistent in its method. Spasmodic attempts at concentration, though not entirely useless, are of small account, just as occasional attempts to study music or a language are not entirely vain, but they result in very little. To concentrate feasibly upon a given theme continuously it is necessary to understand clearly what is meant by steadily directing one's intention and expectation. To desire a result and not to expect it is to invite opposite orders of influx which mutually conflict. Indecision is itself a disease, and the prolific mother of ailments of every sort, and so long as indecision continues it is impossible to achieve any satisfactory results. Whenever you desire to take a special exercise in concentration pass in mental review all the things you could do, and then fix your attention upon the one thing you select as that which you must do. Hold firmly to this single idea and pursue it steadily, no matter what your outer engagements may be. As we often have to cross oceans and deserts to reach countries where we desire to dwell, so do we often have to cross mental waste places to reach the land of our desire, but when we are on the sea or passing through the wilderness we must all the while have our gaze fixed upon the object of our pursuit. Many people could attain to the loftiest eminences who are now pining in obscure captivity if they would only awake to the consciousness of how to attain their desired end by regulating their thought where they now are. One person may travel between Chicago and Boston by the Lake Shore, another by the Michigan Central route, but they reach the same city when the train reaches its final terminus, so it is possible for different persons to arrive at precisely the same results, though their incidental voyagings have been exceedingly dissimilar. There are more routes than one to the mental station we desire to reach; but we never take any route which will take us thither till we learn how to expect as well as what to desire. Go to your daily task whatever it may be, firmly resolved to see in it a way to the accomplishment of your dearest hopes and most glorious ambitions. Glorify the common place as you tread the road of humble daily service, conscious of the interior side of the work you are performing. Cook food, mend linen, do chamber work, run errands, serve behind a counter, work at a carpenter's bench or a blacksmith's forge, clean shoes, or sweep streets, but never for a moment permit yourself to lose sight of the blessed truth that heaven with all its glories is just as near the workshop as the cathedral. Do your work, whatever it may be, day by day, utterly regardless of the thought and speech of the world, but never unmindful of the high spiritual vocation to which you feel you are called. Then enlarge correspondingly your idea of mental healing; take the thought of it with you into every field of service wherein you may be called to work, and soon it will dawn upon you that whenever you are called upon to render any service whatsoever you are called upon to give your very best. Never do only what is outwardly required of you; realise that through such outward avenues of service as may open, gates are flung wide for the ingress and egress of the highest spiritual influence of which you can form any idea. In this way concentration on a given goal becomes intensely practical in every walk of life for all people in all conditions.

LESSON XII.

Practical Illustrations of the Correspondences between Mental States and their Physical Expressions.

Swedenborg's doctrine of correspondences, though often regarded as fanciful, wherein it relates to an interior meaning of Holy Scripture, cannot be reasonably dismissed as incapable of demonstration when it directly relates to human anatomy and physiology, for the statements of this renowned seer and sage are susceptible of direct verification on the part of all who are ready to bestow upon the subject something of the careful attention its extreme importance demands.

No fallacy can be greater than that physiology countenances materialism, it goes an immense way toward disproving it, and those professors who teach materialism to their classes in medical colleges are doing flagrant injustice to their theme by renouncing the logical deductions of science for the vapid vaporings of sciolism, for in no single instance do the facts of science point otherwise than in distinctly spiritual direction. Camille Flammarion, the eminent French naturalist and astronomer, declares in his admirable treatise, "Dieu dans la nature," that the entire human structure can be remodelled in less than one year; something over eleven months he gives as the longest time occupied in effecting the complete transformation of these portions of the body which take longest to change, while some parts of the structure, he declares, can be remodelled in about 30 days. Flammarion is one of the greatest scientists of the world, and a most illustrious member of the French Academy of Sciences, one of the grandest assemblies of scientific minds ever brought together on this planet. If this statement by Flammarion is correct, and we have no reason to dispute its accuracy, the baseless assumption that the physical brain stores up all memories, and that consciousness is dependent upon a certain conformation of the grey matter of which it is composed, is self-evidently absurd. Dr. J. R. Buchanan, in the introductory chapter of his massive work "Therapeutic Sarcognomy," brings forward many cogent reasons and powerful proofs in demonstration of his statement that LIFE IS A SPIRITUAL POWER, while Alfred Russel Wallace in the concluding chapter of his treatise entitled "Darwinism," Joseph Le Conte in his "Relation of Evolution to Religious Thought," and many other authors of equally distinguished rank and ability in their respective lines, are concurrent in their testimony to the truth of a purely spiritual basis for human origin. Man is not life in himself, but is the recipient of life from God; life is communicated to man by perpetual influx; this is a truth to which man's entire anatomy corresponds in the physical degree, but notwithstanding this reality we all appear to live from ourselves, and this appearance is necessary to endow each of us with a sense of individual self-hood, without which there can be no possible development of individual character and excellence. All who have carefully studied the preceding lessons cannot fail to perceive that we lay very great stress upon a recognition of individuality in every instance, and we desire to emphasise this point as forcibly as possible because of our daily demonstrated experience to the effect that all really successful persons, no matter what their line of occupation may be, have cultivated an intense sense of individual responsibility, while the shiftless, easily depressed, and generally unsuccessful, no matter what their line of attempted action, are to be found among those who think little of individual worth, and in some cases fail to perceive that any such a thing as individuality really exists. An old English poet has given us the line, "The soul hath form and doth the body make." This is true; equally true is the statement that man on earth has two bodies, an outer and an inner—"there is a natural and there is a spiritual body," from the latter the former takes its shape and functions. The relation between the spiritual and natural bodies is so intimate that so long as the physical remains alive it is the constant recipient of vitality from the spiritual; the physical body exists only through the law of correspondence, and this correspondence is of part to part and function to function. In some of the writings of Swedenborg, also in those of Dr. J. R. Buchanan, we find the brain and the body spoken of as though they were two, and in a very interesting work, "Physiological Correspondences," by Rev. John Worcester, all the parts of the body are enumerated and treated upon severally in successive chapters, after which comes an essay upon generation and regeneration, and finally a treatise upon the brain. It is not our intention to try and separate the brain from the body as though it were distinct, but we do cordially assign to it the most important place in man's organic structure, and therefore we will consider it first. In Swedenborg's "True Christian Religion" we read, "All things in man relate to the will and the understanding; understanding is a receptacle of Divine Truth, the will of Divine Good. Therefore the human mind, which consists of those two principles, is nothing else than a form of Divine Truth and Divine Good spiritually and naturally organised. The human brain is that form; and because the whole man depends upon his mind all things in his body are appendages, which are actuated and live from those two principles. In Divine Love and Wisdom we read, "Man's life in its beginning is in the brain, and its derivatives in the body;" and in yet another of Swedenborg's writings we find the following: "The whole body, and all things in it, are forms under the observation, guidance, and control of the mind, which is in the brain, and so constructed in dependence upon it that the part in which the mind is not present, or to which it does not give its own life, is not a part of the life of the man." The seat of will is in the cerebellum, and the seat of understanding in the cerebrum. It is often said that during sleep, which is of the cerebrum, the cerebellum rules the body, and if before going to sleep the cerebrum fixes the hour for waking the cerebellum thus instructed wakes the cerebrum at the appointed time. As the subject of dreaming is always of great interest, and dreams have a great effect upon health and happiness, it may be well to consider what Mr. Worcester and others have enlarged upon, viz., that we can see in dreams a reflection of the prevailing tendencies of our will, and among these tendencies are often found some of an unpleasing character which can be overcome by steady determination to keep the thought fixed before falling asleep upon such topics as meet with our highest approbation, and concerning which we should be pleased to derive added information during sleep. The very texture of the cerebrum being directly affected by our modes of thinking it is not difficult to see that mere size of brain is not so important as quality, and were we able to minutely examine by some psychic process the brain structure of various persons whose dispositions and attainments we desire to read, we should assuredly find that spiritually-minded people have soft, orderly brains, while the brain of the sensualist is of a coarse texture and disorderly in form. Softening of the brain is supposed to be a terrible and incurable disease; but the pathological condition called by that name is a loss of vitality and general wasting away of the texture, while the harmonious physiological softening of the texture refers to improvement in the degree of greater delicacy or refinement of quality, as we distinguish rich, soft fabrics which are wonderfully enduring, from harsh, coarse textures which do not wear anything like so well. It would require a series of lessons of considerable length to enter into anything like a sufficient description of the brain to give the student a fair idea of its importance and the magnitude of its sway over the entire body; we will only ask all who read this lesson to strive to realise that through the brain the entire body is acted upon, therefore to arouse certain emotions in the brain by mental or telepathic action is to awaken correspondent organs to the discharge of their proper functions in any part of the body. For the following concise summary of important statements concerning the brain we are considerably indebted to Rev. John Worcester's Physiological Correspondences already alluded to, from whose elaborate dissertations we have condensed the pith as we understand it. The cerebrum is divided into hemispheres, and may be regarded in general as divided into two distinct sets of regions—those of CONSCIOUS SENSE and those of ACTION. The regions of sense lie in the lower and hinder part of the cerebrum; the region of action lies toward the front, and occupies all of the lobes immediately above the temples. In the area obliquely upward and backward from the ears devoted to perception of sensations there is a simple arrangement of convolutions proceeding from below upwards in natural sequence from voluntary (or instinctive) to intellectual. The sense of touch resides in the large convolutions in the base of the cerebrum under the great ventricles. Upward behind the line of the ears, and backward, we find convolutions respectively devoted to taste, smell, hearing, and sight; those devoted to sight are by far the largest. Above and in front of the region of sight lie the convolutions which control the movements of the legs; those which move the arms are above the ears and somewhat forward; the face is controlled by the upper part of the frontal convolutions; the faculty of speech lies in the lower part just above the temples. "Through the fibres, the mind when it is in its thought from the understanding, and affection from the will, has extension into all things of the whole body." It seems from all this that a perfect knowledge of the brain would be a sufficient education for the practical therapeutist who desires to affect the entire organic structure or any portion of it by appeal to the seat of consciousness whence all motion is derived. We do not consider it at all necessary to place physical fingers upon the scalp to arouse the faculties of the brain, but contend that the telepathic method, minus any sort of physical contact, is all sufficient, though there are no doubt many persons, both among healers and patients, who are so strongly wedded to external methods and so deeply engrossed in physical sensations that they do actually find it necessary in their present stage of development to manipulate the skull. Let such act as they deem best, and they may rest secure in the conviction that an earnest desire to do good, accompanied by the assurance that good will be accomplished is never effort thrown away; but our specific object is to call the most direct attention to those psychical methods of reaching results, which, when once fairly apprehended, completely distance and banish all necessity for physical appliances. We will now take a glance at the EYES and then at the EARS, as so many people applying for mental treatment everywhere complain of defective sight or hearing. Let us see if we cannot gather some definite idea from correspondence as to how we may successfully aid in bringing about a greatly-improved condition in these important organs. Eyes have been well called "windows of the soul," and when we dwell a little upon their formation we shall learn to appreciate better the force of this scientific though poetic definition. Swedenborg says in his Arcana Celestia, "The eye is the most noble organ of the face, and communicates with the understanding more immediately than the other sensory organs." "It has been made plain to me by much experience that the sight of the left eye corresponds to truths which are of the understanding, and the right eye to affections of truth which are also of the understanding; hence the left eye corresponds to truths of faith, and the right eye to good things of faith." Mr. Worcester suggests and we think very wisely that the foregoing passage teaches that the left eye corresponds to the understanding of things we clearly perceive to be so, and the right eye to the understanding of things we love; the left eye then corresponds to the understanding of what is true, and the right eye to the understanding of what is good. A very valuable hint is given here, which may be well followed, as to the most practical and correct mental attitude to sustain when the special case in hand is a need of clearer vision. Partial, if not total, blindness is very prevalent in schools and colleges; the spectacled student of eighteen or even younger is a very common sight in Boston, as well as in Heidelberg and other centres of learning in either hemisphere. Why is this? Our answer is that present methods of instruction are far too laborious and external; teachers are compelled to act in the capacity of cramming machines, and pupils in consequence are forced, not educated, driven, not led. When teaching is of this highly objectionable and reprehensible type, spiritual vision of principle is not sought after, on the contrary, the authoritative dicta of schoolmen is imposed as truth, and as the opinions of many scholars to-day are agnostic to the verge of materialism, the inner sight of the students becomes less and less active, and so the correspondence of physical blindness is in order. The best way to begin the cure of blindness is to encourage the patient to sit in a dark room with the expectation of seeing; he will, if his mental attitude is calm and restful, see something, at first indistinctly, but if this course is faithfully followed up the results after awhile will be amazing. Clairvoyance is perfectly natural, and would probably develop to an extent in most children if not suppressed by false dogmatic training, and though oculists and opticians are always ferreting about in the realm of uttermost effects to prepare eye washes and fit spectacles, the cause of dim vision is quite beyond their ken. If eye specialists were open to spiritual apprehension they would soon learn that the mental cause of poor sight is due to inordinate straining after material results. Never try your eyes in the sense of straining them; never continue reading after the exercise becomes difficult; never use a powerful lamp whose rays of heat scorch the pupil and tend to destroy the optic nerve. Let your reading go altogether, and seek instruction through harkening to the spoken word and through silent meditation, if you cannot read without your eyes smarting; but though you respect your present limitation so far as not to employ violence in the endeavour to transcend it, never let your present weakness appear before you as the limit of your future attainment. The outward eyes become impaired through wrong thinking; though you were ever so unconscious of the relation between cause and effect, the effect followed the cause in necessary logical sequence; now if the eyes are to come into right condition they must be allowed liberty to get right naturally, and this desired result will be attained through right thinking, without paying any special attention to the orbs of vision. Eye-glasses are not sinful, and if they are used as people use magnifying and opera-glasses we have, as metaphysicians, no great aversion to them; still the normal state of the eye is such that spectacles are needless appendages, and when correct thought has resulted in good eyesight all these "aids to vision" will be discarded, because the need of them will be felt no longer. We will now turn to the ear and see if we cannot gather a few thoughts on how to vanquish deafness. Swedenborg tells us that "the things which enter by the sense of sight enter into man's understanding and enlighten him; but those which enter by the sense of hearing enter into the understanding and at the same time into the will; wherefore by hearing is signified perception and obedience. Hence it is that in human language it is a received form of expression to speak of hearing any one, and also of giving ear to any one; likewise of being a hearer and of harkening. By hearing any one is understood to perceive, and by harkening is meant to obey. This form of expression has flowed down from the spiritual world in which the spirit of man is. They who in the spiritual world are in the province of the ear are forms of obedience from perception. The province of the ear is in the axis of heaven, and therefore into it, or into those who are there, the whole spiritual world flows, with the perception that it must so be done; for this is the reigning perception in heaven; hence it is that they who are in that province are forms of obedience from perception. That the things which enter by hearing enter immediately by the understanding into the will, may be further illustrated by the instruction of the angels of the celestial kingdom, who are the wisest. Those angels receive all their wisdom by hearing, not by sight; for whatever they hear of Divine things, from veneration and love, they receive in the will and make of their life. From this it is manifest that hearing is given to man chiefly for receiving wisdom, but sight for receiving intelligence. Wisdom is to perceive, will, and do; intelligence is to learn and perceive." "Spirits who correspond to hearing, or who constitute the province of the ear, are they who are in simple obedience; they do not reason whether a thing be so, but because it is so said by others they believe it is so." Such as attend little to the sense of a thing belong to the cartilaginous and bony part of the external ear. To the interiors of the ear belong those who have the sight of inner hearing, and obey what its spirit there dictates, and express its dictates fitly." From these remarkable statements it appears that derangements of the outer ears must in some way result from refusal to harken to spiritual counsel, and in a more physical view of the question it is frequently said by aurists that deafness is greatly modified by paying very close attention to what is being said; for this reason, among others, deaf persons are often desirous of facing a speaker at no great distance, so that by watching the motions of the lips and the general facial expression they can interpret much that they would altogether lose were they relying solely upon their sense of sound. Deaf persons, as a rule, are obstinate in temper, and very much set in their own way, which is not usually a very desirable way; or in cases where the deaf person is only very sensitive to the states of those about him, he is often rendered deaf by absorbing the dominant thought in his vicinity, the tendency of which is to induce and maintain a state of unnatural repression, and from this cause alone a myriad ailments constantly proceed. As in the case of blindness or defective sight we recommend going into the dark to see, so for the vanquishing of deafness we advise going into the silence to hear, and just as clairvoyance is of the greatest use to the blind so is clairaudience to the deaf. Sit quietly in a still place where you feel a reposeful atmosphere, then listen for what you may hear in the silence. Make no painful effort to catch sounds, simply remain quietly receptive to whatever vibrations may reach you, and you will certainly find, if you persist in this course, that satisfactory improvement in your hearing will soon be discerned. Many well-known teachers of "Christian Science" have commended this course and spoken very strongly as to its practical results. As hands are very important members of the body, we will now give a thought to them. They signify the love of doing things; people who are greatly in this affection have usually particularly nimble fingers. The hands are so constantly alluded to in connection with healing that it would be well for all students to get a clear idea of what "laying on of hands" really means in addition to the obvious meaning in the letter of the phrase. Now that telepathy has become a popular study and it is no longer necessary to apologise for its phenomena, we can surely understand that as thought directed to a place results in presence in that place, and as hands are the organs through which we naturally communicate sensation, we can make our hands felt at any distance, provided there is true rapport between healer and patient or sender and receiver of a mental telegram. Laying on of hands magnetically and mesmerically, with a view to producing some kind of hypnotic result, is not spiritual treatment, though it pertains to the lower department of psychic action. No doubt the theories of magnetists and mesmerists concerning animal magnetism and odic force are correct on their planes, but spiritual healing reaches higher, broader, and deeper. Physical emanations can be communicated from body to body by bringing finger tips in contact with skin or even by pressing the outside of a heavy garment worn by a person who submits to magnetic treatment, but these exterior exhalations do not contain the real healing force, though they have a value of their own in the physical degree, and often are found successful in relieving neuralgic pains and other nervous and superficial derangements. Manipulation of the flesh may temporarily relieve the suffering occasioned by nervous derangement, but it does not permanently strengthen the nervous resisting power, and we hope our students have not forgotten our three-fold classification of disorder, which is first mental, second nervous, third functional. The functional and even the nervous stage of disorder may be palliated by ordinary massage, but the mental origin of disease is left entirely untouched until the spiritual nature is appealed to by one who is himself awakened spiritually, or at the very least the intellect must be satisfied by one who is capable of sustaining a good logical argument, the effect of which is to substitute a normal for an abnormal mental condition. To lay hands on the sick that may recover signifies to appeal to them so forcibly that they are taken possession of by new ideas which cause them to let go of the errors which have previously held them. Hands and arms always denote power in the language of correspondence; when the Divine hand is extended it is meant that God's power is made evident or that its operation is plainly manifest. The custom of shaking hands, at present often a farce, originally meant much that is denoted by extending the "right hand of fellowship," or by the "Masonic grip," whereby one brother recognises a fellow member of his order. It is not wrong to lay your physical hands on sufferers, and if at any time you feel impelled to do so the action is agreeable to the person upon whom you operate, the process is perfectly orderly; but it can never be well to confine ourselves to belief in the necessity of anything external, for when we are thus limited we can do no absent work, and our usefulness is curtailed at the very point where we ourselves draw the line of necessity. If it has been customary for a friend to shake your hand or place his hand on your shoulder or even make magnetic passes down your arms, when you receive a mental treatment from him, no matter at what distance, you are apt to feel the touch of his hand in the very way you have been accustomed to feel it physically. As those who are in the hands, arms, and shoulders of the "greatest man" are devoted to practical powerful work, we may say that the best treatment to induce perfect flexibility of all joints and muscles from shoulders to finger points is to very emphatically affirm full measure of strength for the discharge of every obligation and to overcome rheumatism and stiffness of joints and muscles in general it is necessary to cultivate both love of work which necessitates motion and confident trust in ability to do such work freely. The feet, which in many respects resemble the hands, are in correspondence assigned to a lower place. Swedenborg says: "Hands signify the interiors of the natural, and feet the exteriors of it. To lift the hand signifies power in spiritual things; to lift the foot power in natural things. By spiritual is meant that in the natural which is of the light of heaven, by natural that which is of the light of the world." The washing of feet, which is made so conspicuous an emblem of purification in the gospel, evidently refers to the physiological fact that all the impurities of the system can be and should be drained off through the pedal extremities which, being the lowest ultimates of the body, are the proper channels through which the final stages of purification should be manifested. When Peter requested that other portions of his body should also be cleansed, he received the answer that those whose feet are thoroughly cleansed need no other cleansing, which distinctly alludes to the final casting out, or off, of all that, were it to remain in the system, would be an impediment to the healthy growth and vigour of the organism. Literally it is a good plan to place the feet in hot water and keep them there as long as agreeable, whenever there is any sense of fulness or oppression in the head or any embarrassment to the general orderly discharge of any of the functions of the body. Burning feet express feverish mental states seeking relief; cold feet indicate lack of mental force and equilibrium; corns and bunions correspond to prejudices entertained with regard to external things. Very comfortable feet always prove that the thought is generally well ordered, and that no trouble is made of expressing thought in ultimates. Turning now to that intensely vital and important organ, the HEART, it seems hardly necessary to say that it corresponds to the centre of action and is directly connected with the lungs, which are the organs of breathing. Swedenborg says: "In the spiritual world the quality of one's faith is known by his breathing, and the quality of his love by the beating of his heart." Such a statement certainly opens up a vast field for study to those who are willing to proceed deeply into the real science of a healthy life. Consumption and all pulmonary disorders are continually associated with pious dispositions, while they are clearly outpicturings of anything but positive spiritual development. We can readily see that in religious circles, where obedience, submission, blind belief, etc., are regarded as the quintessence of goodness, difficulty in breathing and gradual casting away of the lungs may easily take place, for the whole breathing apparatus is surely undermined by repression and mental stultification. Deep, regular breathing, the practice of thoroughly filling the lungs with air, is conducive to a strong chest and healthy lungs, but these free, healthful exercises do not correspond to repressed, but to extremely open mental attitudes. The quality of faith, which results in free, regular breathing, is a very free and noble quality; it is faith in perfect accord with reason; faith which is of the enlightened understanding acting in concert with well-directed affection. Every one admits that abnormal love affairs act injuriously upon the heart, and that all shocks to the affection have a tendency to result in heart failure. When we hear of men dropping down on the street through sudden failure of the heart, at a time when a financial panic seems imminent or a crash has come, we may reasonably conclude that such men had placed their affections on their money bags, otherwise the monetary collapse could not have stopped the action of their hearts, however it might have stripped them of worldly possessions. The organs of speech, which are so nearly related to the lungs as to be almost identical with them, are influenced, as we can readily perceive, by the freedom or bondage of which we are conscious in our endeavours to translate ideals into actuals. To speak freely and to the point, and to be able to speak or sing continously without fatigue, proves conclusively that spiritual influx flows readily into such persons, and that they offer no serious impediment to the voicing of such thought as they receive. Vocal difficulties proceed from timidity, inordinate self-consciousness, failure to act instantly on receipt of an inspiration, and from various other closely allied causes not difficult to trace, as they are all along this one line. To regulate the vocal organs when they seem out of repair, also to develop the power of easy and effective utterance, the following is a good exercise: Betake yourself to any spot where you can feel alone, then gather an imaginary audience about you; speak or sing to this invisible company without reflection; let your thoughts be expressed instantly they occur to you. If you persist in the practice you will soon discover that free delivery is not hard to obtain, and as you thus give free expression to ideas you will greatly strengthen your entire vocal organism, so that bronchitis, catarrh, and similar maladies will be conquered through the large increase of force of which you will become aware. No straining should ever be permitted in vocal development; no forcing of tones is ever allowable; all tones to be correct must be perfectly easy. As you grow in mental freedom your voices will become wider in range and finer in quality, but this must be a natural growth, a spontaneous result of inward improvement. Singing teachers and professors of elocution rarely allow the law of correspondence to hold uninterrupted sway with their pupils, though the advocates of the system of Delsarte, if they are true to the founder of their school, must allow that expression, to be worthy, must be utterly natural. Never try to speak or sing; get an understanding of the theme, then simply render it with no thought of any impression it may make on others. Let your speech and song be your own interpretation of an idea, and through this exquisite liberty of verbal action you will find power and grace coming into your utterances, and vocal difficulties, including serious disorders of the throat and lungs, vanishing like ice before the sunshine. Freedom is, after all, the one word which expresses true salvation from disorder. We have no space in this brief treatise to enter further into special correspondences, though we hope in the near future to publish a consecutive series of lectures dealing at length with these correspondences. Though this lesson is far from exhaustive or complete, we trust that the little we have said will suggest to the fertile intellect of the student much of what has been left unsaid. The broad generalisations in which we have indulged have only been intended to awaken thought on this enormous theme of transcendent interest to all who are seeking to overcome disorder in every form by establishing contrary order. It seems hardly necessary to append the statement—though we will add it for the benefit of some who may find it of service—that all afflictions of the internal organs proceed from brooding in silence over some real or imaginary trouble, and they are also sometimes induced and always aggravated by the habit of repression. Knowing how very susceptible to the thoughts and opinions of others many extremely sensitive but decidedly well-meaning people are, we trust that no reader of this book will imagine that in all cases the sufferer has been actually guilty of any wilful offence in the direction indicated by correspondence. Yielding to others blindly, and often through fear, leads to many simple and complicated disorders; in every instance, therefore, it is essential that a healer hold firmly the mental pi of perfection as the antidote to the disordered state manifest. He is only to be found and kept by steadily adhering to the wise ru contemplating only what we desire to see expressed. Health is normal condition of every creature, no matter in what kingdo nature it may exist. We have all a right to claim health, secu and rejoice in it; but this we can only do intelligently and cert by discovering and obeying the immutable law of the univ Nature is God in manifestation; Divine and natural law are Spiritual law is the only law there is; the outer must ever reveal inner. On the basis of this sound theorem we may all set to w to aid practically in bringing in the kingdom of heaven, which is reign of righteousness in externals as in internals.

DEDICATION TO HALLEY'S COMET.

Bright harbinger of glorious light,
Illumining both morn and night,
Fair messenger thro' vibrant space,
Running thy rapid wondrous race,
Untiring as the ages roll,
Suggesting our undying soul.
Witness to Heaven's all-constant law,
From thee we inspiration draw.
Welcome, thrice welcome, in our sky,
Pointing to days of freedom nigh,
As on thy radiant form I look,
To thee I dedicate this book.

AUTHOR'S FOREWORD.

In presenting the following pages to the world I desire to offer a few explanatory words concerning the form in which this book appears.

During my 6 months' residence in the city of Washington, U. S. A., which comprised the winter of 1909-10, I was earnestly entreated by many friends to compile a volume which should embody the gist of a very large number of lectures delivered during that period, especially those which dealt particularly with the Sacred Books of the world.

Owing to the very large amount of space required for even the barest outline of treatment of the Scriptures venerated by Jews and Christians alone, to say nothing of the Sacred Books of other faiths, I have attempted to present in this volume only discourses on those themes which have been specially brought to my attention by friends and students in many different places which I have visited and where my earlier books have widely circulated. To take up this entire subject at any length, or even to treat any portion of it with anything like fullness, would necessitate the publication of quite a long series of volumes, to which the present fragmentary work may possibly consitute an introduction. This particular book aims only at presenting, in meagre outline, a view of revelation and inspiration which renders it easily possible for us to admire and venerate the Bibles of all peoples, without in any sense making a claim for their infallibility or finality. One of the chief objects of all these discourses or essays is to increase interest in universal aspects of religion and philosophy, and wherever possible to throw some light on doctrines which are still occasioning much perplexity in many quarters. So much general interest is now evinced regarding all that pertains to the psychic side of every subject, and so many curious and conflicting views are still expressed concerning matters designated "occult" and "psychical," that it seems a highly important duty to do all we can to clear up mysteries and present our ripest and most helpful thought to the enquiring multitude, whatever may be our special viewpoint. One cannot keep in any degree abreast with current literature without encountering the most extraordinary ideas concerning the unseen universe, the mysteries of which the modern world is making desperate endeavors to unravel. It is all in vain, in these days, for religious teachers to tell the masses that "secret things belong to God" and we have, therefore, no right to enquire into them, for were such a text to be pushed to its logical extremity, in the hands of many theologians it would mean putting an end to all investigation and blindly accepting the dictum of some pretentious hierarchy. It was this very attitude insisted upon by Dr. Pusey, but repudiated by Dean Stanley, which drove Mrs. Annie Besant to Atheism, from which Theosophy eventually rescued her. If we cannot believe in the reality of a Spiritual Universe and at the same time use our reason, then thinkers must of necessity take refuge in some form of Agnosticism which can never satisfy the affection and never permanently content the intellect. If Bibles will not bear examination then the sooner they are consigned to the limbo of desuetude the better,—but if, as is maintained in the following pages, we can find much that is excellent in all of them, but the whole of truth in none, we do well to broaden our human sympathy by comparing Book with Book and System with System, to the end that we may at length discover a common religious and philosophical denominator. Magic as well as Mystery is dealt with in these lectures, chiefly on account of the great interest now prevalent in mysterious phenomena and the very misleading views in circulation concerning a topic which always lends itself readily to the exploitation of doctrines calculated to terrify the timid and support theories of the Universe utterly incompatible with any sane and wholesome views of life here and hereafter Ancient and modern authors have been freely drawn upon to illustrate the many subjects briefly treated, and many valuable works are named, with the hope that those who read this treatise will derive benefit from studying the various questions herein outlined at much greater detail if time and opportunity permit and interest incite.

In my judgment, the chief benefit to be derived from travel (and I have traveled considerably) is the evidence it furnishes of the oneness of our humanity; and if literal material travels contribute to that important end, much more do mental excursions into many fields of diverse schools of Thought bring us mentally and sympathetically closer together; and it is this intimate sense of togetherness which must ultimately banish warfare and bring to pass the fulfilment of the glorious prophecies common to all illumined prophets, that a day will dawn when all humanity will be so united that tho' nations may remain as distinct communities, they will be in spirit completely unified. It is impossible to predicate any ultimate unification of humanity on any less exalted basis than that of the essential goodness of human nature. Nothing keeps us apart so completely as false theology, on the one side, and gross materialism on the other. Could we once for all realize our common humanity vitally, as an indisputable spiritual reality, we could not continue to indulge either race or class hatred. Race and class consciousness there may be, within reasonable limits, but race and class antagonisms are inconceivable if we realize our oneness. Speculative theology and philosophy which results in no widening realization of human unity, may be a scholastic exercise agreeable to certain active intellects, but it may well be dismissed as a superfluity by practical philanthropists who aim directly at benefiting human beings here and now. One by one the strongholds of partialism and exclusivism are being broken down and human unity is standing radiantly disclosed. All the pitiable makeshifts of partialist theology are losing their hold on the thinking, loving, masses who are becoming more and more imbued with the beauty and dignity of Abraham Lincoln's majestic saying, "All or None." This was that noble emancipator's answer to the question put to him by narrow-minded theologues concerning his views of human ultimate salvation. The stupid arrogance which imagines that some human beings will be finally blotted out, while others will enjoy everlasting conscious blessedness is intolerable in the light of all our deepest insight into the unity of our humanity. "Pilgrims of various probations," as Eliza Pitzinger calls us in her magnificent poem, "The Song of the Soul Victorious," we may be, and as such it is the privilege of the maturer to guide the less mature, and in the words of Lucy Larcom in her exquisite song, "Hand in Hand with Angels," we can well go thro' life "clinging to the strong ones; drawing up the slow." Nothing could be more ridiculous than to claim that we know all about the processes whereby the ultimate glorification of the entire human family will be accomplished, but, to quote once more from Eliza Pitzinger, "Side by side we are marching onward, and in time we will all agree." In dealing with ancient Oriental Scriptures, or even with the most recent works couched in Oriental phraseology, we find an abundant use of metaphor; it seems therefore incredible that any even slightly educated person to-day can experience any very great difficulty in translating the imagery with which all Bibles abound. "Fire" is no more to be taken literally when referred to as a means for purifying souls, than "sheep," "goats," "pieces of money," and a multitude of other symbolical expressions are to be taken literally; but they convey definite ideas allegorically, and are quite readily understood by all who have even a very small accquaintance with the significance of similitudes. There is much obscurity in much that is put forward as modern revelation, a fact which by no means proves that there is no truth in it, tho' it cannot fairly be foisted upon us as absolutely and irrevocably the final word on the subject of which it treats. Deeply grateful as we ought to be for every gleam of light that shines upon our mental and moral pathway, we miss the purpose of our educational experience directly we cease to investigate claims for ourselves and blindly endorse the dictum of another. My own researches in the Psychical field, which have been continuous from my childhood, have convinced me that however useful external phenomena may be in some cases, the only satisfactory assurance of immortality which can come to an individual—I mean an assurance that nothing can possibly overturn—must come thro' a development of one's inherent ability to discern spiritual relatities spiritually. The scientific world owes it to itself and to the larger unscientific world outside to fearlessly investigate all varieties of phenomena, and we have good reason to predict that present investigations will soon have led to radical changes in the popular belief concerning the constitution of our universe. Life continuous beyond physical dissolution is being proved on every side despite the incredulity of some investigators and the trickery of many mountebanks. Clairvoyance cannot be ruled out of court because tricks are played by greatly overlauded "mediums," nor can any mental phenomenon be affected should it be proved that alleged physical phenomena are often spurious. We need not be dismayed at anything external if our inner faculties are well developed, and one of the most hopeful signs of the times is that more and more attention is being given to cultivating faculties within us which we have allowed to lie fallow, but which are now asserting themselves with rapidly increasing vigor and distinctness. Our horizon is not properly limited by the outermost physical senses which are all that many people imagine they possess; there are interior faculties bursting thro' and when these shall have made themselves more generally known and honored we shall have entered upon an age of spiritual unfoldment to which the period of doubt and conflict now passing has surely led the way. With boundless confidence in the Power that makes for righteousness, and without a doubt as to the finally blessed outcome of all life's manifold and strange experiences, I throw this book upon the world trusting it will help in some slight measure to increase confidence in the "Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may."

ANCIENT MYSTERIES AND MODERN REVELATIONS.

CHAPTER I.

BIBLES UNDER MODERN SEARCHLIGHT.

Nothing can be more evident than that two diametrically opposite mental tendencies are now figuring prominently on the intellectual horizon. We note everywhere an intense and sometimes even fanatic interest displayed in everything marvelous or mystical and at the same time we cannot but be impressed with the distinctly rationalistic, often amounting to an evidently agnostic, trend of thought in many influential directions. Modern Mysticism presents many curious aspects, for it is undoubtedly a strange compound of a very ancient love of the marvelous, for its own sake, with the truly modern scientific spirit which is satisfied with nothing less than a critical and impartial investigation of whatever claims to carry with it divine, or indeed any superordinary, authority. Between Mysticism and Occultism the famous Dr. Rudolf Steiner of Germany, declares there is this essential difference. The Mystic is one who realizes truth in some interior intuitive manner, while the Occultist takes delight in observing and producing extraordinary phenomena, by means of which he hopes to gain some added insight into the laws and principles of the universe.

The sacred literature of all ages and of all peoples abounds with striking illustrations that both Mysticism and Occultism were widely known and highly prized from the earliest periods, concerning which history informs us. The mystic element in all Bibles may be called truly religious in the deepest and most spiritual meaning of the term; while all records of miracles may be classed as spectacular occurrences, calculated to impress the minds of many whose interior life may have been largely undeveloped, while their tendency to analyze external manifestations of any unusual sort may have been quite as keen as we find it in the case of our most distinguished modern scientists. We need always to remember when handling the complex problems of biblical criticism and psychical research (the two are far more closely allied than many scholars seem to imagine) that there are now among us just those very same distinctive types of human nature which co-existed in ages long gone by; therefore, while it is quite permissable to discriminate between higher and lower states of mind, as well as between differing degrees of spiritual and moral enlightenment, we need to be extremely cautious lest we appear to condemn a certain mental attitude which is positively inevitable in the case of many of our honorable neighbors, even though we ourselves may have no active sympathy with it. We hear a great deal in these days of Liberalism and of Modernism, but as a rule those terms are very loosely employed; the former being used quite blindly and indiscriminately to cover every conceivable phase of thought which people choose to call "unorthodox or unconventional," while the latter is applied in particular to certain theological opinions which have recently met with papal condemnation.

We need as far as possible, within the limited scope of our literary endeavors, to define these terms a little more precisely so as to give them a much clearer and more readily intelligible standing in our popular vocabulary. By Liberalism is properly meant not a destructive or simply lax philosophy, but a system of thought which is sufficiently elastic to stretch without breaking, and also good-natured and broad-minded enough to see good in many systems of thought and practice, not merely in those to which we ourselves are from some cause or other especially attached. By Modernism we ought to mean simply the opposite of Ancientism, a word not yet often met with, but one that is capable of rendering much valuable service in any debate where it is found necessary to define clearly the modernist position. While it would sound churlish to call all our intellectual opponents illiberal and ourselves liberal, no offense need be taken if we divide for convenience sake, into Ancientists and Modernists while discussing the most vital points at issue between debaters who need never be belligerents. Those who take the ancient position may well be called faithful sticklers for certain views which have been handed down to them through many generations of venerated ancestors, and who are so conservative by intellectual bent and sympathy that it is highly distressing to them to even contemplate a change from the positions which these venerated ancestors have, in their opinion, sanctified. Modernists, on the other hand, have no such blind reverence for antiquity, not because of any lack of affection and respect for their progenitors, but because of their intense conviction that days of old were no holier than to-day and ancient countries no more sacred than the lands we now inhabit. Very few indeed among us probably go the full length in either direction, for we almost invariably find ourselves at one time led by sentiment to revere, perhaps unduly, some romantic work of old, while at another time we are led by intellect to turn our backs upon the positions of our forefathers and boastfully declare that the achievements of the present day are far greater than those of any period in the past. Let us now endeavor to analyze quite fairly the claims of antiquity and the claims of modernity to our sympathy and love. Our affection for the antique is almost always based upon some endearing associations with the past that no amount of didactic reasoning ever suffices entirely to dispel. We cannot rationally analyze it any more than we can give a satisfactory analytical account of any other deeply rooted sentiment. Probably the best account of the great affection felt by so very many people for the Bible is contained in the beautiful song, "The Old Armchair." "A Mother sat there and that's why I love it, that old armchair." The singer goes on to tell us that that beloved mother

"turned from her bible to bless her child." This is quite sufficient to explain the deep fundamental hold which the ancient Bible continues to exert over the hearts and minds of quite a multitude of distinctly liberal thinkers who positively repudiate all attachment to traditional authority. For this reason the subject of biblical criticism is one which is necessarily attended by many sentimental difficulties which do not surround the candid investigation of any other literature in English speaking countries; for very few of us have any strongly sympathetic attachment to the Classics or to the Sacred Books of the East which the famous scholar, Max Muller, so finely edited; but were we to find ourselves in some Asiatic country the state of thought would be exactly reversed, for there our Bible could easily be treated quite impartially while certain other Scriptures which are also made up of divers elements Americans are almost entirely ignorant, would be surrounded with the same sort of sentimental halo with which we have encircled the Jewish and Christian documents. Whenever any one of us can effectually dismiss this widely prevailing sentiment and examine the many distinct books which go to make up the compendious literature we have long been accustomed to designate Holy Bible, we find that very much that it contains is no holier, and no less holy, than important portions of many other literatures which are also made up of divers elements brought together no one knows exactly when or how. We need not be either surprised or shocked to find that the same glorious ethical teachings which make many portions of our Bible magnificently superb are couched in almost identical language with equally high and noble moral precepts enunciated elsewhere; nor need we experience the least astonishment when we begin to trace a subtle mystical element running through all the widely venerated Scriptures of the world.

Let us now endeavor to place ourselves in the mental attitude of those who have never seen, until to-day, the Sacred Writings we are properly called upon to impartially examine, and let us be perfectly straightforward in dealing with these ancient records, precisely as we ought to deal with the newest prose or poetry submitted for our consideration. Bible worshippers and Bible haters are alike fanatical, though their fanaticism is diametrically opposed; for no one can judge any matter impartially if he approaches the study of it with his mind already made up to either glorify it or condemn it.

Whether the Bible can pass through the scathing ordeal of modern criticism safely and serenely, may not yet be fully decided, but it may be safely predicted that the new aspects of criticism which are rapidly coming to the front will much more nearly agree with ancient kabbalistical interpretations than with the now almost antiquated iconoclastic method which was bound to prevail in the tempestuous days of the French Revolution, when Voltaire, Thomas Paine, and many other brilliant intellectualists were seeking to prove that bibliolatry had long been the cause of an intellectual servitude which they felt it to be their special mission to overthrow. "The Age of Reason" is a purely Deistic treatise which undertakes to prove that divine revelation never can depend upon either books or priests, for Nature itself is the revelator of God to Man, consequently we of to-day have quite as much opportunity for enjoying a divine revelation as had any ancient prophets who lived under somewhat different conditions from ourselves. The works of Swedenborg, which had been circulated many years before the writings of Paine were issued, were no more in harmony with any blind worship of the letter of the Bible than were the words of Paine, but Swedenborg wrote from an entirely different standpoint, and distinctly claimed to be a specially illuminated man, divinely influenced to restore to the world a knowledge of those interior senses of Sacred Scripture well understood by many peoples several thousand years ago, but at the time of his writings almost entirely unknown to scholarly theologians as well as to the great multitude of the relatively uninstructed.

The modern Theistic position, rendered popular in New England by Theodore Parker in the middle of the nineteenth century, and since then widely accepted in nearly every section of the globe, does not differ radically from either the rationalistic position on the one hand or from the mystical on the other, provided that neither rationalist or mystic endeavors to set up any particular man or woman, or company of men and women, as infallible censors to whose dictation the multitude must bow. Every consistent Theist stoutly maintains that no one has any right to impose his or her opinions upon any other, seeing that no genuine human development is attainable apart from intellectual and moral freedom; for if we simply bow to the alleged authority of others, be they either ecclesiastics or agnostics, we allow ourselves to suffer, to a large extent at least, the loss of that exercise of individual conscience and reason without which any real human development is impossible. It is, of course, quite true that some people are more highly enlightened than others, and are therefore quite capable of functioning in the capacity of teachers, but no arbitrary dictator is really a teacher, because if we accept the say-so of another without individual examination of what that other teaches, we positively learn nothing, but place ourselves mentally and morally in the abject position of human parrots or phonographs. Now it is often argued that as there have always been Blessed Masters upon the earth who have communicated oracular teaching to their special disciples, we can only obtain knowledge of important truth regarding spiritual matters provided we accept the presumably authoritative deliverances of these heaven-inspired oracles, but such a statement is entirely ridiculous, because if we blindly accept something as true which we are quite unable to understand, we accept it only in an illusory manner, seeing that we do not feel within us any vital response to the outside appeal; therefore, we are only echoes and liable at any time to be switched off our present mental track and diverted into quite a foreign channel.

Whoever feels any real confidence in the intrinsic and abiding value of the Bible must be strangely inconsistent if he is afraid that a perfectly honest and altogether impartial examination of the sacred text can ever weaken its hold upon the hearts and minds of fearless truthseekers; but if anyone secretly entertains serious misgivings as to the ability of the Bible to withstand whatever attacks may be made upon it, he surely confesses his own serious doubt as to the real sacredness of the Scripture he ostensibly endeavors to uphold.

The spirit of frank investigation is the only spirit worthy of esteem, and whatever cannot stand the searchlight of such investigation as this spirit necessitates and prompts, must in the nature of things soon come to be regarded as far more of a human fetish than divine revelation. It is certainly true that a superficial view of any collection of Sacred Writings reveals them as of very unequal value and abounding in traces of the particular errors common to the places and periods when and where they were produced. It is, however, quite reasonable, when taking into account the circumstances of their production, to explain these seeming discrepancies and traces of unreliability not so much to lack of wisdom or inspiration on the part of the authors as to the actual need for appealing to humanity in a language not far removed from the average comprehension of ordinary men and women, while at the same time conveying an interior meaning to all who can read below the surface by means of the employment of a system of parable or metaphor which is, to this very day, the common practice of all teachers in the East.

We are now confronted with the task of examining the Hebrew and Greek records which constitute our Bible in the light of this twofold method,—the rationalistic and the mystical,—the former having reference to the outward text, the latter to the interior intention of those who employed it for the express purpose of handing down through succeeding ages certain vital truths which do not essentially vary, no matter how widely outward circumstances may change.

Probably no intelligent person to-day believes that any great moral purpose can be served by simply studying ancient history and committing to memory the names of certain patriarchs whose general character was certainly not outwardly in all cases of the highest stamp. Then again we have no definite assurance that any event occurred exactly as it is described in the external narrative. But when we come to regard these personages and incidents as far more than simply historical, we find them all capable of conveying important lessons to us to-day. The geographical and chronological elements in the Bible may well be regarded as extremely doubtful, but only in the sense that we need not look for local and historical exactitude in a great novel, a mighty poem or an elevating play, into which the names of certain persons and places have been freely introduced, but chiefly with dramatic motive—i. e., for the sake of making the teaching conveyed stand out boldly before the eye of the reader or the ear of the listener as it could not stand were it not for this vivid external drapery. When we read Shakespeare we need not care whether Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, or Timon of Athens were or were not actual historical persons. Somebody lived in Denmark and somebody lived in Greece during those periods to which the plays incidentally refer, but the object of these great dramas is certainly widely different from that of a school history, the avowed object of which is simply to acquaint the students with what actually occurred in certain countries at certain times.

All history is valuable provided we learn the lesson that it is capable of conveying to us; but the distinctive value of a work of art, written with the sole intention of embodying important moral teaching in attractive outward form, is far higher than that of any work which is undertaken from the standpoint of the historian simply.

We are all familiar to-day with the extreme doubt which is often expressed in learned circles concerning the authorship of every great literary classic. The plays of Shakespeare have been attributed to Bacon, while the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer have often been tentatively referred to unknown authorship, but no caviling as to authorship can ever detract one iota from the intrinsic merit of the suublime poetry thus skeptically dealt with, for it does not make any real difference to us to know or not to know who wrote a certain book or when or where it was written, seeing that the only great value of any literary production, which aims at elevating the moral tone of humanity, consists in the appeal it makes to our inherent moral instincts, which can usually be reached by fear if we are in an undeveloped and almost savage mental condition, but only by veneration and love if we are more highly evolved intellectually.

It is now not uncommon to find gifted teachers of mental science and moral philosophy entirely ignoring the simply historical elements in ancient Scriptures during the course of Bible lessons, which they deliver with the one intention of aiding their students to overcome diverse limitations and prove themselves superior to the weaknesses and temptations which surround us in the modern world. We need not wonder that this method of teaching is sometimes looked upon by rationalists as unwarranted and by extreme conservatives as heretical, but a little sober thinking will soon convince us that we have all a perfect right to make the most practical use we possibly can of the world's most widely circulating religious literature. Nothing can be further from the truth than to declare that the Bible in these days is not read as much as formerly, though it is certainly the case that it is not read so exclusively, and it is being read far more critically. This change of attitude toward the venerable book is quite inevitable when we take into account the enormous literary output of the present day and the resolute determination on the part of modern scholars to ventilate as widely as possible the results of recent criticism. We can quite sympathize with all persons who object to the Bible being read in public schools as a book entirely different from all other books, alleged to contain a divine revelation which no other literature can hold, for such a claim for a particular volume is clearly an attempt on the part of Bible worshipers to compel many of their fellow-citizens who do not share their views to submit the whole of the rising generation to a kind of course in dogmatic theology, which while it may meet with the complete approval of some parents and guardians, is thoroughly distasteful to others Were the Bible placed on a level with other avowedly Sacred Books and treated with honest impartiality, there could be no objection to selecting from it for school reading many noble passages, but the volume as a whole is far too obscure in many places, and it also deals with too many subjects unfit to be discussed by children of school age, to be placed in their hands either as a complete divine revelation or as a standard text book of faith and morals which they are expected to peruse from Genesis to Revelation. We know well enough that there are very many beautiful stories in the Bible which are well adapted to childish comprehension, and which by their dramatic intensity make a strong and altogether salutary appeal to juvenile imagination. Such tales could profitably be included in a judiciously compiled selection from many venerable writings where they would stand side by side with similar stories taken from other Scriptures: But admirable though such a selection from the various Sacred Books of the world might be, such a volume could never receive the sanction of those exclusivists who have set their faces determinedly against the study of comparative religion, unless it be so conducted as to put their own system in the most favorable light possible, while all other systems must be relegated to the shades of at least semi-darkness.

When it was seriously proposed to Mrs. Annie Besant that she should compile such a book as we are now advocating, she very frankly informed her friends that she could compile it without much difficulty, but she saw little chance of its being accepted after she had written it, in those particular places into which her friends were most desirous of introducing it. Any gifted man or woman who has traveled widely and studied deeply might gather together, without any onerous labor, a large amount of valuable matter from the immense bulk of the world's sacred literature, and a very great good service could be rendered thereby to the cause of mutual understanding between the representatives of different religious systems, but though such a result after its accomplishment could only be beneficial in the long run, it could not be brought about at present on any extended scale without arousing ferocious controversy, by reason of the enthusiastic self-conceit which we find manifested by professedly orthodox advocates of every religious system beneath the sun. Nothing seems more difficult than for those who profess to admire and fully accept the most exquisite portions of their own beloved Bible to act as though its finest inculcations were really true, for if they would but admit what their greatest prophets and apostles have clearly stated, they would immediately consent to trace divine revelation impartially through the myriad channels along which it has been flowing without cessation through all the ages. Could we all agree to dispense entirely with both jealousy and prejudice it would not be long before we could all unite to form a worldwide Study Class, in which all venerated Scriptures could be employed and quoted side by side in such a manner as to greatly and quickly help forward that mighty spiritual movement looking toward the establishment and maintenance of universal Peace which we are assured by all true Theosophists, and all other workers for the unification of humanity, is the one movement beyond all others most calculated to enable all of us to practically realize the divine origin and constitution of our common humanity.

Nothing can surely be more detrimental to the interests of universal peace than an arrogant belief that some one nation has been appointed sole custodian of celestial verities, for such a claim made by any body of people inevitably inclines them to an overweening sense of their own importance coupled with a more or less contemptuous attitude toward all the rest of humanity. "Poor benighted heathen," is a phrase we often hear at missionary meetings, not simply applied to certain benighted elements in any given population, but indiscriminately used to designate all non-christian peoples regardless of their intelligence or moral excellence. The only reason given for speaking of them thus is because they have never seen our Bible, or accepted our particular views of religion, though in many cases they have actually embraced the identical teachings which we frequently declare are the crowning glory of our vastly superior civilization. Were we to really understand the Scriptures of those so-called "heathen" nations, we should find in them very much to admire, though also much to criticize, but were they fairly examined we should soon discover that their worst passages are no worse than the worst in our own Bible, and even those are not bad at all if we regard them as containing some interior meaning which lies far below the surface of their letter. No intelligent person can possibly believe that any true God ever told people through any instrumentality whatever to slaughter hosts of innocent women and children; therefore, whenever we read that such commands were given from God, we may be quite sure either that the record is false or that it is conveyed in mystical language. We can accept which alternative we please, provided we adopt the same method of interpretation when dealing with various records; but in no case can we have the right to assume that what is right when contained in one Bible is wrong when found in another. Bibles in all cases possess some amazing element of vitality which has enabled them so far to withstand all the censure which has been brought against them that they go on living despite all efforts made to crush them. This may be due to the simple fact that they contain so much truth, intermingled with a large amount of error, that that truth keeps them alive while the error has a tendency to work their destruction, or we may go so far as to believe that in all cases they are portions of some great universal literature which owes its value, as well as its enduring character, to the spiritual element which is its permanent soul, and which enjoys immortal life though outward bodies may be far from capable of enduring everlastingly.

Whichever view we take we must be extremely careful not to indulge in any special pleading for our own Bible, while holding up to scorn or ridicule the equally venerated Scriptures of hundreds of millions of our fellow beings; and when we come to deal with the subject of idolatry we must again be equally careful to avoid the very common error of declaring that our own images represent certain spiritual truths, and are only regarded by those who honor them as emblems or symbols, while we most unjustly infer that other images in other parts of the world are actually "false gods" of wood and stone which the "wretched heathen" worship because they are destitute of all genuine spiritual illumination. It is quite pardonable that Europeans and Americans should, for the most part, be largely ignorant of Oriental faith and worship, but if that be so, surely some becoming modesty should be exercised and we should refrain from passing judgment where our knowledge is so extremely small. We need not claim to endorse or advocate doctrines and practices with which we are unfamiliar, but we may well be reticent concerning them, and were a wise reticence generalyy observed, we should enjoy the advantage of a total absence of all ill-feeling toward our Asiatic neighbors and we should also be quite open to learn from them as they may also be open to learn from us concerning spiritual realities.

CHAPTER II.

RIVERS OF LIFE OR FAITHS OF MAN IN ALL LANDS.

A very remarkable Chart, intended to describe the progress of religious ideas and varying forms of worship among all nations, was long ago issued by Major General Forlong, by means of which he traced out with considerable clearness what he believed to be the stream of human religious progress from as far back as 10,000 B. C. The earliest forms of worship included the Tree and the Serpent as objects of world-wide veneration, and with these emblems were associated all the symbols connected with Phallic worship. It is quite easy to trace in these primitive and wide-spread emblems the natural tendency of humanity to deify all those agencies through which the stream of life is constantly flowing from some mysterious unseen fountain-head into manifold manifest exterior expressions. According to Forlong's calculations the worship of Fire somewhat preceded the adoration of the sun, and these two forms of closely related worship he traces back to about 6,000 B. C. Regarding the chart carefully we soon become familiar with many interblending lines showing how Sun worship, Tree worship and Serpent worship were so interblended as to have been well-nigh, if not entirely, inseparable. Ancestor worship, according to this reckoning, dates back only to about 3,500 B. C, and seems to have immediately followed the more ancient Egyptian Sacred Ritual which paid special homage to all phases of creative fertility. Mountain worship is still more recent and is said to have prevailed everywhere at the time assigned by Jewish tradition to the giving of the Law from Sinai, and immediately after that period Animal worship became everywhere prevalent. This seems to be in strict accord with the narrative in Exodus which informs us that the people worshiped the golden calf after the Law had been revealed to them from the mountain top, and we may also well believe that the sacredness of mountains appealed especially to men of prophetic type, while animal worship was the common practice of the unenlightened. We can never entirely get away from these forms of worship which grow up instinctively and are therefore no more artificial products than are any other spontaneous natural productions. We have all some instinct of veneration within us which in its earlier and less refined condition is sure to lead us to pay extravagant homage to those external objects which most naturally and powerfully seize hold upon our imagination and cause us, by their unique impressiveness, to regard them as divine agents in more than ordinary degree.

This consideration alone may lead us far on the highly desirable road of kindly consideration for the many aspects of faith and forms of worship which have survived unto this day, and which seemingly satisfy, in some considerable measure, the religious aspirations of multitudes of our contemporaries. Though the very highest idea of Deity which the human mind seems capable of entertaining is well expressed in the majestic words "God is Spirit and they who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth," what constitutes spirit, and how spiritual worship may be offered, is not usually very clear to the average intellect, hence men have always devised some concrete figures which they have placed before them, not intending thereby to represent Deity in fullness, but only to assist them in concentrating their attention upon some venerated object which to their minds clothes or embodies at least some special divine attribute which they most admire and which they most desire to share. Modern scholarship universally inclines to an acceptance of the thoroughly reasonable proposition that beyond all localized and limited divinities the great nations of antiquity acknowledged and venerated one Supreme Being whose attributes were variously embodied in multitudes of subordinate divinities, and though it is the proud boast of the most advanced nations in the modern world that they acknowledge only one God as the proper object of human worship, we can hardly fail to recognize a very definite continuation of ancient Paganism in modern Christianity. By this declaration we are not intending to infer anything disrespectful to the Christian system, though we cannot admit that in its present form it is other than hybrid. Primitive Christianity may have originated with some definite determination on the part of a few intensely zealous men and women to carry into effect the exact teachings of a great Master whom they desired implicitly to follow, but no student of Christian history can fail to note that very soon indeed the early Church began to associate itself with the civil power of the Roman Empire, and from the moment it did so it must have ceased to preserve, even in semblance, its primitive simplicity. All the great religions of the world appear to have originated with some great inspiration received through some illustrious Founder, whose followers very soon began to drift away from the primal purity of the system established by the Founder, and in so doing they invariably committed themselves to an endorsement of prevailing ideas and customs, which had already taken so firm a hold upon the minds of the great bulk of the populace where the new religion was introduced, that a formulated system soon grew up and flourished which was a compromise between the new revelation and the older hierarchy. We can readily see traces of this blending of new and old in every Bible we may be called upon to study, and the fact of its universality should dispose us to take a kindly as well as a rational view alike of its origin and purpose. Though worship of external objects, no matter how majestic and sublime, must be ultimately superseded by a purely spiritual form of adoration, we can clearly see that in the course of human conscious evolution lower concepts of Deity must of necessity precede higher ones, and for this reason we should be ever ready to put the most favorable construction possible upon ancient and modern religious beliefs and usages alike. It is a great, though a very common, error to suppose that so eminently rational and charitable a view means indifference to all essentials of faith or doctrine, for such is surely not the case. The most thoroughly sympathetic view of all religious systems is the one always taken by the most thoroughly devout and conscientious upholders of those essential and fundamental verities, which an impartial investigation of Comparative Religion can only serve to endear more and more to the hearts and minds of all who are liberal and intelligent enough to appreciate, in some vital manner, the splendid words attributed to the Apostle Paul, "GOD has never left Himself without witness." As we trace the widely spreading boughs of Forlong's imaginary tree, and seek to appreciate the manifest significance of its widely ramifying branches, we cannot fail to note how many strange beliefs and practices are often marvellously interlinked. Human progress in civilization seems always to have proceeded along a circuitous path; never does it seem to have gone straight forward. This fact must be well digested before we can possibly estimate truly the career of religious ideas and ceremonies through centuries and milleniums. It has long been a gross mistake, and a fatal error, to suppose that one religious system has necessarily borrowed from another because we can trace extremely close resemblances in many instances between one system and another. This close relationship both in doctrine and ceremonial by no means necessarily proves anything more or other than that different peoples in different countries may have simulanteously reached an almost identical altitude of mental, moral, and spiritual attainment. It is clearly evident that between five and six centuries prior to the commencement of the Christian Dispensation a mighty spiritual, intellectual and moral wave of inspiration and illumination was sweeping voluminously over the Earth, laving Europe, Asia, and the Northern Coast of Africa with its effulgence. Then were the days of the latest of the Buddhas in India, of Confucius, the eminent moral philosopher, and of Laotze, the profound Mystic, in China; also of the greatest of the Philosophers in Greece. How came it about, we may well enquire, that so many illustrious lights were shining contemporaneously in different sections of the world? Surely there are mental, moral, and spiritual tides in the history of Humanity which have their periodic ebb and flow as surely as have the tides of oceans, which most of us have learned to trace. To ascertain the cause and periodicity of these mysterious Psychic Tidal Waves may yet be well within our average power, but up to the present the ability to do this has been claimed as an exclusive possession of certain highly trained or well developed Adepts or Initiates, who can peer within the veil of mystery which has for ages shrouded the inner sanctuaries from the gaze of all the uninitiated. A mighty question is now agitating the minds of rapidly increasing multitudes, viz., Has the time now come for the great unveiling long predicted, and eagerly anticipated by enquiring throngs to-day? The signs are manifold, and they are rapidly accumulating, that we are on the immediate verge of a new Cycle in human history.

To quote the language of Forlong, "There may be observed from the synchronizing of the history of faiths a remarkable tidal wave of intensity which seems to acutely affect the race physically and mentally and with remarkable regularity every six hundred to six hundred and fifty years, reminding us of the Sothic and other cycles, but especially of the mystical phœnix or Solar eras of Egypt and the East. The ebb and flow of this tide is shown on the chart by light broad bands embracing a width of one hundred years."

With the beginning of the Christian era we notice a determined effort to unify, as far as possible, every system older than Christianity. This tendency is so familiar to all students of the Fathers of the early Church, that it seems almost incredible that any graduate from a well equipped divinity college can be ignorant of the fact that what he has been taught to call Christianity is both a compound and a continuation of many ancient faiths and ceremonies; but though this is unmistakably the case we are not thereby justified in characterizing Christianity or the New Testament as in any sense fraudulent, though that serious charge is often brought by vigorous iconoclasts, who can readily trace existing parallels but seem unable to interpret their real significance. The publishers of Forlong's chart were very careful to publish in connection with it the thoroughly truthful statement that it is neither orthodox or heterodox but simply chronological, therefore suitable for general use in all schools where classics are taught; but though it is simply historical in its manifest design, no one who peruses it thoughtfully can fail to trace its distinctly universal implications. Its chief object is professedly to exhibit a gradual evolution of ideas from rude material and elemental symbolism to abstract spiritual conceptions. Several colors are employed, each one denoting some great leading idea which, though long continuing, tends to diverge and at length become lost in some wider common stream. The streams are called merely "Lines of Thought," neither national nor ethnographical in their arrangement, for certain streams of tendency are steadfast while all religious systems are progressive, in consequence of the fact that human nature progresses and one generation of men and women will inevitably put some new construction upon doctrines and ceremonies alike, by no means in strict accordance with the views taken by their predecessors in the same communion.

We are altogether too much inclined to speak of people as Jews, Christians, or Mohammedans, as though such broad designations completely describe as well as effectively label them; but such a mistaken inference can never hold sway over the minds of soberly thoughtful people, seeing that nothing can be more self evident than that there are as many varieties of Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedism, for example, as there are distinctive types of people professing each of these varied systems of religious thought and practice.

We are often apt to think that should we travel in Eastern Asia and mingle freely with Brahmins, Buddhists and Parsees, we should find certain rigid kinds of people professing certain definite doctrines and observing certain ancient and unvarying ceremonies with scarcely anything to distinguish one individual from another among professors of a certain creed. This might prove true, to some extent at least, were we to associate exclusively with the uneducated and largely unthinking rank and file of some specific population, but should we enlarge the scope of our acquaintance, till it included the best educated and most highly representative members of any Oriental community, we should soon discover quite as wide a dissimilarity of thought and practice as we are ever likely to encounter in the West. That fertile author, James Freeman Clarke, whose splendid text book, "Ten Great Religions," is a most valuable mine of rich historical information, often took occasion to remind his hearers, in the course of his always instructive sermons, that we greatly need to remember that though institutions seemingly remain permanent, with their confessions of faith unchanged and their ceremony unaltered, yet because the living members of those institutions are not the men and women of past centuries, we have no right or reason to expect that the personal conduct of any body of people to-day will necessarily be identical with the behavior of the men and women who bore the same distinctive titles in the past. This is, of course, self-evidently true, but as every organization extant to-day contains many widely diversified elements, so was it in even the distant past; consequently the more thoroughly we study history the more clearly convinced do we become that there never was a time when all the professors of a distinctive creed came up to a uniform standard of either intellectuality or morality.

Quite recently the beatification of Jeanne D'Arc, the Maid of Orleans, by the Church of Rome has called much attention to two distinctly separate aspects of the attitude of that Church to the heroic girl who was indeed a deliverer of France, and then a Martyr through the perfidy of the very King and his attendants who owed their exaltation and their safety to the brave inspired damsel without whose valiant leadership the French Army of that period could never have been victorious.

We often hear it said that the Church burnt this maiden as a witch a few hundred years ago and now enthrones her statue above its altars as an object of veneration for the faithful, while priests call upon their people to invoke the intercession of the very girl who was so bitterly denounced and cruelly masacred in a by-gone century. This statement is by no means altogether true, for while it may be a historic fact that those particular persons who put the maiden to death professed the Roman Catholic faith, we cannot learn from any reliable historian that the high dignitaries of the Church as a whole were in any way concerned with her unjust martyrdom. Personal jealousy and other equally base motives animating the corrupt minds of certain men in authority at the time of her condemnation, were the direct external causes of the unjust sentence passed upon her; it is not therefore true to relate that a great Church as a whole condemned the Maid of Orleans in one century and canonized her in another, but it is a fact that the general temper of these times is less barbaric than that of four or five hundred years ago. Yet even now it does not seem impossible that harsh injustice might be meted out to some modern deliverer of France, or any other land, were corrupt men to be in power and in a position to cast a deciding vote as to the fate of a new emancipator.

We can all understand what Felix Adler, President of the New York Society for Ethical Culture, meant when he gave a book the title of "Deed vs. Creed," though that saying cannot always be endorsed at its full face value. What Dr. Adler clearly intended to convey was that good deeds can be performed regardless of creed, and any sort of creed can be intellectually maintained regardless of the behavior of its advocates. We sometimes hear it said that it is of no consequence what we believe provided we live good lives; this is a very shrewd saying requiring very close examination, by reason of the fact that it seems to contain a sort of catch which, however, we soon discover when we penetrate below the surface of its obvious letter. Much good was undoubtedly done some years ago through the columns of the London Daily Telegraph by the publication day after day, for several months, of numerous letters from all conceivable varieties of scribes in answer to the query, Do we Believe? "Of course we all believe something," is the only possible general answer which can be given to this question, but two other inquiries directly follow it, What do we Believe? and, Why do we Believe what we Believe? to which a third may be added, What Influence does our Belief exert over our Conduct? To answer these four queries, not merely to discuss the first in the series, must be the work of the philosophic student, and it will surely not take us very long to make the uncomplimentary discovery that our average beliefs are largely due to nothing else than blind unreasoning compliance with accepted notions entertained by a large majority of persons among whom we have been brought up. Such beliefs cannot well be vital; they are usually little if any better than intellectual lumber, a kind of mental furniture which we take for granted because we have been accustomed to seeing it in our surroundings from our early childhood. Once we begin to think seriously upon the nature and import of belief, we find that our beliefs, if they are in any sense living, cannot be entirely unimportant, because they always do exercise a considerable amount of influence upon our actual life. We cannot really believe in an angry God or in useless and endless misery without being to some extent demoralized thereby; such beliefs, therefore, are decidedly dangerous in their inevitable tendency, because if they are seriously entertained, or even passively accepted, their necessary tendency is to brutalize instead of humanize those who hold them. When, on the other hand, we really believe in a God of love and wisdom, who is in essence entirely beneficent, also in the remedial nature of all chastisement involving suffering both here and hereafter, such a conception must have a tendency to ennoble and purify our own attitude toward our fellow beings. In all our arguments in favor of simple Theism as immeasurably superior to every narrower and cruder faith, we base our claim for its reasonableness and goodness, not upon any metaphysical subtlety, but upon the appeal it makes to all the sweetest and noblest sentiments in our common human nature. People must be dense indeed if they cannot see that a higher idea of divine government, extending throughout the universe, must exert a better influence upon humanity at large than can any lower concept.

Tracing, as far as we are able, the career of the God idea in history, we do not find so much of widely separated streams of thought as we trace a blended current, due to the fact that the greatest teachers of humanity have appeared and worked among all conditions of human development.

To go no further back than the period referred to in the Christian Gospels we are told that a great spiritual luminary blazes forth in the Roman Empire, of which Judea is then a province. This spiritual light shines freely for all and is poetically designated "the Sun of Righteousness arisen with healing in its wings," a prophetic metaphor which clearly gives evidence that the disciples of a great Master believed his mission to be entirely universal in its intent. So it consistently follows that evangelists record that this great teacher commissions his emissaries to go forth as ambassadors into all nations proclaiming good news, or joyful tidings, to every creature. But how do the same evangelists tell us that this Master and his teachings were received? Multitudes at times flocked to his standard and crowds of common people heard him gladly, but there were also many who regarded him as a sorcerer, or as an imposter, and stirred up a conspiracy against him, even as certain vicious elements in Greek society at an earlier day had branded Socrates a foe to religion and virtue and an enemy of the State worthy only of banishment or death. We may well believe that some people both in Greece and in Palestine were actually sincere in their benighed protests against the life and teachings of the great teachers whom they hounded out of physical existence, but in all probability the great majority of those who joined in the clamor for the removal of those who were continually doing good were actuated by far from honorable motives, foremost among which was the constant fear that their own temporal power, which they knew they held unjustly, would soon be wrested from their grasp did they allow a high moral philosophy to win increasing triumphs in lands which they desired unrighteously to govern. But be this as it may, it is not possible that a low type of intellect can ever grasp a very high idea of either divine or human government; thus it often happens that quite sincere, but undeveloped, natures believe that harsh coercive measures are essential to the welfare of the Family and of the State, therefore, from their standpoint, those who teach the Law of Love and adopt a higher policy than that of warfare are looked upon as dangerous fanatics who, if their influence should greatly spread, would quickly undermine and overthrow the safeguards of society. Those who entertain such views, and we have some such human fossils in our midst to-day, cannot see anything but a dangerous menace to morality in the breaking up of the old traditions to which they slavishly adhere, fearing that if these be even weakened a deluge of vice and anarchy will speedily overwhelm the earth. Many preachers who represent the extreme of surviving religious orthodoxy express not the slightest hesitancy in declaring that apart from some element of dogmatic theological teaching interfused, all advance in secular education must eventually result in weakening instead of strengthening the ramparts of morality.

This contention, though ultimately unsound, commends itself with easy readiness to the minds of timid and highly emotional people who have never sought to soberly sift the groundworks of morality. Dogmatic theology has long been so closely associated with moral training in the minds of large rural populations in many countries that it must be difficult for many parents, who belong to an old regime, to understand the attitude of the Ethical Culturists of the present day, and some show of reasonableness attaches to their fears because of the fact that during a transition period like the present, when an impulsive rising generation breaks away from time-honored moorings it is very likely to plunge unthinkingly into an abyss of folly from which it can only be recovered through the agency of a wiser mode of treatment than is yet widely comprehended by the masses. It is, however, only fair to state that the present generation is guilty of no crimes or follies which were not often perpetrated in the so-called "good old days" when the parson was supreme in the village, the Bible regularly read, and family prayer punctually offered. There are evidently two causes for modern religious and social unrest; one is unmistakably due to the spirit of the age, which no attempt to quench can prove successful; the other proceeds from a certain careless impetuosity, begotten of that very restraint which so many short-sighted persons believe to be the only safeguard of youth and upholder of morality. Take us as a whole we are undoubtedly deeper and more serious thinkers than were our forefathers, though we may not have among us any very large number of particularly eminent men and women; but this seeming absence of distinguished geniuses may be fairly attributed to the causes which Bulwer Lytton in his famous novel, "The Coming Race," says the Vril-Ya gave for the absence of distinguished genius in that mysterious subterranean world into which that highly romantic author has introduced his often awestruck readers. Where the general average of intelligence is high we cannot reasonably expect that lofty mental attainments will stand out so conspicuously as where it is comparatively low; likewise where the general moral attitude is fairly lofty we seldom pause to contemplate with great esteem some distinguished moral hero; and again we must not lose sight of the fact that true and lasting morality can never be secured where individuality is suppressed and the people cowed into submission by threats of terrific punishment if they dare to disobey the mandates of their commanding officers. We are certainly nearer to the long predicted Golden Age than we have ever been before.

But what is really meant by this romantic figure of speech? we may well enquire. An age in which literal gold is worshiped, as though it were veritable Deity, must ever be an age of dire calamity, and such it has ever proved whenever and wherever this popular idol has been enthroned for adoration. Gold in the Alchemical sense means something far different indeed from any precious material metal, though it can scarcely be seriously disputed among students of Alchemistic Philosophy that all its chief exponents have admitted the possibility of the literal transmutation of baser into superior metals, and all eventually into gold. The symbolic mention of gold, however, directs our thoughts far away from all external treasures and centers them upon a celestial inheritance, in comparison with which all worldly possessions must sink into utter insignificance; therefore we are perpetually assured by Mystics of every rank and name, that the true object of Alchemical research is the regeneration of individual human beings immediately, and ultimately of the entire Human Race. "I believe in the resurrection of the Body and in the Life Everlasting," originally meant far more than it means to the average Creed-reciter of to-day, who is usually one who scarcely seeks to find any interior meaning in the mighty mystic words which rise so glibly to the lips of all who have simply learned to utter published phrases. In like manner Baptismal Regeneration is taken only as to its most external garb, when in reality it has true reference to that marvel of interior transformation which it has always been the object of the Mysteries to progressively unveil. The first body to be considered when we are dealing with Mystic Initiation is, of course, the inner body of the Neophyte or Candidate, one who is sometimes termed a Catechumen; but as no selfish desire for exclusive individual salvation or enlightenment can ever be approved spiritually, it has always been the open as well as the private teaching of real Initiates that Social Regeneration is the great intent of all true Mystic Schools.

Turning again to Forlong's Chart for illustrative examples, we find the colors employed are Red. Blue, Green, Pink, Brown, Violet and Yellow. Worship of Fetiches is marked at the very beginning of the record and takes historic rank with Charms and Amulets, which were venerated everywhere in the remotest ages of which we possess any definite or authentic record. Three quite distinct, but for long contemporary, objects of world-wide veneration were the Tree, pictured appropriately in green; the Lingam and Yoni, sacred to Phallic Faiths, portrayed in yellow; and the Serpent, portrayed in brown, doubtless to suggest the earth on which the serpent moves. These three especially ancient Emblems all interblend and at length become merged, or at least united, in the Sacred Ritual of ancient Egypt, accounts of which are now quite easily procurable. About 3000 B. C., according to Forlong's reckoning, there were great wars between Jovites and Titanites and between Solar and Lunar worshipers. At this distance of time it is not necessary to attempt to enter elaborately into the causes and nature of these conflicts, but it does certainly appear that the position of the opposite sexes, as objects of veneration, was often a burning point of controversy in olden times.

With recent dissertations concerning Atlantis the antiquity of ancient Faiths seems much greater than before that once mighty submerged Island-continent became a subject of popular research, as it had not become when Forlong's Chart was originally issued, but though LePlongeon and other indefatigable students of antiquity quite clearly trace all Oriental and Occidental beliefs and practices to their common home in Atlantis, it is highly probable that the dispersion of religious systems rapidly spread at the time of the breaking up of that mysterious land, the last remnants of which are said to have finally collapsed very nearly 10,000 years before the commencement of the Christian Era.

This great event may well account for the existence of a specific traceable chronology carrying us back to 10,000 B. C., but no further.

Definite and simple Theism, within the present historic period (traced in vivid red on Forlong's Chart) is not made to appear earlier than 2,400 B. C. Intensely interesting, and instructive also, though these graphically formulated statements prove there must always be some doubt as to precise historic accuracy, though none whatever as to the real prevalence of different Religious Systems and very little as to the effect which each is logically calculated to exert upon its faithful devotees.

This point conceded, we must be prepared to go a definite step further, and consider that all Systems have their letter and their spirit, and while the letter is always crude, and sometimes even barbaric, the spirit is pure and gentle, reminding us of nuts, which have hard indigestible exterior shells while they are inwardly delicious and nutritious.

"The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," is not a text that can apply alone to the Mosaic Law, or to any other portions of the Bible of the Jew and of the Christian; it is applicable to every record accounted sacred by any section of mankind. Is there then no place remaining in these modern days for missionary enterprise? There is a vast new field opening for missionary endeavor, but the coming missionary must be a man or woman widely awake to the actual needs of our present humanity, which greatly needs convincing of the unity of all religious systems at their core. The letter of all systems is in process of sure disintegration and in this dissolving process many observers think they see the growing disappearance of religion itself from earth In this surmise they must soon find themselves mistaken, for actual discovery of the roots of all religious trees is leading multitudes to accept, not Atheism but Theosophy. Annie Besant is not the only brilliant worker in the ranks of Atheistic propaganda who has discovered its pitiful unsatisfactoriness, though she has proved an exceptionally prominent and influential example in this connection. Prof. Charles Eliot, President Emeritus of Harvard University, has undoubtedly, to some extent, correctly outlined the religion of the future, but that religion may have many other excellent aspects besides those which this kindly veteran educator has vigorously emphasized. The religion of the future is certainly in the making, and though it can be neither wished nor expected that it will be an entirely new production, it is not unduly optimistic or presumptuous to predict that it will contain all that is worth preserving in the heritages we have gathered from the past, but as new times require new applications of eternal verities, we must not imagine that anything worth preserving is being swept away because old truth is being freshly garmented and the present generation is voicing the Wisdom of the Ages in a language of its own.

CHAPTER III.

ANCIENT AND MODERN IDEAS OF REVELATION.—ITS SOURCES AND AGENCIES.

Though the true meaning of a revelation is simply a disclosure this obviously simple word has long been one to conjure with, and it is still to-day a veritable storm-center wherever theological matters are discussed.

Scientifically, however, the word presents no difficulties, for in scientific circles it is always used as the synoynm of discovery. We may truly say that we receive a revelation of the heavens when we gaze through telescopes into the midnight skies and trace the process of the constellations, but no one imagines for an instant that the stars are deliberately showing themselves to astronomers and hiding their faces from all other persons. But it remains a fact that certain astronomers actually see far more of the heavenly bodies than is beheld by the general bulk of any population.

Let us apply this simple illustration to those great seers or prophets, who may well be termed the spiritual star-gazers of our race. Such men and women are figuratively represented as climbing to the tops of mountains, and delving into caves of the earth and clefts of rocks, just as astronomers and geologists literally ascend mountain eminences, and dive into the depths of the crust of the planet, that they may in the one case have a wider view of the sky and in the other a bettre opportunity to examine the layers or strata of the globe. We know quite well that certain places are particularly favorable for astronomical observations; among these deep wells have always occupied a foremost place, for we can see the stars at midday if we descend into a well and at night-time we can only have a wide sweep of the heavens if we plant our observatories on lofty heights. Natural similitudes have always been employed by bards or psalmists to describe their realization of the nearness of the spiritual universe, which does indeed interpenetrate as well as encircle all material orbs. The nineteenth psalm, and some majestic portions of the Book of Job, won the admiration of Thomas Paine, who quotes some splendid passages in his "Age of Reason," in which much controverted volume he levels biting sarcasm at many other portions of the Bible, which he deems entirely inconsistent with the glorious conception of the Supreme Being set forth in the quotations he admires. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork," is a superb tribute to its author's sublime idea of Nature, and yet more does it testify to his realization of human ability to scan the heavens and read, in their outspread beauties, the caligraphy of the Almighty. The cattle in the fields are just as near the sky as the shepherd who is tending his flocks on the same pasture ground, but we have no reason to suppose that sheep or oxen contemplate the heavens as did the shepherd king of ancient Israel, and we have no ground for surmising that even the average human traveler who ascends to the summit of some lofty peak has anything like the same idea of the starlit skies as those Magi or Wise Men of ancient Persia or Chaldea, who are said to have discovered the Star of Bethlehem at the time of the birth of Jesus. Every age has had, and the present undoubtedly has, its particularly earnest and qualified inspectors of the widely open book of natural revelation, which is never for an instant closed except in the face of ignorance and indifference. Were we all equally open-eyed and open-minded we should all receive an equal revelation, for Nature holds no secrets shut away from some, which are purposely revealed to others. Who, let us ask, were those prophets of old, who saw and heard so much more of the ways of Deity than did the hosts of their contemporaries, to whom they always appear as almost unfathomable enigmas, strange beings like "super-men," to be either blindly venerated or ruthlessly persecuted, according to the temper of those among whom they mingled. These mystic visionaries, and stalwart champions of righteousness, have ever been the glory of the lands on which they have set foot, and their record is handed down through successive centuries and milleniums as bearing special witness to divine interposition in the ordinary affairs of men. But science, perhaps, will not allow us to use that word interposition, seeing that it gives color to a belief very much at variance with general scientific reasoning; let us then interpret the history of those romantic dwellers on the borders of the unseen universe in reasonable terms, easily understood by all who are diligently seeking to show that unity exists between the physical and superphysical at all times. We may well afford to discard the adjective "supernatural," unless we give it a significance quite at variance with much that passes for theology. There are higher and lower planes of nature; thus it is not incorrect to call some super and others sub, when we are comparing them with a genreal average level of human intellectual attainment, which claims to have a certain amount of acquaintance with a very limited portion of Nature, but freely speculates regarding other realms, which are beyond the scrutiny of ordinary observations. There is nothing unscientific, and certainly nothing irrational, in lending a willing ear to the testimony of the ages on behalf of spiritual revelation, provided we always admit that what was possible in the past is equally possible to-day, and that however strange to us certain phenomena may seem, we have no ground for supposing that because they are (to us) mysterious, they are not as much in harmony with the operation of undeviating law as the erratic movements of a celestial visitor like Halley's Comet, which comes to visit our skies only about once in every seventy-five years, instead of appearing regularly in the heavens like those familiar planets Jupiter, Venus, Mercury, Mars and Saturn, who are old friends to every one of us. Whatever we are accustomed to regularly behold we are quite certain to call natural, but anything unusual or previously unknown to us we are apt to dub supernatural, thereby exposing a strange, but familiar, combination of ignorance and self-conceit. What right have we to claim to so far know the limits of the natural as either to deny the possibility of some curious phenomenon or else rashly attribute it to some miraculous intervention of divine providence, as though God changed or suspended universal order every time we encounter something we are not wise enough to explain? The growing thought of to-day in cultured circles is drifting ever further and further away from atheism, and from supernaturalism also, and is coming to a reasonable conclusion that the unseen universe has never been entirely invisible to the whole of humanity, though very few apparently have anywhere at any time penetrated to any large extent into its mysterious depths. The honored names of Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and many other distinguished modern scientists immediately summon forth the idea of fearless and industrious seekers after truth coupling psychical research with general mundane occupations. These good and great men, and many others associated with them, have during many years of indefatigable investigation accumulated an enormus quantity of facts which have already gone immensely far to dispel the clouds of superstition and negation which still, to some extent, obscure the public intellect, even in Great Britain and America where intellectual progress has supposedly reached a very noble pitch. Soon after the breaking forth of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism in America, in 1848, a large number of highly distinguished men of light and leading in various communities undertook a searching investigation of the claims of the new cult, which from its inception has always embodied within itself the most curiously heterogeneous elements. Among distinguished authors on both sides the Atlantic a foremost place is deservedly given to William Howitt, whose compendious work, "The History of The Supernatural in all Ages and Nations, and in all Churches, Christian and Pagan, demonstrating a universal faith" may well be styled a monumental tribute to ripe painstaking scholarship. In this great work, issued in two large volumes both in England and America, we have an account of spiritual manifestations of the most widely diversified character, ranging from the truly angelic to the distinctively diabolical, and as the author was one of the best known scholars of his day, and a man who wrote much of the best standard educational literature published in Great Britain during the middle of the Nineteenth Century, his testimony cannot be lightly brushed aside; nor can we justifiably ignore the works of those famous Americans, Mapes and Hare, or the writings of Judge Edmonds and many other equally well known and highly reliable members of the learned professions, all of whom from a worldly standpoint risked much, but could gain nothing, by giving their endorsement to the genuineness of marvels which were rudely scouted, not only by the ordinary people but by the great majority of college professors and graduates who would not condescend to seriously investigate them. No one doubts that a vast amount of fraud has been introduced in the name of Spiritualism, and we cannot close our eyes to the fact that many honest people are sometimes subject to hallucinations, but there is unmistakably a large residiuum of fact which conclusively proves the existence of a spiritual life in humanity which far transcends all materialistic theories of human origin and destiny. Prof. Alfred Russel Wallace,—himself an earnest Spiritualist as well as a world-renowned Naturalist—has sometimes expressed his opinion that our humanity to-day does not essentially differ from the humanity expressed on earth during the Stone Age or some other remote geological period. If this be a fact, and we see no reason to dispute it, we can very readily understand how it has come to pass that we find ourselves to-day invited to share experiences common to ancient nations and individuals who have left behind them extraordinary testimonies to the commingling, to some extent at least, of discarnate spiritual entities with physically embodied humanity. Without presuming to deny the exisitence of multitudinous orders of intelligencies in the Universe belonging to very different planets and systems than our own, we have certainly the right, and it is indeed our imperative scientific duty, to weigh the alleged evidence brought forward in fancied support of the oft-repeated allegation that the Angels of light, and also the Demons of darkness, constantly referred to in our Bible, and in a multitude of other venerated Scriptures, belong to other orders in Creation than ourselves. It seems almost unaccountable, in the face of the Biblical record itself, that anyone should ever have imagined that the authors of the text ever had in mind the appearance on earth as Angels, of beings of any other Order than ourselves, for the narrators always describe celestial visitors as men, or at any rate as human, for there is no definite allusion to sex in any original. The masculine and plural genders are very much confused in English versions of Hebrew Scriptures, and this is often due to the fact that a great many Hebrew words fail to give any idea that one sex rather than the other is indicated. Nothing but senseless bigotry and old-fogeyism can have led ecclesiastical commissioners to reject statues representing angels, as occurred at one time in New York, because the sculptor had chiseled some of them in male and others in female shape, and for educated Christians to take so ridiculous a stand would be quite incomprehensible were it not for our painful familiarity with the strenuous endeavors of intolerant males in many ages to consign their mothers and sisters to comparative oblivion while they filled all important offices themselves and derived their adequate support very largely indeed from the work and income of the female members of their flocks. A very old and powerful weapon is wrested from the grasp of masculine ecclesiastical monopolists immediately we prove to the world that the very authority on which they have relied to sustain their fictitious claims is actually against them. People have a perfect right to openly dispute the doctrine of Biblical authority, but there can be no fair play if we misrepresent the teachings of any documents and then base our own dogmas on such misrepresentation. The first chapter of Genesis emphatically declares that original Humanity is equally male and female. There can be but two intelligible explanations of this fact, viz., the ancient belief, still entertained by many Mystics, that human beings were originally super-sexual, sex differentiation only beginning with some departure from an original condition, and the much simpler view, which we can all appreciate without plunging into any deep waters of Mysticism, that whenever and wherever human life first made its appearance on this planet males and females were existent side by side on terms of complete equality. Who then are the Bible angels who so frequently appeared to patriarchal families of old? Young men, in our English text, they frequently are called, and so perfectly human in all their attributes did they appear that frequently we are told the inhabitants of cities in which they manifested mistook them for ordinary travelers,—a circumstance which once for all disposes of the claim that they were something other than human, or that they appeared in any startling, because unfamiliar, guise We have no justifiable reason for deciding that all the Biblical Angels were even human spiritual entities disrobed of flesh; it is quite rational to maintain that the word "angel" is often used to designate a messenger from some Spiritual Order, one who merely held high rank as a teacher or ambassador and who was entrusted with some particular commission to a special place and people. There seems good reason for admitting the contention of Edward Irving,—founder of the body of Christians styling itself Catholic Apostolic Church,—that the primitive Chrisian Church acknowledged four Orders of Ministers, the highest of which was termed Angels. This doctrine proclaimed successfully in the Nineteenth century, first in Great Britain, and then in several other lands, by the intrepid Irving and his devoted followers, derived much sanction from the opening chapters of the Apocalypse, which speaks of the message of the Spirit being sent to the Angels of the Seven Churches of Asia, the plain inference being that the overseers thus designated must have held a rank similar to that of bishops in many Christian communities to-day. It seems, however, certain that though the simplest definition of angel is, broadly speaking, messenger, ancient Scriptures give us frequently to understand that beings ordinarily unseen occasionally made their appearance in materialized form, and when they did so they were not generally distinguishable from ordinary human beings. Whenever we are led to suppose that they were seen by common vision we may rationally suppose that they were actually young Initiates into the Temple Mysteries of antiquity, commissioned by the Heads of the Orders to act as ambassadors or intermediaries. This very simple commentary on some, otherwise highly mysterious, portions of the Bible text explains lucidly and simply the oft-repeated title "Angel of the Lord," which occurs with great frequency, and though it may come as a decided shock to Bible-worshipers to be offered so simple a commentary, even the most orthodox of such,—if in any way connected with one or other of the sacerdotal Churches,—will soon begin to see that if such were the case in days of old, this fact only bears witness to the antiquity and continuity of a priestly system, and priesthoods are, as we all well know, much more ancient than either Christianity or Judaism. According to the ideas we are now expressing, we must take into exact account the original meaning of terms and titles variously translated GOD; the Lord God; the Lord; and the Angel of the Lord. These designatory titles are by no means correctly interchangeable, and the fact that they have been so largely regarded as synonymous has led to an immense amount of bewildering and acrimonious controversy. We can scarcely believe that any man, woman, youth or maiden, possessed of ordinary intelligence and fairly well acquainted with the English language, would ever imagine that these four plainly distinctive titles were used as synonyms originally, any more than one is inclined to believe, when reading general history, that an envoy is the monarch whose commissions he has been appointed to fulfil. Every student of Kabbalistic literature knows thoroughly well that the oldest Hebrew documents treat largely of various Orders of Intelligences who execute Divine commissions and take actively influential parts in directing the affairs of Earth. No one can read a modern Jewish Prayer Book, belonging to the orthodox or conservative school, without finding frequent mention of several Celestial Hierarchies, in accordance with very ancient terminology. For example, we will turn to the standard popular orthodox Jewish Prayer Book in use throughout the British Empire, and to a considerable extent also in the United States. In the course of the Morning Service for Sabbaths and Festivals, occur the following majestic words, which are verily a beautiful link between the more prosaic present and the richly-storied and imaginative past: "Be thou blessed, O our Rock, our King and Redeemer, Creator of holy beings. Praised be thy name for ever, O our King; Creator of ministering spirits, all of whom stand in the heights of the universe and proclaim with awe in unison aloud the words of the living God and everlasting King. All of them are beloved, pure and mighty, and all of them in dread and awe do the will of their Master; and all of them open their mouths in holiness and purity, with song and psalm, while they bless and praise, glorify and reverence, sanctify and ascribe sovereignty to the name of the Divine King, the great, mighty and dreaded One, holy is he; and they all take upon themselves the yoke of the kingdom of heaven one from the other, and give sanction to one another to hallow their Creator; in tranquil joy of spirit, with pure speech and holy melody they all respond in unison, and exclaim with awe; Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory; and the Ophanim and the holy Chayoth with a noise of great rushing, upraising themselves towards the Seraphim, thus over against them offer praise and say Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place."

The above quotation, which would find no exact parallel in any Prayer Book compiled by Rabbis of the Reform school, is an interesting survival, both in sentiment and language, of very ancient Jewish thought, tho' we would presume to suggest that improvements in the English version would in no way obscure the meaning of the Hebrew original, which still remains the unrivaled tongue of orthodox Israelitish worship. · Such a word as "dread" finds a better substitute in "reverence," and it is highly important to keep this thought in mind when we undertake to criticize the Bible texts, from the sublime imagery of which such utterances have been collated. Ezekiel's visions are responsible for such passages as the one just cited, and it is, of course, very largely open to conjecture how far it was formerly believed in Israel that these visions were actually revelations of life in the Spiritual Universe, and how far the language was designedly symbolical. But however much room there may be for controversy in this particular regard, no doubt whatever can exist in the minds of those who have made themselves familiar with the records of antiquity, that the Jews, in common with all other historic peoples, had firm confidence in the real existence of unnumbered legions of spiritual emopanies, who were often called the Legions of the Skies. It has remained for Le Plongeon, and a few other indefatigable modern investigators in the Western Hemisphere to prove conclusively the enormous antiquity of similar convictions in Western as well as Eastern lands. Though at first sight it may appear to unreflecting minds that there is little else than primitive superstition in these allusions to manifold Orders of spiritual existences, it surely requires but a very little intelligent meditation on the scientifically revealed arrangement of the universe to put to flight so vapid a conclusion. Harmony is everywhere self-evidently displayed in the systematic organization of solar systems which stud the immensities of infinitude, and in all the myriad systems of worlds discovered through the piercing eye of the most far-reaching telescopes, we find no two globes exactly similar tho' all are constructed of a single primary substance and all revolve with such perfect regularity that astronomers know exactly when to expect the re-appearance of even the remotest star in the gigantic aggregation of constellations which make up our universe. This indisputable natural revelation well comports with all that we are accustomed to call Natural Religion, and when it is fairly weighed it serves to explain, without denying the primal basis of Revealed Religion, because when both are rightly understood one dovetails into the other. Natural Religionists invariably claim that they derive all their ideas from a contemplation of natural phenomena without the interposition of any priests or angels, but they who make this claim to possess more information than the majority of their fellows are simply placing themselves in the ranks of what may well be called a scientific priesthood, and nothing is more self-evident than that avowed Rationalists place extreme reliance upon the authority of great names and point to scientific discoveries with immense satisfaction, though they were made by others than themselves.

There is very little difference at core between this attitude and that of the most confirmed Theosophists, for the latter only claim that their authorities are peculiarly endowed individuals whom they term the Elder Brethren of our race. Recent Theosophical publications are far less difficult to read and understand than are the older writings of the Alchemistical Philosophers, who had a double object for concealing the inner meaning of their teaching within a cloak of hieroglyphical symbology. The "jargon of the Mystics," as this allegorical method has been vulgarly termed, was rendered necessary during the Middle Ages in Europe on account of the ignorant fanaticism then and there prevailing, for without the employment of a mystic glyph there would have been no safety for the writers and also no means of communication between fellow students of the Mysteries. We glibly speak of the great discoveries made by Bruno, Galileo, Herschel, Newton, Kepler, and many other highly endowed men who lived but a few centuries ago, and we praise them none too highly when we pay glowing tributes to their research and industry; but there is no valid reason for continuing to assert that the heliocentric system of astronomy was not known long ages before modern Europe was a home of learning. We are far too apt to claim some monopoly for discovery or revelation, which always covers a much larger area than can be bounded by any special time or place. We ought now to be ready to recast our theories concerning the spread of religious ideas and practices, many of which may have sprung up simultaneously in different parts of the world instead of having been borrowed by one nation from another.

Astronomers in their observatories need not make each other's acquaintance, or even know of each other's existence, to make similar observations of celestial phenomena, for it is quite possible that different men in various places at the same time may be turning their eyes to the heavens and watching the same celectial panorama.

The Egyptian and Indo-Germanic theories of the transit of religions and languages have often been pitted against each other as rival candidates for universal acceptance, but as the Atlantian theory is very much older than either, we may find in it a very fair solution of many difficult problems which a less universal theory of origins will fail to supply. The kings and queens of very ancient days may have indeed ruled by that divine right of individual qualification for supremacy without which all nominal rulership is the next thing to a farce. The Gods and Godesses of ancient Greece and Rome are now often looked upon as glorified rulers of Atlantis, whose memory had been handed down with ever increasing glorification, just as we are prone to glorify our national heroes and heroines until from a basis in actual history we construct mental images of almost divine personages whose anniversaries we celebrate as public holidays and whose memories we extol so highly that many of them shortly become saints and even demigods in our esteem. When we read Homer's Iliad and Odyssey we are at once impressed with the very earthly attributes assigned by that great poet to the divinities of the Pantheon. Such beings as are therein described are so entirely human in all their feelings and conduct that we can well belive that their idealized existence in the Empyrean was founded on records of their actual life on earth, a conclusion easily reached by all who know how firm a hold ancestor worship has held and still holds upon the hearts and minds of multitudes. There is much more that is historical, and consequently much less that is fabulous, in the views of Mythologists than many of us have been brought up to believe, for we are now experiencing a reaction in thought from the extremely materialistic views which for many centuries held undisputed sway in nearly every Western seat of learning. So dense has been the darkness in which college professors were engulfed where the Classics were concerned, and so relentless was the prejudice against Oriental religions, that in every European university students were taught to believe that there was no truth whatever in the religious concepts of even the most illustrious Pagans, apart from some concession being made to the excellence of a portion of their moral philosophy. Now it is becoming the fashion to treat the pagan divinities very much as we treat the Christian saints, who were certainly human beings with an actual earthly career, though it is very doubtful whether such narratives as we find in the "Lives of the Saints" published with ecclesiastical sanction, could in all cases be verified by historic scrutiny. Our own contemporaries may be, some of them at least, quite as intelligent and also quite as saintly as their greatly revered progenitors, but as distance always lends enchantment to a view, we are rarely if ever anything like so ready to canonize those who are living among us as those who have long since departed from this mortal state. There are, however, four distinct elements in mythology without due regard to which we are unable to make much progress in Biblical and Occult research. These are, first, Astronomical and Astrological; second, Historical and Biographical; third, Spiritualistic and Idealistic; fourth, Esoteric and Intuitive. We can read any ancient story in the light of this fourfold method of interpretation without doing violence to reason or good judgment, for we must always remember that there were no cheap printing presses in days of old or in Classic lands making it easy for every item of unimportant information to be recorded in a daily paper. Scribes in olden times were exceptionally capable people and the art of writing was looked upon as sacred, therefore, only the very important events in the life of the people would be permanently recorded, and that portion of their literature which would be produced on well-nigh imperishable tablets would be the work of those exceptionally learned ones to whom was entrusted the custody of those affairs which were generally esteemed as of the highest moment. Trivial incidents are often mentioned but not for their own sake, only for the purpose of illustrating important teachings which the wise men gave to their students through the agency of a double cipher, which enabled those who were in the inner ring of the students' conclave to ascertain the teachers' esoteric meaning, while all outside that consecrated circle would only hear of common-place events of no exceptional significance. When this fact is thoroughly digested and we consider the parabolic teaching still universal in the East, our examination of ancient records will become both edifying and fascinating and we shall be able to escape the Scylla of unreasoning scepticism and also the Charybdis of blind unquestioning belief in the Divine authority of all that any record holds.

CHAPTER IV.

VARIOUS SPIRITUAL ELEMENTS IN THE BIBLE AND CLASSIC LITERATURE.

In that highly authentic work by William Howitt, "The History of the Supernatural," that learned and painstaking author, whose reverence for the Jewish and Christian Scriptures was extremely great, justifies his employment of that old-fashioned theological term,—now frequently superseded by the far simpler word superphysical, in the following graphic language: "The author of this work intends by the supernatural the operation of those higher and more recondite laws of God with which, being yet but most imperfectly acquainted, we either denominate their effects miraculous, or, shutting our eyes firmly, deny their existence altogether. So far from holding that what are called miracles are interruptions, or violations of the course of nature, he regards them only as the results of spiritual laws, which in their occasional action subdue, suspend, or neutralize the less powerful physical laws, just as a stronger chemical affinity subdues a weaker one, producing new combinations, but combinations strictly in accordance with the collective laws of the universe, whether understood or not understood by us. At a time when so many objections are raised to portions of the Scripture narrative, which unsettle men's minds and haunt them with miserable forebodings, the author has thought it of the highest importance to bring into a comprehensive view the statements of the most eminent historians and philosophers of all ages and nations on the manifestations of those spiritual agencies amongst them, which we, for want of farther knowledge, term supernatural." This extremely fertile author completely fulfilled his promise to his readers to acquaint them with well-nigh universal testimony to the reality of spiritual occurrences which have taken place, sometimes plentifully, and at other times but rarely, in every section of the globe, and though William Howitt may well be ranked among Christian apologists as well as among Bible elucidators, he was an uncompromising, though never a fanatical or unreasoning, Spiritualist. The American edition of the famous English book to which we are now alluding was published in Philadelphia in 1863, by the celebrated firm of J. B. Lippincott & Co., at a time when the British and American publics were intensely agitated over religious scepticism on the one hand and the stupendous claims of modern Spiritualists on the other. Had it not been for William Howitt's wide and high reputation already achieved in literary circles, it is doubtful whether his explanations of Spiritualism would have excited much attention, but the name and fame of this distinguished author were unquestionably such that whatever he published was always perused thoughtfully by intelligent persons in all stations. The unique value of such a treatise is in the light it throws upon the universality of spiritual unveilings. How the claimant for exclusive revelation can derive any satisfaction from so broad a testimony we are at a loss to see, but to the student of Sacred Literature in general, rather than of a single volume, the extent of territory covered in the narrative must prove thoroughly welcome as well as enormously enlightening. Good and evil spirits are acknowledged in all records of spiritual intercommunion during modern as well as ancient days, but by "evil" is never corectly meant "hopelessly depraved," for the unanimous testimony of all truly enlightened teachers in all climes and ages has been in complete condemnation of the hideous doctrine of endless and useless suffering and its boon companion, total depravity. These nightmares of false theology have never received support or sanction at the hands of any illuminated teachers, and it is quite safe to aver that there never was a really enlightened spiritual teacher on earth at any time who endorsed the garbled misinterpretations of Sheol, Gehenna, Tartarus, and other Hebrew and Greek terms for states of post-mortem purification, which are found either in the Bible or in the Classics. But however true the statements may be that "the door of reformation is never closed" and that "the pathway of progress lies eternally unobstructed before every human soul,"—as certain Spiritualist Societies declare that it does,—such an affirmation by no means disposes of the darker aspects of spirit-communion, though it does suggest to us a reasonable attitude to take toward those "dwellers on the threshold" who are frequently mistaken, by credulous persons, for some mighty angelic beings who are supposed to be amazingly advanced along the path of progress. We cannot curtly dismiss the doctrine of "obsession," disagreeable though its contemplation may be, with the mere snap of a contemptuous finger, but if dark as well as bright unseen influences are around us, whether we know that such is the case or whether we are ignorant thereof, we may rest well assured that the incessant operation of the undeviating law of spiritual affinity must ever be the factor which determines the class of influences to which we yield, and this same law must inevitably at all times regulate our closest psychic intimacies. "I will fear no evil," says the composer of the twenty-third psalm, a phrase which would be meaningless did the word "evil" convey no meaning to its employer's mind. Good and evil are to our understanding relative, not absolute terms. Absolutely there can be no evil but relatively all discord or disease is evil, while all harmony or health is good. This concept is so entirely universal that in all lands and through all ages the demonstrated healing of the sick, through some ordinarily uncomprehended agency, has furnished satisfactory proof that the operating intelligence was of beneficient character. Among Jews and Romans alike this test was considered quite conclusive at the beginning of the Christian era, and all through the following centuries, including the present, the same idea has remained so widely prevalent that works of healing are always triumphantly referred to as evidences of the holy source whence mysterious abilities are derived. "Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?" is a question just as pertinent to-day as when propounded in the time of Jesus. Miracles of healing are only performable by magicians of the "white" variety; those of the "black" order can produce genuine manifestations of many dubious kinds; they can startle but they cannot heal, because healing being a work of harmonizing is not within the range of rites performable by those who live in discord, and as the great divide between Leucomancy and Necromancy, i. e., between light-dispensing and death-dealing magic, is that the former is always operated with benignant and the latter with malign intent, it is not very difficult to discriminate intelligently between a righteous Spiritualism and an unrighteous Sorcery. At this point many would-be Bible interpreters have appeared almost insanely blind, for even in this day we often read reports of sermons against Spiritualism displaying such crass ignorance on the part of the preacher that we know full well that nothing but blear-eyed prejudice or sheer stupidity could have allowed such utterances to pass as "gospel preaching" when we all know "gospel" is a synonym for good news and joyful tidings. It is indeed an important part of a prophetic ministry to warn the unwary against dangers which lurk in their path, often unseen and unsuspected, but there are but two ways in which such warning can be profitably given; one being to counsel the highest moral integrity and the other to recommend firm development of individuality, neither of which good purposes can possibly be served by diatribe and the hopeless confounding of things which radically differ. It must certainly be frankly admitted that there are many statements in various parts of the Hebrew Scriptures fiercely condemnatory of Babylonian magical arts as they were practiced during the Jewish Captivity, and it was almost immediately after the return of the Jews to Palestine that there arose great prophets in Israel who strongly urged upon the people an immediate recantation of their errors and an instant return to the pure monotheism which was from the very first the pride and glory of Israel. No doubt there are many passages in various portions of the Bible which can be so construed as to make it appear that every form of divination was condemned by the prophets in the name of God, but if so strained an interpretation be placed on doubtful passages, what can we say concerning Joseph and his divining cup which was found in the sack of his younger brother Benjamin, when this same Joseph was held up for admiration as a true prophet and one through whose gracious influence famine was averted in Egypt and his own brethren, despite their cruelty to him in his youth, most hospitably received and kindly treated in the time of their necessity? What can we say concerning Samuel who was not only clairaudient in childhood but grew up to be a mighty prophet, one to whom the people resorted, and never in vain, for wise direction in times of difficulty; and what indeed concerning a whole host of prophets who were all diviners in some respects but who righteously adhered to the moral law and only employed divination for honorable and praiseworthy ends. It surely needs no unusual acumen to discriminate between prophesy and witchcraft, seeing that the original of the word witch means one who exerts unholy spells with malicious purpose, a practice not entirely absent from the ranks of unscrupulous persons in the present day. No matter whether the spells worked or not, the true prophets of every age and people have entiely condemned every practice actuated by any desire to work injury upon man or beast, and they have also condemned all those highly objectionable methods resorted to in the Babylonian Empire which had for their object entering into communion with unseen beings through the arts of necromancy, which were so entirely different from all respectable Spiritualistic practices that it is manifestly unfair to in any way confound them. We hear a good deal about "malicious mesmerism," and much else that is uncanny when the inner workings of some modern societies are divulged and one party undertakes to criminate another, and though it is a very open question how far such charges can ever be substantiated, we have a right to set our faces very decidedly against all endeavors to misuse any occult agency with which we may be familiar. Nothing can well be more weird and despicable than to endeavor to pervert telepathy or mental telegraphy to the base end of harming someone against whom we feel resentment; but on the other hand we can readily see how truly kindhearted may be the action of benevolent and conscientious people who give what they term "absent mental treatments" for the sole purpose of assisting others to gain or to recover health and to rise superior to all sorts of temptations and difficulties. The cry of danger is sure to be raised in some quarters whenever the mysterious is mentioned, and the faint-hearted are very readily alarmed at any cry of "wolf," no matter by whom that cry is raised; but we should like to inquire of those alarmists, who are always prating of real or imaginary dangers, whether they know of any domain in the whole wide field of scientific and mechanical progress in which there is no danger Let calamity-howlers and other scarecrowists be consistent and they must of necessity warn us against the use of steam, electricity, and every other appliance of civilization, and they must also veto every advance in the art of navigation, especially that of the air, because of the perils actually encountered by sailors and aviators. We have no right to suppose that we are entirely immune from danger until we have reached the height attained only by great adepts in any line of enterprise, but such elevated conditions have never been reached by cravens; only the strong and the brave are fitted to scale the heights on which now stand the triumphant heroes whose motto is evermore Excelsior.

Alluding again to the work of William Howitt we can easily follow him in his daring assertions that miracle is "the eternal heritage of the church," but let us always remember that the Latin word miraculum only means something wonderful because unexplained, though not inexplicable. People marvel greatly whenever they witness anything they fail to comprehend, but if they use their reason they do not therefore attribute it either to jugglery or diablerie. A great mass of testimony has recently been collected proving that works of healing similar to those described of old are now taking place among us, some of them within the pale of organized churches, but very many entirely outside of all recognized organizations. Christian Scientists and other would-be monopolists of the healing power may well point with satisfaction to their own successes, but they can have no right wahtever to claim that they alone are gifted with power to heal, or that similar wonders wrought by people outside their ranks are due to "malicious magnetism" or some other scarecrow which they have trumped up in the interests of their monopoly. There are very good people within the ranks of all parties, who because of their earnestness and faith do truly accomplish wonders, but no single denomination or institution whether it be a church or a school, has a shred of evidence to support its bombastic claim if ever it attempts to prove that it alone is a repository of divine grace or healing energy. The power to heal has ever been regarded as both a divine gift and a scientific attainment, and far from these ideas being mutually exclusive they are in complete accord, the thought of a divine gift referring properly to our inward containment, and scientific skill to the results of human industry making use of the gifts latent within us. No one can read that portion of the Book of Exodus which recounts the tale of Moses and Aaron on one side, and Pharaoh's magicians on the other, without at once discerning that the narrator considered it a self-evident proof that Moses and Aaron were under the patronage of heaven, while the emissaries of the King of Egypt received no divine sanction, because the former could and did heal the sick, while the latter with their enchantments could only add to the sufferings of afflicted men and animals. Whatever those wonders were which preceded the outgoing of Israel from Egypt, they were certainly considered by Josephus and other eminent historians as clenching the matter in favor of the Hebrews, seeing that they possessed among them prophetic leaders who could disarm all antagonism and triumph over every obstacle by supplying those credentials which were always demanded in ancient times of all who presumed to speak to the nations as divine ambassadors. We may well claim that there are phases of spiritual healing, such as the reformation of character, much more important from an ethical standpoint than even the removal of the most serious bodily distempers; but all the varied works of healing recorded in ancient and modern scriptures seem manifestly to proceed from a single central source. That beautiful modern classic, "Ben Hur," by Lew Wallace, very clearly portrays the world-wide and age-long feeling that every divinely inspired messenger must accomplish some real good to humanity in more than one direction; and the higher the station and the greater the power of the messenger in question, the mightier must be the miracles accomplished; therefore it is quite harmonious with universal sentiment in this regard to select a case of two lepers who were healed by a Master when they placed implicit confidence in him, and thereby availed themselves of his healing potency.

All mere wonders which simply excite surprise and apparently benefit no one, carry no manifest credentials with them; they may be "wheat" or they may be "tare," and until they have proved themselves by their effects, we have no right to judge them definitely; but whenever actual good is accomplished we are stupid indeed if we do not attribute it to a benevolent origin, and our position is equally absurd if we refuse condemnation to practices of any sort which bring disaster in their train. We must use our reason concerning miracles just as we use it in the ordinary affairs of life, judging trees by the fruit they bear, and when this test is faithfully and universally applied we shall no longer stumble blindly as of yore over approbations and prohibitions encountered in the Bible or elsewhere. It would be a very interesting story, though a very long one, to consider the full significance of all the names ascribed to the various characters in the Bible, and in other Sacred Books, with a view to ascertaining as far as possible, the esoteric bearing of these many peculiar titles, at the same time paying particular attention to the purposeful changing of names, either by enlargement of the number of syllables, or by complete alteration. The modern world is becoming greatly interested in nomenclature, and many are the classes held in London, New York, and other influential cities for the study of name values. What's in a name? is a very serious question in the esteem of many present-day enquirers into esoteric mysteries, and when we take into account the very large amount of interest now taken in astrology among highly intelligent people, we are quite ready to actively revive all that is innocent and useful in the methods of divination practised by the Ancients. In that remarkable treatise "Art Magic" presented to students of Spiritism and Occultism by Emma Hardinge Britten, in 1876, and more recently distributed widely through the enterprise of that singularly comprehensive weekly paper, "The Progressive Thinker," of Chicago, we read of many sorts of divination which the author regards as highly repulsive to refined feelings, though by no means unworthy of attention from the standpoint of research into the possible amount of control which highly trained ascetics may gain over their subjugated material organisms. With such harsh and repulsive methods as those practised by Hindu Fakirs and Mohammedan Dervishes do not care to deal, as their frantic rites are not the ceremonies performed by the refined Esoteric Confraternities, who studiously cultivate a love of the beautiful and the wholesome, and of naught beside. In the ancient temples of Greece and Rome, as well as of Egypt and India, there were many various arts of divination practised, ranging from the sublime to the disgusting, not indeed all at one time in any single class of temples, but at different periods, and to some extent at the same time also, by different bodies of practitioners. Just as there are many highly variant schools of religion and medicine in the leading countries of the world to-day, so was such the case in lands and ages of antiquity, and such it has continued to some extent at all times everywhere. Divination by examination of the entrails of slaughtered animals was very common in the Roman Empire, and though this was not a truly refined, it was not an altogether abominable practise, as animals were killed for food, as they are still, and after the breath has left the body there is no crime in examining the carcass; nevertheless we must always remember that the most lucid seers were vegetarians who would utterly refuse to have any part in the slaying of animals or birds and to whom contact with a corpse would be intolerable. These pure-minded and exceptionally refined Sensitives of old were the seers and seereses through whose instrumentality oracular teachings were given which won for the Schools of the Prophets, wherever such were established, a reputation for immediate contact with veritable divinities. The atrocious practices of vivisectors and other flagrant violators of natural order may bring about certain psychical results of a highly detrimental character, but never can brutal outrages on man or beast result in any other sort of consequences, in the long run, than the fate which invariably overtakes every "black magician." That exquisite story of Parsifal, known to all music-lovers as the grandest of all modern operas, sets forth, with unmistakable lucidity, the exact distinction between the contradictory varieties of magic symbolically designated "white" and "black." Parsifal becomes a prince among Adepts, worthy to be the Supreme Head of the Knights of the Holy Grail, only after his fierce encounter with Klingsor, which resulted in the complete destruction of a palace of necromancy. Kundry, at one time a servant of the Knights and at another time a slave to Klingsor, previous to her final deliverance by Parsifal, is a good illustration of an unbalanced sensitive, liable at any time to be swayed by a temporarily predominating influence. When as a guileless youth Parsifal goes forth with bow and arrow and thoughtlessly slays a sacred swan, he is reprimanded sharply by Gurnemanz, a guardian of a sacred enclosure, and henceforth the lad shoots no more birds. At that moment when he accepts reproof and resolves to live by a higher rule than the ordinary he has "entered the Path," and is verily on the mystic road to eventual adepthood. We cannot too forcibly insist that the great difference between the state of the simple Medium and that of the Adept, is that the former is subject to the sway of varying external influences, while the latter has learned the art of psychic navigation and can therefore determine what influences shall or shall not sway him. Amfortas, a weak (and therefore incompetent) Leader of the Knights, must resign his office to a stronger and worthier successor. When Parsifal ascends the throne he instantly heals the wound of his afflicted predecessor by touching it with the Sacred Spear, which Amfortas had lost during an unsuccessful struggle with Klingsor, and which Parsifal had recovered at the end of an equally sharp encounter with the necromancer, a battle which ended in the complete destruction of a dangerous institution of iniquity. No story illustrates more fully than Parsifal the magical antipodes, for on the one side we find the spirit losing to the flesh and on the other the spirit triumphing over it; and again, on the one hand a vacillating woman subjugated to the ends of evil, and on the other hand that same woman rescued and strengthened and adapted henceforward to gladly serve, in perfect freedom, the cause of righteousness.

The curious story of the Witch of Endor is one of those Bible narratives which have given rise to endless controversy by reason of the highly involved nature of the narrative itself, for it is by no means clear that that extraordinary woman was an untruthful or disagreeable personage, though King Saul, by no means a model monarch, had put all women of her class under the ban of his displeasure. There is no moral lesson taught by endorsing the popular clerical view that Saul committed a great sin by consulting this woman, rather is the moral of the story to be found in the statement that neither she, nor the spirit of Samuel whom Saul invoked, could save him from the consequences of his own long-continued disobedience to divine direction. Samuel had long and often remonstrated with Saul and urged him to turn from iniquity to righteousness, but the obstinate king persistently and steadily refused to heed the prophet's admonitions, and to such a pass had he brought his own condition by long-continued obduracy that at length it became too late for him to retrieve his fallen fortunes; thus it was all in vain that he strove to gain an interview with the departed Samuel who, great prophet though he was, had no power to save the transgressor from from the accumulated consequences of his now ripe trangressions. There are crises in all histories,, both personal and national, and when a harvest is ready for the sickle it is then too late to endeavor to avert the result of what has culminated in a conspicuous output. We must take the consequences, painful and bitter though they may be, just as on the other hand, when we have acted wisely and righteously, we cannot escape the blissful effects of our long-continuing harmonious activity. Up to a certain point we are all free to change our course of action, but when certain seeds have already matured and trees are already in fruit, though we may resolve that our next harvest shall be a very different one, we cannot avert the immediate doom which now confronts us. The oracles and sybils connected with all ancient temples were accustomed to warn their clients of impending catastrophes, and, if we may place any reliance on history, their warnings were often useful in helping those who consulted them to avoid continuance in a path of danger; but sometimes the consultor of the oracle arrived too late to take advantage of that benevolent seership, which when resorted to in season saved many from falling over psychic precipices. The woman at Endor (who is not a witch in the original but only a clairvoyant) told Samuel that she saw with him in spirit a form which he recognized as Samuel, but she had no power to induce this spirit to answer to her demands. That very fine drama, "The Shepherd King," in which the highly gifted actor, Wright Lorimer, has starred so successfully, gives a version of this Biblical incident wonderfully convincing and strikingly in accordance with the purest esoteric teaching. In that superb play, the woman in her cave declares she has no power to summon Samuel, but he appears to Saul entirely of his own volition, a perfectly reasonable conclusion if we take into account the obvious fact that the prophet would be in a spiritual condition far superior to that of any possible familiar spirit who might be at the beck and call of any ancient seeress or modern medium. Moses Hull, a prominent American Spiritualist, pointed out very clearly in many of his lectures and writings that the word "witch" was only among those headings of the chapters in the King James Version of the Bible which were manufactured about 1611, nowhere in the text itself even in that particular version. Nothing can be more ridiculous than to declare that because there were laws against witchcraft three hundred years ago in England that therefore every woman accused of witcheries, regardless of place or conditions, was other than respectable. Samuel Putnam wrote a fine history of witchcraft in New England in which he proved conclusively to all fair-minded readers that at Salem, Massachusetts, and in several other places in America fanatical Puritans condemned to death, after having committed to torture, many innocent victims of their insane intolerance not many centuries ago. The original object of legislation against witchcraft may have been entirely praiseworthy, as it was evidently intended to effectually discountenance all unholy practices having for their object human injury, but we all know how very quickly well-intentioned legislation can become perverted in the hands of unreasoning bigots and other unscrupulous persons who never hesitate to attribute the foulest crimes to those who have incurred their personal displeasure. Probably there were women, and men also, in ancient days who "peeped and muttered," and by the aid of vile incantations endeavored to bring misery upon their victims, and such there may be to-day; but wholesale condemnation of entire classes of people is always unjust and utterly irrational. Wheat and cockle grow together in all fields, and it often needs far more than average insight to discriminate between them until a time of harvest; it therefore becomes us, when reviewing ancient records, and especially when dealing with events in our own day, to give the benefit of a doubt wherever uncertainty prevails. Of one thing we may rest thoroughly assured, viz., that the universe is not regulated in so insane a manner as to permit devils to lure the unwary to destruction, while angelic ministry is beyond the reach of humanity. Whatever is true of the history of Israel is equally true of other nations, and whatever could and did occur in days of old is also possible at this moment. We only learn a moral lesson when recounting the experiences of the past, if the recital thereof inspires us to heroic resolve to devote all our energies, along all the lines of our activity, to the great threefold object worthy of all noble men and women: The discovery of truth; the diffusion of truth; the application of truth to the needs of humanity. With this spiritual amulet in our possession, we carry with us a potent magnet to attract celestial forces and an efficient safeguard against all hosts of darkness.

CHAPTER V.

CREATION LEGENDS—HOW ANCIENT IS HUMANITY ON THIS PLANET?—HINDU CHRONOLOGY.

It seems scarcely necessary at this period to tell any fairly well-informed persons that the first two chapters of Genesis were never regarded as literal history by any students of esoteric doctrine, and we can readily believe the testimony of Swedenborg to the effect that records of very ancient "Churches" prove conclusively that in times of old narratives regarded as specially sacred were all believed to contain an interior meaning with which the uninitiated may have been unfamiliar, but which was the only meaning with which spiritual teachers were concerned.

The iconoclasm of Thomas Paine, Volney, Voltaire, and other famous writers of a revolutionary and reactionary period, did yeoman service in the cause of intellectual liberty, but it was no part of their mission to unfold interior meanings or call attention to the spiritual agreement which can now be traced, thanks to modern critical research, between all the Scriptures venerated by different sections of humanity. It was really not earlier than 1893, in America, and then chiefly by reason of the Parliament of Religions held in Chicago, in connection with the World's Fair, that the masses of the people began to take a really live interest in Comparative Religion, and even then, during the seventeen days of the September of that memorable year in which the Congress assembled, there were many pious people of fossilized convictions who were quite shocked at the idea of "heathen" Orientals being invited to proclaim their "idolatrous" doctrines on the same platforms with Christian ministers. But, to the credit of many distinguished representatives of the largest Christian denominations, be it recorded that they treated the Asiatic delegates extremely well, and though it cannot be truthfully asserted that that memorable gathering resulted in completely breaking down all barriers of prejudice between East and West, it is no exaggeration to aver that since that great historical event there has been far less ignorance and bitterness displayed by opposing religious systems than before that momentous gathering. True it is that some few Americans were so carried away by the picturesqueness of Oriental costumes and the fascinating personality of some of the Oriental Swamis, and other speakers at the Congress, that they were received into the Buddhistic or some other Asiatic religious fold, but, for the most part, no proselyting was either accomplished or attempted. The more intimately acquainted we become with differing religious systems, the less need do we imagine for going over from one to another, seeing that they all manifest defects as well as excellences, and we are not likely to find all our ideals realized in any system.

The chief value of the research we are now attempting is an endeavor to pierce external crusts of mythology and arrive at some reasonable and instructive views of the universe in which we are abiding. The number seven has always been regarded as particularly sacred by all peoples of antiquity, and the reason for this is to be found in Nature, entirely apart from human fancy. The seven hues of the Rainbow, the seven notes in the Musical Scale, and many other equally universal examples may be given of the prominence of seven. The seven "Days," or, more correctly, Periods, of Creation enumerated in the first chapter of Genesis agree substantially with similar enumerations in other and older Scriptures, and when we turn to Swedenborg's "Arcana Cœlestia" for exposition, we find that he informs us that they have nothing necessarily to do with external history, and that it makes no difference what facts may be disclosed through geology, the spiritual truth conveyed in the Pentateuch remains unchallenged. This strong position was finely elucidated and upheld by the scholarly Dr. Bayley, for many years minister of the New Jerusalem Church in Kensington, which was largely attended by earnest people who clung to the spiritual meaning of the Bible, while they followed their highly gifted pastor gladly in his many and wide pulpit excursions into scientific fields. "The Divine Word Opened" is the title of Dr. Bayley's best known book, which is one of the most remarkable and thought-provoking volumes of sermons anywhere procurable. Such works as this deserve much wider reading than they usually receive, for it is certainly lamentable to note the crass ignorance of the Bible still largely prevalent among would-be expositors.

Just as it has been truly said that no one can really understand any single language without some familiarity with several tongues, so is it also true that no one can duly appreciate any Creation Legend without an outline acquaintance with several. The seven Great Ages of the Earth must be seven vast periods, agreeing far more nearly with Oriental than with Occidental chronology; but no chronological element necessarily enters into the earliest parts of Genesis. The first word in the Hebrew Torah, berashith, is commonly rendered in English "in the beginning," a phrase which has no necessary reference either to time or place, but is equivalent to "at the starting-point." GOD (Elohim) is said to be the author of all that is produced, and as the author is declared to be entirely good, the results of Divine activity are pronounced likewise good. "And GOD saw that it was good," is a sentence several times reepated, referring to the goodness, each in its own degree, of the various orders of existence which appeared on earth before the advent of Humanity, and no matter what opinions any one may entertain concerning the second and following chapters of Genesis, the first chapter leaves no doubt in the minds of unprejudiced readers that the original tradition narrated in the Bible concerning human origin declares men and women to be a simultaneous creation. Let any child be given the first account alone, and then questioned as to what it relates, that child is certain to say that men and women were created together. Gnostic or Theosophical commentators may undertake to discourse upon some original creation antedating the complete materialization of human frames, and such disquisitions are always interesting and thought-exciting, though to many minds they appear incapable of demonstration. Preexistence is taught in all Bibles, and, as the venerable Dr. J. M. Peebles, and other modern Spiritualists of learning and experience have stoutly maintained, there can be no evolution of aught that is not involved. Monkeys cannot beget men, though the Simian race may have existed on this planet long before the human. Esoteric teaching is to the effect that every type which appears on earth comes from a spiritual typal germ, a doctrine far more comprehensible than the foundationless assertions of Materialists, who give us no foundation whatever for their atheistic dogmatism. Many scholars are confessedly agnostic; but agnosticism postulates nothing definitely concerning human origin.

A truly wonderful exposition of Genesis has reached us from the inspired and fertile pen of Erastus Gaffield, a gentleman of high literary attainments and social standing, who has written, under spiritual influence, several very instructive books, among which "The Past Revealed" deserves distinctive pre-eminence. In that remarkable treatise we find it stated that "Before the existence of inhabitable conditions upon the earth, there were, as now, many planets in the universe, where only rudimentary conditions of life prevailed, inhabited by beings in various stages of evolutionary progress, by multitudes who had attained only very circumscribed powers of reason, a limited control over weak and imperfectly developed mental faculties, which but partially reflected the intuitions of spirit, and which could not have been used for the investigation of the laws of cosmic creation, evolution, or other scientific facts, nor for the teaching of ethical precepts." "From such very primitive conditions, after having acquired an understanding of certain inherent principles of the Law, graduations sometimes occurred. Many aspiring, intuitive ones, having realized certain degrees of spiritual understanding, and having passed out of their physical bodies, entered into celestial states of existence where larger opportunities were afforded for acquiring knowledge of the divine principles of the Law, and for a more perfect realization of spiritual aspirations. Such needed not further experiences upon material planes. Vast multitudes, however, required and sought new experiences in physical states, and without them could have made but litle progress in the accomplishment of destiny. Therefore it may be said that the 'beginning' referred to in the first verse of Genesis relates to the molding of the plastic elements afore-existent in space, into conditions adapted to the production of such things as physical beings would require when they should appear, who, at first though manifesting only very rudimentary states of intellectual perception, would have certain natural wants, such as air to breathe, water to drink, and food to eat. The text in no way relates to the calling into existence of original elements concerning which no one can conceive a possible explanation."

The first immigrants to earth came without materialized forms, after having accomplished missions in other planets, while incarnated in bodies adapted to conditions there prevailing. They came gladly hither as to a new Golconda, where they hoped to achieve important victories over the elements and to realize spiritual and material progress when conditions should permit them to again assume material bodies." This author then goes on to inform us that those districts of the earth were first inhabited which possesed climates similar to those of the planets from which the immigrants from other worlds had come. "The regions of the far north were first inhabited by physical humanity. Here for unnumbered ages lived a race, small in stature, given to the chase, without knowledge of many refinements subsequently realized in latitudes further south, peacefully inclined, the representatives of an order or condition of life like unto that which their predecessors had evolved in other planets. It may be stated that the destruction of life-possibilities upon the moon, and the formation of inhabitable conditions upon the earth, were coeval." Much teaching regarding the "Lunar Pitris" is to be found in Theosophical literature, and it seems to be the general teaching of those who claim to know something of the immense antiquity of the human race that there was life on the moon before this earth was ready for human inhabitation. Nothing could be easier than to endorse the famous Robet Ingersoll's alleged "mistakes of Moses" did we believe that the letter of Genesis was intended to be taken altogether literally, but, judging it in the light thrown upon it by comparison with other ancient records, we regard all such iconoclastic ridicule as undeserved and also utterly unscholarly. But as Ingersoll was a popular lecturer, expected to entertain as well as to instruct, and moreover as some kinds of ignorant theology are quite as ridiculous as he made them out to be, the name of Ingersoll endures as that of a champion of the right of free thought and free enquiry, without which no arrival at truth is ever possible.

We will now direct attention to Hindu traditions concerning the age of the world and human origin. These appear highly extravagant to many readers, on account of the immense periods which they designate to a year, and it seems incredible that we can estimate the extent of ages with such complete precision. However, it is not impossible that there may be somewhere carefully preserved records which largely justify even the astounding affirmations of Baba Premanand Bharati in his decidedly beautiful book, "Sree Krishna; the Lord of Love," in which he undertakes to present to English readers "the history of the Universe from its birth to its dissolution." The author says that in the course of his treatise he has explained "the science of creation, its making and its mechanism, according to information derived from the recorded facts in the sacred books of the Root-Race of Mankind." This is declared to be the doctrine of true Hinduism. The enthusiastic writer tells us that if we read this record with an open mind it will grant us illumination and solve many a riddle of life and untie many a tangle of thought. The following quotation from the preface clearly sets forth in highly condensed phrase the entire substance of the Hindu Doctrine:

"The belief that our life begins with the birth of this physical body and ends with its death, is the worst superstition, because it is the worst obstacle in the way of our soul's unfoldment. This life has sprung from Eternity; it draws its breath in Eternity and is finally absorbed by Eternity, which is Absolute Love. To think that we, human beings, were never blessed with greater powers than we possess in this age is the saddest of mistakes. To believe that we were once as great and powerful as Divine beings, and that we can recover that greatness and those powers, is to believe in the actual potentialities of the human mind. This life can be made one long ecstatic song, this life can, if we take the trouble to make it, be made a source of joy to ourselves as well as to all around us forever and ever; it can even attain to the Essence of Godhood, from which it has sprung, by developing uninterruptedly God-consciousness.

"We are all idolators. Some of us worship idols of Divinity, others woship idols of Matter. Some of us worship the Spirt through suggestive signs and symbols; others worship Flesh. Since our mind wants idols for worship, just as our body wants food for sustenance, let us all worship idols of Spirit in Form. Through its concrete Form-Center we can enter into the Abstract Spirit of Love—Love which is our one object and goal in life. This Love is Krishna, and the universe, and we, its parts, are the materialized manifestaions of that Love." Baba Bharati may well tell us that when we peruse his writings we are reading a book of purely Eastern thought clothed in pure Eastern dress, for without this explanation, we should be at a loss to understand the foregoing eulogy of idolatry; but when we know that in the Orient the equivalent of our word idol simply means any manifestation of life which we can symbolize, and therefore in some measure comprehend, as soon as we grasp the Hindu writer's meaning we can readily sympathize with the clear and sharp line of demarkation he has drawn between idols of spirit and idols of flesh. But it is with the ages of the world that we are now particularly concerned. These are styled Gold, Silver, Copper, and Iron. The Golden Age lies far back in antiquity, and is said to have lasted 4,800 Divine years, each of which contains 360 of our years; thus the entire length of the Golden Age must have amounted to 1,728,000 of our years, which may well be imagined as the extent of a geological epoch. This, according to Hindu tradition, was the most spiritual age, and it is claimed that gold literally abounded during that remote period. Let us now remember that in the Book of Genesis we are told of gold as abounding in the whole land of Havilah, which is said to be watered by the river Pison. The word Havilah means to bring forth and to supply strength: thus we may readily see some striking connection between the Oriental traditions now exhibited to our gaze by Asiatic visitors to Europe and America and the references to remote antiquity found in the early Hebrew legends. The Silver Age, following immediately upon the Golden, is said to have lasted for 3,000 Divine years — that is, 1,080,000 human or lunar years. Hindu chronology always calls Divine years Solar, and earthly years Lunar, because we count our months by the movements of the moon and reckon our calendar from a purely geocentric standpoint. During the Silver Age occurred the Fall of humanity mentioned in the Bible. This event is described by Hindu teachers as being due to the attraction of the Unreal. During the Golden Age it is said that humanity knew nothing but Truth, but in the Silver Age they became led astray by deceptive appearances, and fell from original purity by confounding the illusory with the real. Our fall consists in the fact that we become so attached to the unreal that we cannot leave it, though we know it to be unreal. All the ages have their Twilight and their Daylight periods, suggesting very nearly the various Evenings and Mornings mentioned in the Pentateuch. The life of the Silver Age, though not so beautiful as that of the Golden Age, was nevertheless in many respects quite delightful, and it is not till we come to the Copper Age that we read anything in Hindu literature of ferocious beasts or warlike people. The length of the Copper Age is estimated at 2,000 Divine years, equal to 720,000 human years. The Iron Age carries us to the very depths of human ferocity and degradation, and out of this we are now happily emerging to a very much higher condition, as we are now rounding the curve and passing out from a Dark Age into one of much greater brilliancy.

CHAPTER VI.

EGYPT AND ITS WONDERS: LITERALLY AND MYSTICALLY CONSIDERED.

"Out of Egypt have I called my Son." In this highly significant and important Scripture phrase we are introduced to far more than simply an historical allusion; at the same time, the historical information suggested is of great interest and value. Though in a very special sense a land of great antiquity, Egypt is also a modern country, which is attracting ever-increasing multitudes of fascinated students, as well as tourists, who find in the Delta of the Nile almost more to excite their curiosity, and also to repay diligent research, than in any other district usually included within the itinerary of popular travel. Though there are thousands of interesting things to be seen in Egypt, the object of supremest interest is the Great Pyramid at Gizeh, which is well called a miracle in stone. Many of our readers have doubtless read that large and learned work, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid," by Prof. Piazzi Smyth, for many years Astronomer Royal of Scotland, but as that work abounds with elaborate mathematical calculations, and is also written from the standpoint of a certain type of dogmatic theology, it has never served to give a broad general view of the object for which this mighty structure was erected, notwithstanding the fact that it contains a vast amount of extremely valuable information. Prof. Smyth maintains that in order to account successfully for this mighty edifice, we must attribute to it an actually divine origin, for he contends that the architect was none other than Melchisedec, by far the most mysterious character mentioned in the Bible, concerning whom it is related that he was a priest of the Most High God, also a King of Salem, and it is also stated that he had neither father nor mother, beginning of days nor end of life. Such statements cannot refer to any ordinary human being, but they do have reference to human immortality, and they also refer in some incidental sense to a mighty Order of Adepts who exist upon earth in unending succession from age to age. These highly illumined Masters were undoubtedly the great rulers in ancient times, under whose benign sway the land of Egypt was at one time the chief center of civilization upon earth, or at least one of the great head centers whence knowledge was distributed to many other lands. The Great Pyramid differs widely from all other pyramids in its interior arrangements, though it closely resembles them all in its outward construction, as all are built on a common ground plan and all may be regarded as ancient temples, in many of which the bodies of distinguished people were doubtless buried, for the practice of burying the bodies of notable men in temples of worship is of immemorial antiquity. But all the pyramids, save this most imposing one, are elaborately adorned both within and without with all manner of emblems and inscriptions, the Great Pyramid alone being perfectly devoid of all embellishment. This fact in itself very largely justifies the positive declaration of Prof. Smyth, and many other learned men who largely coincide with him, that this unique structure has memorialized through all succeeding centuries, a purely spiritual religion which flourished in ancient Egypt surrounded by popular forms of idolatry. The Great Pyramid is well regarded as a massive Masonic Temple carrying us back to a period in human history when the astronomical religion of the ancient world was stated and preserved in fanes of superb architecture which were built according to the exact principles of mathematics and geometry, requiring no ornamentation to enforce doctrines or to portray the ceremonies for which these structures stood, as abiding and well-nigh indestructible monuments. The most curiously interesting theory which we have ever encountered is that elaborated by Albert Ross Parsons in his extraordinary book, "New Light from the Great Pyramid," which declares that it was built to commemorate a great cosmic catastrophe, an idea thoroughly familiar to the many readers of "Atlantis," by Ignatius Donnelly, who maintains that long before the great Island-Continent was finally overwhelmed by the ocean (between 11,000 and 12,000 years ago), it had already entered upon its declining period, during which certain great teachers from that enlightened land went to Egypt and established there the beginnings of a vast Atlantian Colony. Such a theory will make the great Pyramid very much older than the date given for its erection by Prof. Smyth, who traces it only to 2170 B. C., when Alpha Draconis was Polar Star. But as the phenomenon known as the procession of the equinoxes is accomplished every grand cycle, which occupies about 25,840 years, it is quite easy to admit that the Great Pyramid may be fully 30,000 years old. A very singular book on this intensely interesting subject was issued in California by an author named McCarthy, in which a claim is raised that this wonderful structure is between 50,000 and 60,000 years of age; but in all cases the astronomical phenomenon referred to remains the same. With the age of the Pyramid we need not greatly concern ourselves, but in the object of its construction, and the mysteries celebrated within its walls, we may well take active interest. Though there are many among modern Freemasons who place no great reliance upon very ancient traditions concerning the Masonic Craft, many other Masons, among them men of wide research and profound learning, declare that there is abundant evidence in support of the most venerable traditions. Among gifted authors who have treated of this subject in popular style, Rev. Chas. H. Vail, author of "The Ancient Mysteries and Modern Masonry," ranks conspicuously high. This very liberal-minded minister, for a long time pastor of Pullman Memorial Church, Albion, N. Y., has furnished us with an enormous amount of evidence wonderfully condensed in a portable volume issued by the Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply Company, New York. Concerning the Egyptian mysteries he has quoted from a number of distinguished writers, all of whom testify to substantially the view taken in that curious book, "Art Magic," which contains a section on the Great Pyramid which we herewith substantially reproduce in abbreviated language of our own. The author of that singular treatise does not presume to speak dogmatically, but very modestly heads the section "The Great Pyramid of Egypt—Its Possible Use and Object." The chapter is headed with a hieroglyphic entitled "Man, the Microcosm of the Universe." This is a double triangle with a human figure at its center. At the left side of the apex of the ascending triangle is the word Macrocosmos; at the right-hand side of the apex of the descending triangle is written Microcosmos. At the right side of the apex of the ascending triangle is printed Dragon's Head, and on the left side of the apex of the descending triangle Dragon's Tail, illustrated by their well-known astrological emblems. The letter U (the original form of the horseshoe inverted) is represented on the left side of the horizontal line drawn through the middle of the figure, and the same letter inverted (making the familiar form of the horseshoe) at the right extremity of this line. Students of astrology will at once recognize that such a frontispiece to a treatise on the Great Pyramid is intended to convey to every reader that the structure itself was built to embody the sublime sciences mathematics, geometry, astronomy and astrology, which were regarded as the very foundations of all true science, philosophy and religion by the truly enlightened in days of old. Those who search Egyptian records profoundly, and thereby learn to decipher the real meaning of the Great Pyramid, can never fall into the error of supposing that it was either a granary or a tomb, but, speaking Masonically, a veritable stone rejected by modern builders but in reality "the head of the corner." The vulgar supposition, still entertained by many writers and travelers (and frequently hurled at public audiences by lecturers who entertain us with travelogues), that all the pyramids, including the greatest, were burial-places for the bodies of kings, and that the Great Pyramid contains the remains of Cheops, is probably due to the fact that that inspiring object, the lidless Sarcophagus in the Grand Gallery, resembles a tomb; this has led them through their ignorance of ancient symbolism and the rites of initiation performed in ancient temples, to mistake this emblematical and ceremonial laver of regeneration for a literal coffin in which a dead body had at one time lain, but from which it must have at some time been removed, for it is certainly not there now. Prof. Smyth has clearly shown that the body of Cheops was buried in the vicinity of the pyramid, but nobody was interred within its walls. But even had a body been buried within this mighty structure, such a fact would no more supply evidence that the building was primarily intended for a place of sepulture, and not for a mighty temple, than the fact of many interments in Westminster Abbey and many other famous churches, would prove that they were intended only as tombs because the bodies of many illustrious men repose beneath their pavements.

As a Temple to the great and glorious Central Sun of our Universe, Alcyone of the Pleiades, the Great Pyramid is comprehensible, for the only entrance being on the north side, has convinced all astronomers who have visited it that it was designed for astronomical purposes; and we must never forget that astronomy and astrology were inseparable from the religious concepts and ceremonies of the learned among all ancient nations. The total absence of all inscriptions, both within and without, distinguish this unique pyramid from its numerous companions, of which there are over fifty in the near vicinity. The populace in ancient Egypt, as well as in Persia, Assyria, India, and all other mighty lands renowned in ancient song and story, employed animal and vegetable forms to typify their spiritual ideas and to furnish them with appropriate aids to contemplation while engaging in religious exercises, but none of these objects were employed by those whose ideas were of the utmost sublimity and to whom the regular order of Nature, and especially the march of the constellations, not only suggested but definitely revealed the universal Cosmic Process. To these mighty minds nothing less than a Temple erected according to the plan of the heavens, as far as they could possibly discover it, would suffice to satisfy their religious aspirations and at the same time afford them the observatory they needed, in which to carry forward their continuous and elaborate astronomical calculations. The Spiritual Sun, not the physical orb we see, was the central object of veneration among these great Adepts of antiquity, and it is to this day among the most enlightened Brahmins and all others, in India and elsewhere, who have preserved intact the earliest and purest of all the combined systems of natural and revealed religion originally communicated to humanity by those wise and powerful guardians of our race who are known by various names and titles among the different schools of Theosophists scattered over the whole earth. It is in the 19th chapter of Isaiah that Bible students will find the clearest and most copious references to the Great Pyramid, according to the conclusions of many learned astronomers who have also devoted much attention to Biblical testimony. In that wonderful chapter we are told that there is an altar to the Lord and a pillar of witness in the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord (verse 19).

From Stewart's erudite work on "Solar Worship," the author of "Art Magic" culled the following intensely interesting facts: "It is important not to lose sight of the fact that formerly the history of the heavens, and particularly of the sun, was written under the form of the history of men, and that the people almost universally received it as such, and looked upon the hero as a man. The tombs of the gods were shown, as if they had really existed; feasts were celebrated, the object of which seemed to be to renew every year the grief which had been occasioned by their loss. Such was the tomb of Osiris, covered under those enormous masses known as pyramids, which the Egyptians raised to the star which gives us light. One of these has its four sides facing the cardinal points of the world. Each of these fronts is 110 fathoms wide at the base, and the four form as many equilateral triangles. The perpendicular height is seventy-seven fathoms, according to the measurement given by Chazelles of the (French) Academy of Sciences. It results from these dimensions and the latitude under which this pyramid is erected, that fourteen days before the Spring equinox, the precise period at which the Persians (and others) celebrated the revival of nature, the sun would cease to cast a shade at midday, and would not again cast it until fourteen days after the Autumnal equinox. Then the day, or the sun, would be found in the parallel or circle of the Southern declension, which answers to 5 deg. 15 min.; this would happen twice a year—once before the Spring and once after the Autumnal equinox. The sun would then appear exactly at midday upon the summit of this pyramid; then his majestic disc would appear for some moments, placed upon this immense pedestal, and seem to rest upon it, while his worshipers, on their knees at its base, extending their view along the inclined plane of the Northern front, would contemplate the great Osiris—as well when he descended into the darkness of the tomb as when he arose triumphant. The same might be said of the full moon of the equinoxes when it takes place in this parallel. It would seem that the Egyptians, always grand in their conceptions, had executed a project (the boldest ever imagined) of giving a pedestal to the sun and moon, or to Osiris and Isis; at midday for one, and at midnight for the other, when they arrived in that part of the heavens near to which passes the line which separates the Northern from the Southern hemisphere; the empire of good from that of evil; the region of light from that of darkness. They wished that the shade should disappear from all the fronts of the pyramid at midday, during the whole time that the sun sojourned in the luminous hemisphere; and that the Northern front should be again covered with shade when night began to assert supremacy in our hemisphere—i.e., at the moment when Osiris descended into hell. The tomb of Osiris was covered with shade nearly six months, after which light surrounded it entirely at midday, as soon as he, returning from hell, regained his empire in passing into the luminous hemisphere. Then he had returned to Isis and to the God of Spring, Horus, who had at length conquered the genius of darkness and winter. What a sublime idea!"

Prof. Smyth has made a great deal of the perfect standard for weights and measures which is found in the Great Pyramid, and he draws particular attention to the Sacred Cubit which measures exactly twenty-five inches, in contradistinction from the "profane" cubit in common use among the Egyptians, which measures a fraction over twenty-six inches. This fact of only the "sacred" cubit being employed throughout the Great Pyramid goes far to prove that it is not actually an Egyptian, but a truly universal structure, designed to perpetuate those profound mysteries which, though they have been celebrated in Egypt, were never confined to any special country. Though it is quite rational to insist that literal commercial transactions can be equitably balanced only by the adoption of a world-wide standard of perfectly accurate weights and measures, these external business matters are entirely subservient to the sublime spiritual purpose for which the lidless sarcophagus in the Grand Gallery was designed. Here again a quotation from "Art Magic" will prove illuminating: "A better understanding of the profound heights of metaphysical speculation in which the Oriental mind employed itself would have shown.....that this vast edifice was designed as a sky and earth metre, and that the huge problem of scientific discoverers, the mystic, lidless, wholly unornamented, uninscribed coffer, in the midst of the vast unornamented and uninscribed chamber, was not intended as a model for all generations of succeeding corn and seedsmen, but as a sarcophagus for living men, for those Initiates who were there taught the solemn problems of life and death, and through the instrumentality of that very coffer attained to that glorious birth of the Spirit—that second birth so significantly described by the great Hierophant of Nazareth when he answered those who came to enquire of him by night, saying: 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' The time was when Egypt, the young untutored child of the desert, was not the queen of arts and sciences who sat enthroned over the intellectual world. Then did she become the prey of the spoiler. She was invaded and conquered by the 'Pali' — Shepherd Kings, or 'Hyksos,' who, according to Manetho, overran the land, put the inhabitants to chains and tributary service, and became for awhile the rulers of Egypt. What this country was before the advent of these Shepherd Kings we can hardly conjecture, but after their rule, every monument, pyramid and inscription bore the stamp of Oriental ideality. It needs not that we particularize the details of these revolutionary changes; we only allude to them to account for the wonderful parity which exists between the religious opinions which we have enlarged upon in our descriptions of Hindu worship, and those which reappear in Egyptian Theogony. Let us, as Solomon says, consider the conclusion of the whole matter. Cheops, a monarch of the invading line, caused a temple to be erected in conformance with those strict rules of science, revealed to the ancient Hindu metaphysicians, as the mode in which God worked."

Remembering that the book from which the above quotations are taken was published in 1876, since which time much added light has been thrown on the close similarity between Central American and Egyptian monuments, especially through the indefatigable explorations conducted by Prof. and Mme. Le Plongeon, it seems quite reasonable to refer to an Atlantian as well as to a Hindu origin, for an adequate explanation of the building of the Great Pyramid. But it matters not who built it or in what age it was erected, for as a temple of the immemorial mystery of human life, fashioned in accordance with the plan of the Solar System, it stands pre-eminent, and it is therefore to universal esoteric Co-Masonry that we must turn for a complete elucidation of its abiding as well as original significance.

There is one more mighty wonder in Egypt of world-wide celebrity—the majestic Sphinx—which ranks second only to the Great Pyramid in symbolical expressiveness. The special feature of this mysterious stone preacher is its emphatic protest against the animal worship outpictured in all common Egyptian architectural productions. We are all familiar with representations of Anubis, the dog-headed divinity, and with many other works of popular art which equally exalt animal forms above the human level. In the massive Sphinx, propounding its age-long riddle to every passer-by, we see the exactly contradictory concept, for here is a lion's body surmounted with a human head. In this portrayal we can clearly trace the work of some truly enlightened cult, erecting its silent age-enduring protest against animal-worship, and displaying unmistakably the exaltation of the distinctively human, and the consequent rightful subordination of the animal. This is truly the problem which all humanity is called upon to solve. Neither the worship nor the extirpation of the animal is our goal, but the perfect ascendancy of the human over the animal, so that the human may justly reign and the animal as justly serve. Let Egypt reveal her message to the modern world as she revealed it in remote antiquity, prior to her decadence, and we shall understand aright the double meaning of the passage: "Out of Egypt have I called my son."

CHAPTER VII.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ANCIENT GREECE—THE SCHOOL OF PYTHAGORAS—THE DELPHIC MYSTERIES.

We have all heard the famous inscription on the Temple of Delphi, "Know thyself and thou wilt know the universe and the gods." On the basis of this maxim the entire theosophical system of the ancient Greeks was based. The three leading propositions of all the Esoteric Schools are summed up in the sentence frequently quoted as the gist of the teaching of Pythagoras: "Evolution is the law of life; number is the law of the universe; unity is the law of God."

The wonderful character known as Orpheus is no mythical personage, but a genuine adept of antiquity around whose wonderful career, as in all similar cases, multitudes of fairy tales have gathered. The work of Orpheus, like that of all other great spiritual teachers, did not consist in establishing a sect or party, but in disseminating truths of universal import which gradually percolated through many existing systems, constituting an inner body of doctrine of which simply literalists were always ignorant. Pythagoras, the Sage of Samos, though his period was not earlier than 600 B. C., is regarded as quite a legendary character by many who have not deeply studied the history of that epoch, and as in the case of so many other great leaders who worked from a spiritual standpoint, fierce persecution assailed this renowned Initiate and all who had the hardihood to publicly espouse his doctrines and remain faithful to his cause. The more we study history, the more convinced must we become that the persecuting spirit, which has relentlessly attacked all the world's great reformers, is excited not by religious conviction in any case originally, but by scheming demagogues, whose tyrannical authority, whether in Church or State, is always threatened by the spread of knowledge, and particularly by a real understanding of the Mysteries. In the case of Pythagoras and his followers, this persecution took place in Sicily, from which island many of the instructed fled to Greece, which furnished them a safe asylum. It is to Plato that we owe almost all our information concerning Pythagoras and his teachings; for, like other great spiritual enlighteners, this noble master gave instruction orally and never transferred his esoteric teachings to writing except under cover of symbolical signs, which only his disciples were able to interpret. It appears that all masters have adopted the two-fold method of giving moral instruction freely to multitudes, but confiding the deeper meaning of their teaching exclusively to those disciples who had prepared themselves to profit by more interior instruction. No sensible or thoughtful person can fail to see the wisdom and complete justice of this course, for no one was excluded from the deeper teaching who was prepared to receive it, and preparation consisted in thoroughly digesting and practically applying the general teaching given openly to the multitudes. All sorts of curious names have been given to this inner teaching by those who referred to it metaphorically. In India the curious title of "Boar's flesh" has been sometimes applied to an inner philosophy which was concealed from the masses, a similitude which has led to the ludicrous mistake entertained by some shallow critics that one of the Buddhas died from gourmandizing on flesh, when it is well known in the East that those who occupy high spiritual stations are always vegetarians. In the School of Pythagoras, great stress was laid on simple diet, as one means for purifying the body of a candidate seeking admission into the inner circle of disciples, for it was stoutly contended that no one could become thoroughly clairvoyant, in the higher acceptance of the term, who partook of animal food, or who used any stimulants or narcotics. The Sage of Samos was not an ordinary theurgist or worker of miracles, serving merely to create transitory sensational interest, his avowed mission being to assist humanity in the work of such complete regeneration that strife should cease upon the earth, both in the inward lives of his disciples and in the outer world also, so far as their influence extended. The essence of the Pythagorean Doctrine has come down to us in the Golden Verses of Lysis, in the commentary of Hierocles, and especially in the Timaeus of Plato, which contains a perfect system of cosmogony. All the great writers of ancient Greece radiate the spirit of Pythagoras, whom they admired so greatly that they never tire of relating anecdotes depicting the wisdom and beauty of his teaching and his marvelous power over all with whom he came in contact. He is quoted as an authority by the Gnostics of the early Christian Church as well as by the Neoplatonists of Alexandria. This teaching constitutes a magnificent whole, and serves greatly to simplify the mysterious symbolism of India and Egypt, which often requires a clear Hellenic mind to portray it in intelligible language consistently with rational and ennobling ideas of human liberty. That wonderful period which witnessed the life and work of Pythagoras was also the age of Lao-Tse in China, and of Buddha Sakya-Muni in India. Pythagoras was a great traveler; he is said to have crossed the whole of the ancient world before delivering his message in Greece, to which country he brought the ripe fruits of a thoroughly matured philosophy. A fascinating account of this wonderful teacher is given by the gifted French author, Edouard Schurè, who enters with much picturesque detail into an account of the early years and extended travels of this brilliant yet calm philosopher, who was the son of noble-minded parents. His father was a wealthy jeweler of Samos; his mother a woman of much refinement. It is said that the Pythoness of Delphi, when consulted by these good people shortly after their marriage, promised them a son who would be useful to all men throughout all times. The oracle directed them to Sidon in Phoenicia, where the child could be born far from the disturbing influences which then ruled in their native land. Before his birth Pythagoras was fervently consecrated to Apollo, the God of Light.

When the child was only a year old, acting on advice received from a priest of Delphi, his mother took him to an Israelitish temple in a valley of Lebanon where the high priest gave the infant a special blessing. Parthenis, the mother of this wondrous babe, is reported to have been a singularly beautiful and gentle woman, highly intellectual and of a very gracious temper. As the boy grew toward manhood, his parents encouraged him in that pursuit of wisdom in which he took a most keen delight, and so earnest a student was he that when only eighteen years of age he had studied in classes composed almost exclusively of thoroughly mature and particularly able men. But though, when at the age of twenty-three, he had enjoyed conference with Thales and Anazimander at Miletus, and others of the greatest among philosophers, none of these distinguished teachers had satisfied his yearning for the knowledge of perfect truth. Their teachings seemed to him contradictory, and he was ever searching for a grand synthesis. We translate freely the following paragraphs from the french of Edouard Schurè describing the hour when this marvelous genius seemed to attain his first complete glimpse of the great mission which lay before him: "Through the length of a glorious night Pythagoras directed his gaze now to the earth, now to the temple, and now to the starlit skies. Demeter, the Earth-Mother, that Nature whose secrets he sought to penetrate, was there outspread beneath him and around. He imbibed her potent exhalations and felt the invincible attraction uniting him, a thinking atom, to her bosom, an inseparable portion of herself. The Sages whom he had consulted had told him that it was from her that all things spring. From nothing comes nothing. The soul proceeds from water and from fire, but this subtle emanation of the primal element issues from them only to revert. Nature, said they, is sightless and inflexible; resign thyself to her unchanging laws. The sole merit thou canst have consists in this, that thou knowest them and art resigned to them. Then he gazed upon the firmament and sought to decipher the letters of flame formed by the Constellations in the fathomless depths of space. These signs, said he, must have a meaning, for if the infinitesimal, the motion of atoms, has its reason for existence, surely then also the immeasurably great, the wide-extended stars whose constellations represent a body of the universe! Verily each of these worlds must have its law, for all move unitedly according to number and in perfect harmony. But who will decipher this starry alphabet? The priests of Juno had told him this universe is the abode of the gods which existed before the earth. 'Thy soul cometh' (said they) 'from thence. Pray to the gods that it may remount to heaven.' Then we are told that his meditations were interrupted, first by the chants of the Lesbian women and the Bacchic airs chanted by the youths, but these melodious sounds were soon interrupted by piercing mournful cries issuing from men who were to be sold as slaves and were being cruelly struck by those who were compelling them to embark for Asia. Then it was that a painful thrill ran through his frame, for a mighty problem presented itself before him, as he contrasted vividly the different estates of the various classes of human beings who were thus brought before his notice. Whatever others might say and whatever appearances might indicate, the young Pythagoras cried out for liberty, liberty from all the pain, slavery and madness so abundantly spread around him. Who were right? he asked. The Sages who taught a doctrine of blind fatality, the priests who attributed everything to Divine Providence, or the great mass of humanity who stood between the two with no well-defined philosophy? All voices, he decided, declared some aspect of truth, but none gave to him the true solution of the problem. The three worlds, elaborately described in ancient cosmology, undoubtedly existed, and it was in the law of their equilibrium that the secret of the Kosmos lay. Having given utterance to this discovery, he rose to his feet, his glance fixed on the majestic temple which seemed transfigured in the moonbeams. In that magnificent temple he believed he saw an ideal image of the universe. The Kosmos guided and penetrated by God formed the sacred Quaternion, which is the source of Nature whose cause is eternal. Concealed in the geometrical lines of the Delphic Temple, he thought he found the key of the universe. The base, columns, architrave and triangular pediment represented to his view the three-fold nature of humanity and the universe: of the Microcosm and the Macrocosm crowned by divine unity, itself a trinity. The three worlds natural, human and divine, sustaining one another and performing a universal drama in an ascending and descending movement signified to him the balance of earth and heaven, of which human liberty holds control. It was then that he conceived of human purification and liberation by triple initiation. But he must prove by reason what his simple intelligence had received from the Absolute. This needs a human life; this is the task of Hercules. But where could he find the necessary knowledge to conduct this mighty labor? Nowhere but in his own soul. It was then that he forsook all allegiance to existing schools, and began the great task of working out for himself that wonderfully complete and simple, though seemingly intricate system, which we have learned to venerate as Pythagorean philosophy."

Modern natural philosophy has always been compelled to acknowledge an imponderable universal agent, and has, therefore, sometimes quite unconsciously, fallen largely into line with the ideas of both ancient and modern Theosophists.

In the ancient Greek thought, Cybele-Maia reigns everywhere; for this is the name given to the soul of the world, that plastic, vibrating substance through which creative spirit acts. Oceans of ether unite all worlds, and this mysterious element is called the great mediator between invisible and visible, between spirit and matter, between the interior and exterior of the universe. The modern Theosophical doctrine of the "astral light" is practically identical with the doctrine of the Logos and its many manifestations, as held in ancient Greece as well as all over the Orient. With these ancient concepts the philosophy of Pythagoras is very largely in accord; but when he visited the temple of Delphi and infused new life into the doctrines taught there, he gave to his disciples a very much loftier idea of the universe and of humanity than was then popularly known among the frequenters of that world-famous shrine. Pythagoras visited Delphi after visiting all the other Grecian temples, and at a time when its art of divination had somewhat deteriorated. His mission everywhere was both to restore and to infuse new light. In that wonderful temple he found Theoclea, a priestess of Apollo, who belonged to one of the leading hereditary priestly families. This remarkable girl positively disliked most things which attracted others, and she was of so deeply spiritual a nature that she seemed to require none of those accessories to devotion, or aids to mystic development, which seem usually necessary. She is reported to have heard spiritual voices in open daylight, and on exposing herself to the rays of the rising sun, their mystical vibration developed in her a true ecstasy, during which she listened to the singing of choirs celestial. Feeling herself attracted to some higher world than earth, to which she had not yet found the key, she was at once attracted by that much deeper teaching, and by the far nobler influence exerted by Pythagoras than she was able to obtain from the priests of the Delphic temple, whose instructions and ceremonies by no means satisfied her inmost spirit. It is said that he and she recognized each other immediately as kindred souls, who must work together for the elevation of humanity. Pythagoras at that time was in his prime; his eloquence was amazing, and his presence so enchanting that the very atmosphere became lighter, and the intelligence of those around him awakened to an extent far beyond the usual. From this time on the work of this mighty Sage made an impression in Greece far greater than that of any other teacher, and his school was at once renowned for the extreme purity of its philosophy and its astounding depth of insight into the profoundest mysteries of the universe. Pythagoras and Theoclea worked together for a full year at Delphi in complete spiritual concert, and before he took his departure he had fully prepared her to carry on a ministry virtually identical with his own; thus did he demonstrate the underlying principle of ancient Co-Masonry which always assigns to woman an equal place with man in the celebration of all mysteries, wisely drawing a horizontal line between classes of individuals solely on account of qualification, never an absurd perpendicular line based on sex-differentiation.

After leaving Delphi, Pythagoras worked in Croton, where the famous Pythagorean Institute arose, which was a college and a model city under the direction of this great Initiate. Through a wise combination of art and science, that magical harmony of soul and intellect which Pythagoreans regarded as the arcanum of philosophy was established. Science and religion were entirely at one, and it would be well indeed for many in this modern world, who are vainly endeavoring to reconcile false notions of religion with partly comprehended facts of science, to quaff a deep draft of inspiration from the Pythagorean synthesis.

Edouard Schurè gives us a fascinating narrative descriptive of the white dwelling of the Pythagorean Initiates situated on a hill encircled by olive and cypress trees. The following is a free translation from the exquisite french of this delightful author: "On ascending the hill, the porticos, gardens and gymnasium were distinctly seen. The Temple of the Muses, with its circular colonnade, light and elegant, towered above the two wings of the building. The terrace of the surrounding gardens overlooked the town and its harbor. In the far distance stretched the gulf, between sharp, rugged portions of the coast, as though in a frame of agate, while the Ionian Sea enclosed the horizon with a line of azure. One might often see women dressed in many-colored costumes making their way on the left side of the hill down to the sea through an alley of cypresses. These were on their way to worship in the temple of Ceres. On the right side men were often seen mounting in white robes to the temple of Apollo. It was a great attraction to the keen imagination of youth to realize that the school of Initiates was under the protection of these divinities, one of whom (Ceres) held the profound mysteries of Woman and of Earth, while the other (Apollo) revealed those of Man and of Heaven."

Pythagoras soon sustained a reputation for sternness in discipline by refusing to admit unworthy novices, for he said that "not every kind of wood was suitable for the making of a Mercury." Young men who desired to enter the association must undergo severe tests. When introduced by their parents or one of the masters, they were first allowed to enter the gymnasium in which the youths played games appropriate to their age; but every newcomer noticed at once that this was a gymnasium of a very peculiar sort, quite unlike those of the Grecian towns in which were heard the violent cries of clamorous groups boasting of their strength, challenging each other and proudly exhibiting their muscles. Here were only groups of well-behaved and singularly fine-looking young men walking in couples beneath the porticos or playing rationally in the arena. They always invited a stranger to join them with kind simplicity, making him feel at once at home among them and never subjecting him to any annoyance or humiliation, a lesson which modern colleges in Europe and America need to mark, learn and inwardly digest until the disgraceful practice of hazing and similar abominations are once for all eliminated root and branch from all educational institutions claiming respectability and seeking the patronage of an enlightened public.

Before we can reasonably hope to make any real progress in spiritual or ethical directions we must lay a firm foundation in physical and mental culture. The gymnasium, according to Pythagorean philosophy, is a valuable vestibule to the inner temple in which profound instruction is given pertaining to mind and spirit; but as during a soul's terrestrial embodiment it needs to operate through a physical instrument, the part of reason is to provide as perfect an instrument as possible, and keep that vehicle in excellent working order. In the system of Pythagoras there is consistently maintained, from first to last, the idea of perfect equilibrium. Here is to be found neither voluptuous indulgence nor harsh asceticism. The body is not treated as though it were the foe of the spirit, but it is never allowed to usurp any throne of mastery.

In this matchless school of ancient Greece every principle of virtue and nobility was inculcated and exemplified which the foremost educators of to-day are endeavoring to impress upon the gradually awakening consciousness of colleges and churches, and it must prove somewhat humiliating to the haughty heads of Christian seats of learning to find that a "Pagan" philosopher, several centuries before the Christian era, had carried out successfully a scheme of discipline which excluded all objectionable features, such as stupid, and often brutal, wrestling, while it afforded vigorous young athletes ample opportunity and encouragement to cultivate their muscles to the utmost within the reasonable bounds of healthy exercise and good behaviour. On the question of friendly feelings between fellow students, Pythagoras took uncomprising ground. True friendship can never exist in company with brutality, nor can real courage be developed by cultivating envy or catering to unrighteous pride. Hatred makes us inferior to those we hate, precisely as terror puts us in the power of what we dread. Heroes are developed in schools where honest mutual esteem is cultivated to the utmost, and should it ever be necessary for a hero to fight he could do so with great courage and ability, but without a shade of fury. The Pythagorean method was both simple and conclusive. Fresh arrivals at the college were encouraged to express their own views freely among their new acquaintances, and as no restriction was placed upon the expression of their sentiments, they soon registered themselves as suitable or unsuitable for admission into the classes. If any new applicant proved himself intelligently appreciative of the high standard in vogue among the Initiates, he was cordially welcomed; but if he evinced a preference for the cruder standard of the popular gymnasia of the towns, he properly drifted thither. While a new candidate was expressing his sentiments without restraint, the teachers were taking note of all he said, and it never took them long to ascertain whether he showed fitness for admission or otherwise. Pythagoras himself would often appear unexpectedly in the presence of the stranger, and study his words and gestures, in estimating which he was never at fault; he paid particular attention to gait and laughter, which are always faithful indexes of character; he had also made so profound a study of the human face that he read dispositions at a glance. Pythagoras introduced some of the Egyptian tests into his system, but the severer among these he wisely modified. After a few months of preliminary training, the candidate was submitted to an ordeal intended to test his bravery and prove his spirit.

One of these tests consisted in spending a night in a cave which had the reputation of being haunted with mysterious elementals who appeared to the aspirant in gruesome shapes. If his courage withstood this ordeal, he was accounted worthy to pass on to higher initiations, but if he shrank in terror from this external test he was considered too irreso-lute to be eligible for advancement. Being accepted for the preliminary degree, it was usually not long before the candidate was put through moral trials accompanied by severe tests of intellectual character. Among these the ready solution of intricate mathematical problems held prominent place. For example, a teacher would call upon a student without warning to explain the meaning of a triangle within a circle, or to answer such a question as, Why is the dodecahedron, contained within a sphere, the symbol of the universe? When passing these tests, the student was required to spend twelve consecutive hours in his cell, during which time he might partake of bread and water, but no other food was allowed him. To young men of sybaritic temperament, such discipline might seem excessively severe, but to those of frugal tastes and sincerely bent on study, this was only healthy mental exercise. When these twelve hours were ended the youth was taken into a company of assembled novices, who were allowed to ridicule him to test his metal; if he withstood all jibes and sneers complacently, he was regarded by the teachers as truly an embryonic philosopher, but if he became angry and resentful, Pythagoras would inform him that such lack of self-control demonstrated ineligibility for advancement.

It was only in extreme cases of misconduct, however, that this thoroughly equitable master expelled students from his school, and when he did so he always addressed them calmly and graciously, explaining to them that it could be of no use to them to attempt to continue their studies when they were quite out of harmony with the requirements and discipline of the college. These tests of temper proved conclusively the degree of self-control already attained by the young men who wished to become renowned in future as philosophers. Rejected candidates would sometimes inveigh bitterly against the college and its head; among these was the fanatical Cylon, who never forgave the college for his dismissal, and finally excited the populace to bring about its downfall. Those who bore everything with firmness were welcomed into the novitiate and received enthusiastic congratulations from their new companions.

The First Degree was called Preparation. This lasted from two to five years. Novices were called Listeners; during lessons they were subject to the rule of complete silence. They were not permitted to offer objections or to enter into discussions, for they must absorb the teaching before they could be prepared to discuss it intelligently. The Second Degree was called Purification. During this process of study the novice was welcomed into the house of Pythagoras and numbered among his disciples; real initiation now began. A rational exposition of occult doctrine was now given, which consisted especially in a study of the Science of Numbers, the esoteric meaning of which was concealed from the people at large, and only communicated to students who had proven their worth. A great distinction was made between sacred and secular mathematics; the latter alone are known to European savants, but the knowledge of the former has always been carefully preserved in the East.

The number One necessarily is all-including, as perfect white contains all colors; but as we cannot conceive of the Absolute Unmanifest with our finite intellects, all expressions of Divinity must be dual, consequently the Dyad reveals the Monad. Here we find another link between the Pythagorean and the Jewish conception of Divinity, as set forth in the opening chapters of the Pentateuch. Man and Woman hold equal rank in all ancient philosophies, but the feminine is always regarded as interior, while the masculine is external; therefore it often happens that short-sighted or unreflecting students imagine that the masculine is more sacred than the feminine, according to the teaching of ancient and Oriental philosophies. During the training of the Initiate in the Second Degree, the student was instructed in a doctrine very similar to much of the teaching with which we are familiar through the epistles of S. Paul, who was undoubtedly familiar with Greek philosophy as well as with Hebrew and Roman law. In the scheme of Pythagoras the number 7 (compound of square and triangle) signifies the union of Man and Divinity. It is the figure of all great Initiates, who understand that there are 7 degrees in involution and evolution. The number 10 represented completeness; it is called the perfect number in the highest sense, for it represents all principles of divinity evolved and reunited in a new unity. We have all heard of the 9 Muses personifying the sciences, grouped 3 by 3, presiding over the triple ternary evolved in 9 worlds, which together with Hestia, Guardian of the Primordial Fire, constitute the sacred Decad.

The Third Degree was called Perfection, as among the Essenes. In this degree psychology and cosmogony were the leading studies. While the lessons in the earlier degrees were given in daylight, often in the full blaze of the outdoor sun, these deeper teachings were usually given during the night season in the open air by the seaside, or sometimes in the crypts of the temple which were gently illuminated by lamps of naphtha. It was at these times that clairvoyance asserted itself, and the inner faculties of the students began to enable them to personally verify by their own experience that which the teachers taught. It cannot be doubted by any who have studied deeply the records of ancient esoteric teaching that the old astronomical glyph, which everywhere presents itself, was chiefly a veil thrown over the secret teaching, which related far more to the evolution of the human soul than to the movements of the literal planets. Ancient astrology was something very different from the misguided substitute with which in these days we are often made disagreeably familiar. In sacred astrology there are no "malific" planets or "evil" aspects, though it is very clearly taught that one star does indeed differ greatly from another; but as members of one family may be persons of widely different temperament, occupation and appearance, and yet all be good and useful, so in a family of worlds like our solar system the different planets may be spoken of as brothers and sisters, the sun being the parent of them all. We can only understand the famous saying quoted by present-day astrologers of the better type, "The wise man rules his stars, the fool obeys them," when we contemplate the significance of the personal pronoun in the sentence, for no man, however wise, can regulate the motions of the stars, but we can learn to regulate their correspondences within his own nature. Pythagorean astrology is founded upon the acknowledgment of universally diffused intelligence, which is now coming to be largely recognized by Western as well as Eastern philosophers, and indeed the whole scientific world of to-day is coming very near to an acceptance of that ancient esoteric teaching which alone accounts intelligently for the behaviour of all forms of existence observable under the microscope. The celestial history of Psyche formed the climax of the instruction given by Pythagoras to his disciples. What is the human soul? he asked. "A portion of the mighty soul of the world, a spark of Divine Spirit, an immortal Monad. Still, through its possible future opens out into the unfathomable splendors of Divine consciousness, its mysterious dawn dates back to the origin of organized matter. To become what it is in present-day humanity, it must have passed through all the reigns of nature, the whole scale of beings gradually developing through a series of innumerable existences. The spirit which fashions the worlds and condenses cosmic matter into enormous masses manifests itself with varying intensity and an ever greater concentration in the successive reigns of nature. A blind and confused force in the mineral, individualized in the plant, polarized in the sensation and instincts of animals, it stretches towards the conscious monad in this slow elaboration; and the elementary monad is visible in the most inferior of animals.

The animal and spiritual element accordingly exists in every kingdom, though only in infinitesimal quantities in the lower kingdoms. The souls which exist in the state of germs in the lower kingdoms stay there without moving away for immense periods of time, and it is only after great cosmic revolutions that, in changing planets, they pass to a higher reign. All they can do during a planet's period of life is to mount a few degrees. Where does the Monad begin? As well ask at what hour a nebula was formed or a sun shone for the first time. Anyhow, what constitutes the essence of any man must have evolved for millions of years through a chain of lower planets and kingdoms, keeping through all these existences an individual principle which follows it everywhere. This obscure but indestructible individuality constitutes the Divine seal of the Monad in which God wills to manifest Himself through consciousness.

The higher one ascends in the series of organisms, the more the Monad develops the principles latent in it. Polarized force becomes capable of sensation, capacity of sensation becomes instinct, and instinct becomes intelligence. In proportion as the flickering flame of consciousness is lit, this soul becomes more independent of the body, more capable of existing freely. The fluid, non-polarized soul of minerals and vegetables is bound to the elements of earth. That of animals, strongly attracted by terrestrial fire, stays there for some time after living in the body, and then returns to the surface of the globe to reincarnate in its species without ever having the possibility of leaving the lower layers of the air. These are peopled with elementals or animal souls which play their part in atmospheric life and have a great occult influence over man. The human soul alone comes from the sky and returns there after death. At what period of its long cosmic existence has the elementary become the human soul? Through what incandescent crucible, what ethereal flame has it passed? The transformation has been possible in an interplanetary period only by the meeting of human souls already fully formed which have developed in the elementary soul, its spiritual principle, and have impressed their Divine prototype like a seal of fire in its plastic substance." (Quoted from J. Rothwell's Translation.) According to the esoteric traditions of India and Egypt, we began our human existence on other planets where matter is far less dense than here. Human bodies were then almost vaporous, and it was quite easy for the soul to accomplish incarnation. Here we note a close resemblance between the teaching of Pythagoras and that profound Oriental doctrine which we have summarized in the section of this volume dealing especially with Hindu doctrine and tradition. We must refer our readers to the fine work of Edouard Schurè, from which we have already quoted freely, for further dissertation on this exhaustless theme, and pass on to a mere mention of the teaching of the Fourth Degree, called Epiphany, meaning vision from above. The initiation of intelligence must be followed by that of will, the most difficult of all. The disciple must become deeply imbued with truth in his inmost being, and must put the high teachings into practice in daily life. To attain this ideal, one must unite three kinds of perfection, called respectively realization of truth in intellect; virtue in soul; purity in body. The astral body participates in all the acts of the physical; it does indeed give effect to them. A doctrine of regeneration, which Pythagoras expounded very clearly, teaches how a second nature must replace the first, and finally the intellect must reach wisdom beyond mere knowledge till it can distinguish good from evil in every department of existence, and behold a revelation of God in the smallest of creatures, as well as in universal immensities.

On reaching this altitude, man becomes an adept, and enters into conscious possession of new faculties and powers; the inner senses of the soul expand and the physical senses are dominated by radiant will. Bodily magnetism, penetrated by the potency of the astral soul, electrified by will, acquires force apparently miraculous. Among the accepted Initiates, many healed the sick by their simple presence, though others resorted to the laying on of hands. Clairvoyance, like that of Apollonius of Tyana in one age and of Swedenborg in another, was frequently exhibited; indeed, all the wonders recorded of saints and seers throughout the literature of the ages seem to have been demonstrated in the school of this mighty master whose name to-day is being pronounced with ever-increasing reverence. The Christian doctrine of the Trinity, so much misunderstood, because so deeply veiled in mystery, was rendered far more intelligible by Pythagoras six hundred years before the beginning of the Christian era than by those controversial Fathers of the Church who rejected the Divine Feminine, and therefore made quite unintelligible the original doctrine of the procession of the Logos. Father, Mother and Child we can understand; but Father, Son and Holy Spirit is an unintelligible phrase until we know that the Holy Spirit originally stood for the Divine Feminine. The Pythagorean Trinity is described as Spirit, Soul, and Heart of the Living Universe. The life of Pythagoras was extremely beautiful, and in the truest sense both spiritual and natural. When sixty years of age he married one of his pupils, a maiden of great beauty and singular intelligence. This noble woman, Theano, entered so thoroughly into her husband's thought and life that after he had passed from earth she became the centre of the Pythagorean Order. Two sons and one daughter were the result of this union, and the whole family offered a high model for all other families to follow. On all political questions Pythagoras was as highly enlightened as in the transcendent domain of directly spiritual philosophy, for he was a reformer in the widest and highest acceptance of the term. The system of government which he advocated united the best elements of democracy and aristocracy, and it will be well indeed if those who are wrestling with modern legislative problems investigate more deeply the wise teachings of those true Initiates of old, who, while loving the whole people devotedly, and desiring in every way to promote the common interest, wisely realized that only the most intelligent and in every way enlightened among the people were competent to represent the multitudes as governors or legislators.

Cylon, the inveterate persecutor of the Pythagorean school, from which he had been expelled, was a fair sample of the unscrupulous modern demagogue. Tradition asserts that one evening, when forty of the principal members of the Order had assembled, this outrageous man, who was then a tribune, surrounded the house with an enraged crowd and set fire to the buildings. Thirty-eight of the disciples, together with Pythagoras himself, were either burned to death or massacred by their assailants, but the Order did not die; it was only dispersed, and continued for two hundred and fifty years to exert a benign, regenerating influence wherever it was established. Many of the predictions of Pythagoras were literally fulfilled, and this fact in itself inclined many to investigate the sublime doctrines of an Order which had had for its founder a sage and seer of such wonderful graces and lucidity. Truly has it been said that Pythagoras was an Adept and Initiate of the highest type; he enjoyed a direct spiritual vision, and had found the key to the occult sciences and to the spiritual world. He drew supplies of knowledge from the primal fount of truth, and united with a wondrous intellect a high moral nature, which commanded the respect and love of all capable of appreciating real nobility. The philosophic edifice he reared was never destroyed. Plato took from Pythagoras his entire system of metaphysics. The closing words of Edouard Schurè's magnificent french treatise amy be translated thus: "The school of Alexandria occupied the upper stories of the edifice, while modern science has possessed itself of the ground floor and strengthened its foundations. Many philosophical schools and mystical or religious sects have dwelt within its numerous chambers. No philosophy, however, has yet embraced it in its harmonious entirety."

CHAPTER VIII.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA.

One of the ablest followers of Pythagoras was Apollonius of Tyana, who was so great a wonder-worker that the Emperor Antonius Caracalla worshipped him as divine, while Alexander Severus and other emperors showered upon him great honors, and regarded him with high esteem. During a terrible plague at Epathuses, it is recorded that he caused it to cease immediately on his arrival there, having been summoned thither by men in high authority, who firmly believed in his miraculous healing power. Concerning his many works of healing, we are told that sometimes he was present with his patients and even laid his hands upon them, but in many instances he performed marvelous cures at a distance; he is indeed reported to have done as many mighty works as any of the great prophets or apostles of whom Holy Writ makes any mention. Like all other truly learned and holy men, Apollonius made a clear distinction between righteous magic and unholy sorcery. By true magic he understood that mysterious power which acts through sacred ceremonies performed with good intent by honorable persons, while under the term sorcery he included all acts which, however performed, proceeded from malicious motives and were worked with the intention of inflicting injury. Here we have one more illustrious tribute paid to a noble universal idea, one that, though it has long been eclipsed, is now shining forth again in all its native brilliancy, inspiring men and women in this day in many lands to perform many benevolent works similar to those which wrought so much benefit in bygone time in ancient countries. The leading doctrines of Apollonius were so similar to those of many other great teachers that his personal identity does not always stand out very clearly; he has been many times confounded with other illustrious spiritual teachers and mighty wonder-workers, but there seems good historical evidence that he was a very real and influential personage, and one moreover who wrought great blessings in his own day and handed on a far-reaching benign influence to posterity. Speaking for himself, his biographers make him declare that his mode of life was very unlike that of the bulk of the people among whom he mingled; he took very little food, but gained much nourishment from an extremely simple diet; he seems to have been entirely free from ostentation, and simply went about doing good to the fullest extent of his opportunity. As a seer he takes exceptionally high rank, for he evidently possessed ability to foresee and foretell many important events as well as to heal many diseases and quell many riots by the exercise of a power entirely super-physical. Apollonius lived at a time when faith in the gods and goddesses of the classic world had greatly waned, and when the priests and priestesses of once glorious temples had largely declined from their former high estate, and it was his earnest mission to seek not only to restore the ancient glories but to enkindle a new flame and fervor in his own generation surpassing in brightness and purity that of departed days. Like all other great teachers who undertook to enlighten the world, he was withstood and persecuted by many classes of opponents, but he always showed himself able to so thoroughly defend his doctrine and practices whenever they were attacked that he made hosts of friends from the ranks of the opposition, and surrounded himself with companies of faithful disciples who were loyal and devoted even unto death. This great teacher laid no stress on sacrifices, and paid little heed to any ritual observances; a pure life and a philanthropic temper he extolled far above all ceremonies, for moral excellencies he regarded as the only great essentials for spiritual attainment. Magical powers he looked upon as belonging by right to those who lived on a higher plane than the majority, and like all really spiritually-minded teachers he expected higher human faculties to unfold normally when the right life was lived conducive to their development, without recourse to any artificial means for stimulating them. Philostratus, in a minute description of the life of Apollonius, says that he visited the temple of Aesculapius at Aegea, the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Delphi, and Dodona; the Magi of Nineveh and Babylon; the Brahmins of India; he also visited Egypt, Ethiopia, Crete, Sicily and Rome. In his later years he resided for some time at Smyrna, Ephesus and Tyana; the date of his death is given as 96 C. E., at the age of about 100 years. Wherever he went he urged the people to a life of the strictest morality accompanied by works of piety and prayer. He is said to have cured every kind of malady, including the most dangerous and fatal diseases, and many of his predictions were accurately fulfilled. We can gather much from these recorded incidents that will throw bright light upon the early years of the Christian era, for at that period it seems impossible to doubt that a mighty spiritual wave was sweeping over this planet and manifesting its potency through the agency of a great number of contemporary wonder-workers, many of whom were unmistakably men and women of the noblest character devoted to the highest imaginable ideals. It would be a vain and useless task to attempt to disentangle the exact deeds of this one man from those of all the rest, and it is surely only necessary to consider the works themselves if our aim is to prove the reality of inspiration and its continuous flow through all the ages. Apollonius was one bright light shining with far more than ordinary brilliance, but he was not a solitary figure, nor did he claim to be an only master. We greatly need in our own day to take a far more intelligent and comprehensive view of so-called magic and all pertaining to it than can ever be taken by any who wish to prove too much for one teacher and equally too little for all the rest. We might easily cite examples from an enormous array of testimony to similar works accomplished in all parts of the world and under many widely different auspices, but enough has been said to put our readers in the way of considering the claims of ancient and modern mystery and revelation, to the end that they may search the records for themselves with renewed interest and vigor, and we trust always with the sole desire of discovering truth and weighing evidence impartially. The study of history is beneficial only in so far as it spurs us on to seek to duplicate, if not transcend, the good deeds that have been wrought by those who have blazed the path of human progress before our day. Century after century and millennium after millennium the same great problems are presented to humanity for solution, for similar needs arise continually for the exercise of that marvelous power to teach and heal which is the one indisputable credential of the true prophet and the pure white magician. It will be indeed well for us all if, considering the great interest now everywhere displayed in psychic marvels, we learn to tread the consecrated way which leads to that true adepthood which, in its last analysis, is the supreme triumph of the spirit over all that would fetter its radiant activity in individual and in communal life. There is much deep significance in the following extraordinary testimony to what Apollonius conceived to be a mode of life and course of action conducive to the most beneficial results. He says of himself: "I wear a robe of linen which as well as being conducive to cleanliness also produces more truthful dreams. Between God and man exists a bond of relationship, and by this is man in some measure a participator in the Divine nature. All are convinced that the powers of the mind and the soul are derived from God, and that those are the nearest to God who are most highly endowed with them. The Indian wisdom, to which the Egyptian is related, says that God created all, and the cause of Creation was the goodness of God. If God is therefore good, we may consider a good man as participating in the spirit of God. To what this leads he shall know who is acquainted with the philosophy of Eclectics." (Quoted from Ennemoser's "History of Magic.")

This philosophy is a combination of the purely Platonic and Pythagorean schools, which are indeed essentially at one. As the dialogues of Plato are so easily accessible and so well known to scholars, we need not proceed to dilate upon the leading tenets of that glorious Grecian school. Suffice it to say that a sense of harmony with all creation is the one great aim and object of all true philosophic doctrine. The road to this attainment is through following out in all cases the innermost dictates of one's own highest consciousness.

CHAPTER IX.

FIVE VARIETIES OF YOGA—UNION OF EASTERN AND WESTERN PHILOSOPHY.

There are five kinds of Yoga, termed in Sanscrit Karma Yoga, pertaining to Divine Union through unselfish performance of duty; Hatha Yoga, treating of Mental and Physical Attainment through exterior disciplinary exercises; Raja Yoga, dealing with Internal Realization of Truth; Bakti Yoga, intended to cultivate conscious union with Divinity through performance of Works of Devotion; Jnana Yoga, the object of which is to accomplish perfect knowledge of Divine Nature.

The simplest English equivalent of Yoga is Union. There are three special kinds of union to be effected before any of us have become Yogis. First, we must seek to realize something of the mighty truth involved in the matchless phrase, Divine Unity. Far transcending all limited views of Deity is the magnificent thought of an all-pervading as well as all-transcending Deity. According to the teachings of genuine Yogis, no idea of God can be altogether false, neither can any finite concept be entirely true, as no finite intellect can possibly encircle Infinity. We all entertain just those ideas of the Supreme Being which register accurately our stage of development, and when this is clearly understood, all difficulties vanish regarding the many discrepancies which abound in Sacred Literature. Yogis are they who have so far outgrown dependence upon outward aids to devotion that they can realize God everywhere and through everything; to them, therefore, all manifestations of life are sacred. This mighty truth, sublime as it is, like all other universal verities, is easily liable to misapprehension; we need not then be in the least surprised to encounter ignorant fanaticism associated with prevalent ideas of Yoga entertained in India to-day. It is a very common mistake made by Western admirers of Hindu philosophy to take as true expositions thereof whatever doctrines may be promulgated by any native teachers from India who may be visiting our shores. This attitude of undiscriminating acceptance of widely divergent teachings has led to much mental confusion, and it certainly behooves us to compare thoughtfully one Oriental doctrine with another, precisely as we need to judge between different theories promulgated in the West. Between Yogis and Fakirs there is an enormous difference, though the two are often mischievously confounded. Fakirs are ascetics who work marvels which greatly astonish multitudes of wondering spectators, but they are in no sense Yogis, for such as truly practise Yoga are in no sense sensational wonder-workers, but profound practical students of the Law of the Universe. Hatha Yoga, which has been much exploited in America of late, needs to be comprehended, at least in outline, before we proceed to discuss the other and more spiritual varieties, as this deals very practically with training body and mind together, so as to produce a healthy vehicle through which the spirit can act during incarnation.

The topic of rhythmic breathing is always one of extreme interest, as it lies at the very foundation of all health exercises; but it is often claimed that methods in vogue in India may be injurious to Americans and Europeans, owing to wide differences in temperament and general habits of living. This is probably true to a certain limited extent, but by no means so far as many people seem to imagine, for though heredity and early training count for a good deal everywhere, it can never be injurious, but, on the contrary, highly beneficial, to cultivate the excellent habit of deep, regular breathing. True it is that if we live naturally from childhood we shall not need to practise formal breathing exercises, just as we shall not need to exercise in a gymnasium if we accustom ourselves to taking regular outdoor exercise sufficient to keep all our limbs and muscles normally active. We cannot on that account declare that gymnastic exercises are dangerous or harmful, nor should we allow ourselves to discountenance them because when injudiciously taken they often prove highly injurious to the muscles, which are thereby overstrained. Hatha Yoga is the most popular and at the same time the most nearly dangerous of all varieties of Yoga, when undertaken in the Western world. In India, the original home of Yoga practices, the native population, by reason of a long line of suitable heredity, and also in consequence of appropriate diet and dress, are able to take many exercises with impunity, and even with decided benefit, which would soon prove disastrous to those Europeans and Americans who persist in adhering to a flesh diet and to the wearing of garments which restrict the normal activity of vital sections of the body. Without insisting immediately upon the adoption of a strictly vegetarian diet, it is essential for all who make flesh a staple article of food to at once greatly diminish the quantity they eat and cultivate a wholesome taste for nutritious grains, luscious fruits and succulent vegetables which, when wisely selected and rightfully prepared, supply all the nourishment obtainable from meat, without its over-heating and other injurious tendencies. Clothing also needs to be greatly simplified, and this can readily be accomplished by following excellent suggestions given by Greek as well as Hindu costume. The love of beauty is natural and needs to be encouraged; so does an appreciation of delicate and delicious flavors; but there is no beauty in unwholesome garments, and no delicious flavor in improper food. Simple white robes should always be worn when taking breathing exercises; these can be ornamented to suit the wearer's taste, or worn quite undecorated. In either case they are thoroughly hygienic. Fruits, vegetables and cereals can be eaten cooked or uncooked; but as all garments must be cleanly, so must all food be fresh. Rooms in which a student or company of students breath rhythmically must be kept well ventilated, and the atmosphere must be solarized as much as possible. This is a very important matter, but one that is greatly overlooked. Very many of the unpleasant results of sitting in Spiritualistic séances are due far more to imperfect physical ventilation than to any alleged evil influences in the spiritual universe, though it may be reasonably declared that undesirable visitors from unseen states may find foul air a congenial habitat. The law of correspondences works so universally and so completely that it manifests its unceasing operation wherever we may turn; therefore we cannot logically deny that foul thoughts and bad air are in close affinity, while pure thoughts and fresh air are equally near neighbors. But when the general habits and customs of life are rational, and even beautiful, a word of caution may still be needed for the over-zealous, who in their intense desire to make rapid progress, often throw aside discretion. We cannot remodel our sub-conscious habits instantly, even though we may very rapidly transform our outward customs, and it is the sub-conscious plane of our activities which is the chief seat of those indispositions which regular, systematic breathing is intended to correct It is usually unwise to assign the first or highest place to Hatha Yoga; other forms of Yoga had better be considered and practised at first by a large majority of persons, in order to counteract a pernicious tendency to put the welfare of the flesh higher in our esteem than the concerns of the spirit. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that many spiritually-minded people are far from healthy physically, and this is chiefly due to the mistaken notion that the care of the outer body is a work which can be left entirely to those in whom spiritual consciousness is not yet awakened.

Rightly and fully comprehended, spirituality is fulness of breath; the very etymology of the word is sufficient to make this entirely clear, for our english word spirit is only the latin spiritus (breath), abbreviated. Spirit and breath originally mean exactly the same. A Master breathes on his disciples, and they receive the holy breath, or spirit. Physical breath may be rightly regarded as a vehicle through which inner breath or prana is conveyed; therefore the connection between our inward and our outward living is far more intimate than we usually suppose. During physical embodiment we cannot ever attempt to separate the interests of the Ego from those of its most exterior personal sheaths, without working havoc in our philosophy and injuring the integrity of our general mode of life. One plane of expression is indeed higher and more enduring than another, but all must duly synchronize. The greatest benefits we can possibly derive from any useful mental and physical practices must be to bring our minds and bodies into such complete accord that one never acts at variance with the other. The good old saying, "A pure mind in a pure body is health," is completely true, and by pure must be meant free from confusion as well as from pollution. When we protest against adulteration in food or clothing, we are often inveighing against an admixture which is unwholesome and unlawful, though no single ingredient introduced is objectionable in itself. Sand in sugar and cotton mixed with wool may be cited as well-known examples, for when a grocer professes to sell pure sugar or a tailor declares a piece of cloth to be pure wool, he uses the word to signify simple—i.e., free from any extraneous element. Pure breath is simply fresh air vitalized with Prana circulating uninterruptedly throughout an entire body; therefore we read in treatises on Yoga that we can breathe through our bones as well as through our skin, a statement which harmonizes completely with all we know of the constitution of matter, which is made up of innumerable infinitesimal particles, no two of which ever really touch. We are now beginning to see the wisdom and the rational application of many strange old sayings and practices which are often discarded by modern critics as outworn superstitions. Take, for example, the Biblical precept, "Remove thy sandals from thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Consecrated temples were not only dedicated to sacred uses, they were also charged with a peculiar atmosphere, particularly beneficial to all who deliberately opened themselves to receive it. In the temples of Greece, many sick people were healed by simply resting in those beautiful sanctuaries, though at other times specific treatment was administered by the officiating Therapeutae. In Christian churches much benefit is often derived by those who respond to a frequent invitation to quietly rest and meditate, as well as pray. We all know how greatly sensitive people are affected by an unseen atmosphere without knowing what it is that affects them. A scientific study of Occultism interprets this riddle by introducing to our notice subtle ethers and atmospheres with which the ordinary untrained mind is technically unacquainted, but this ignorance does not prevent us from feeling the effects of some mysterious element which plays upon us without our knowledge. Nothing is more common than to exclaim, "I cannot tell how I caught that cold," or, "I don't know what makes me feel so nervous." On the other hand, we are often most pleasantly affected by some mysterious agent with which we are unacquainted, but whose acquaintance we could easily make were we to spend more time than we usually do spend in quiet meditation, and busy ourselves to some extent with the study of unseen forces. Highly sensitive people usually thrive far better in the open country or by the sea-shore than in crowded cities, because there is far more Prana where nature is comparatively unmolested than in the bewildering hives of excited human industry. Nature has her holy places where we can often derive even greater benefit than in the finest temples ever built by human hands; thus it follows that to go barefooted in the country or on any grassy slope or well-kept lawn, or at the sea-shore, when the sand is inviting, is a highly beneficial exercise, and one which often serves to remove from the body many impurities which are the causes of those distressing congestions which only proper breathing can permanently prevent. It has often been said during recent years that breathing exercises patterned after Oriental models have developed hysteria and many other distressing maladies, particularly in delicate American women who have taken the exercises without the guidance of a competent instructor. This may be the case, but if it be so, it only serves to illustrate the extreme unwisdom of neglecting necessary preliminary caution, for these misguided women have generally worn tight shoes and gloves, as well as other unwholesome garments, while attempting to take the exercises, and they have also unduly strained themselves by endeavoring to take too advanced exercises at the beginning of their practice. There is not the slightest reason why women should not breathe quite as deeply and steadily as men, and they do so breathe when they wear proper clothing and place the body in natural position. Whoever attempts Yoga breathing should concentrate completely upon some great idea which can be readily expressed in a single expressive word, such, for instance, as courage, rest, truth, or any other which embodies the particular virtue one now desires especially to cultivate. We should make a mental picure of the Solar Plexus, imagining it as a miniature sun at the center of the organism, it being the great central ganglion behind the abdomen. This center is electro-magnetically connected with the pineal gland, which Descartes and other philosophers have truly declared to be the vital center in the brain whence the soul operates by means of influx into all sections of the body. When perfect harmony is obtained between the brain center and the abdominal center, there can be no disease in the system, because all functions are properly discharged, and the whole body is completely vitalized and ventilated. The Yogis of India must never be confounded with the Fakirs, for the latter do themselves physical injury in their attempt to develop abnormal powers, and though they often succeed in performing wonderful feats of magic, they do not perform works of healing, nor do they really add anything to the useful knowledge of those who witness their weird exhibitions. The Yogis, on the other hand, are both teachers and healers, and set before their students high examples of noble living, for they have gained complete control over all their appetites, and are in every sense truly exemplary in conduct. When we come to consider, one by one, the several varieties of Yoga practice already enumerated, we shall soon discover that they may be compared with five digits of a single hand, or five branches of a tree, all growing out of one palm or ramifying from a single trunk. Karma Yoga is the Sanscrit name for the unselfish performance of one's constant duty, regardless of the varying forms that duty may from time to time assume. This is the work of the householder, and of the man of affairs, and has nothing to do with those peculiar practices which belong to the work and training of those who virtually retire from the world to devote themselves to a solitary contemplative life, in which most of us can take no part. The word duty, though a very common word, is not always easy to define, seeing that it is not properly applied to all those numerous performances which people go through with at the behest of foolish customs, or to gratify the caprices of members of their families. Many a man and many a woman is sacrificed unsparingly to false ideas of duty, and instead of receiving the blessing of gratitude from others, or the inward approval of one's own conscience, nothing but ingratitude from without and discontent within repays his or her mistaken efforts. Duty is always reasonable, and its performance must conduce in some way to the enlargement and ennoblement of life; it must have a tendency to raise the moral, intellectual and physical condition of all who are influenced by it; it cannot therefore be reasonably associated with a ceaseless round of occupations which bring no benefit to those who undertake them or to any who are directly affected by them. Strange as the phrase may sound, we often have to neglect one duty to discharge another; but this is, of course, never the case except in seeming, for real duties do not and cannot conflict. It can never be anyone's duty to be in two places at once, so long as it remains impossible, but it often appears as though one ought to be there. Now the particular use of right meditation is to put us on the track which will enable us to clearly perceive what is the one thing we really ought to do just now, and where is the identical place in which we ought to do it. Interior illumination may show us this, and we can then set to work at once to perform the definite duty pertaining to a particular moment.

When we feel inwardly thoroughly convinced that something is our duty then we must meet and conquer whatever obstacle, inducement or temptation would lead us off in some other direction; and though at first we may find it difficult to silence all conflicting voices and learn to pay no heed to any distracting solicitations, a little regular practice faithfully persisted in will soon develop within us such a mental habit that we almost spontaneously do the very things which aforetime seemed herculean tasks almost beyond our strength to accomplish. The sub-self or sub-conscious mind soon gets into a good habit if we persist in educating it, and when we have once formed a good habit we need never loosen our hold upon it, because indulgence in it can only redound to our own benefit and to the welfare of all with whom we are associated. It is always at the very outset of a practice that we encounter the greatest difficulties; that is why we so often abandon the race when, if we did but persist in running it, we should be abundantly repaid for all our arduous efforts. In the practice of Yoga we need only to cultivate dispositions and methods necessary to success in every conceivable line of human enterprise. Diligence in well-doing is the only road to victory. Another phase of Yoga, Bakti-Yoga, concerns the performance of certain works of devotion which have for their object bringing the student into ever fuller realization of the oneness of all lives. These works are sometimes of a definitely regulated and even stereotyped nature, closely resembling the formal ritualistic exercises of many types of Christians who find it beneficial to perform particular acts of devotion at stated intervals and in an unvarying manner, such for instance as the Roman Catholic recitation of the Rosary. Others again consider such mechanical religious performances as hindrances rather than helps to real devotion; but these people are by no means undevout, they are simply of such temperament that nothing helps them which is not spontaneous. Very great wisdom is displayed in the Epistles of St. Paul where the subject of ceremonial devotion is quite elaborately discussed, for the apostle sums up all his advice in the memorable admonition, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." We are very much mistaken if we imagine that Hindoos or any other type of Asiatics are all possessed of the same turn of mind, or that all find it profitable to seek spiritual enlightenment along a single pathway, for we can find fully as much variety among the native populations in Asia as among Europeans or Americans, some of whom naturally incline to the rigid simplicity of the Quaker, while others are drawn to the most elaborate pomp and ceremony. There is nothing surprising in this when we look at external nature, which presents to us an unending variety of types and phenomena, and just as every kind of animal has its own peculiar needs which must be appropriately met if that creature is to thrive truly, so is it that in human life varieties of disposition and requirement are even more numerous and widely diversified, so that what is highly beneficial for some, is positively detrimental to others. Works of devotion cannot always be clearly separated from the performance of common duties, for one melts imperceptibly into the other. The apostolic injunctions, "Pray without ceasing," and "In everything give thanks," would have no meaning were it not possible to carry the spirit of devotion into every ordinary exercise, and certainly if this were not so such words as "Whether you eat, drink, or whatsoever you do, do all to the glory of God," would be utterly incomprehensible. We are now again tracing a vivid parallel between Oriental philosophy and primitive Christianity, which when rightly studied causes us to treat with utter contempt those absurd denunciations of Oriental religions which still disfigure Christian hymnbooks and lead many advocates of Foreign Missions to make such ignorant and misleading statements that the good work they are endeavoring to accomplish must of necessity be very greatly handicapped by the total failure of these self-appointed missionaries to understand the people among whom they endeavor to accomplish their work of proselytizing. "The heathen in his blindness bows down to wood and stone" is a stupid falsehood found in the very heart of an extremely popular hymn. What good congregations expect to accomplish by singing such trash is difficult to understand, for it cannot lift the minds of the singers to any high appreciation of divine wisdom when they declare in a preceding sentence, "In vain with lavish kindness the gifts of God are strewn." The reverential Hindoo has far too deep a sense of the wisdom of Deity to believe that God does anything in vain, and every enlightened Oriental is far too intelligent, and also far too kindly, to utter such misleading nonsense concerning well-meaning people who do not speak his language or profess his creed, but who do engage in works of devotion very similar to his own. The more we study Oriental philosophy the more do we feel inclined to advocate the formation of a "Mind Your Own Business Society" to offset the pernicious influence of those mistaken missionary endeavors which are no doubt founded in good motive, but display total ignorance of the work which needs to be done in so-called heathen countries, where it certainly is desirable to stimulate a large percentage of the natives to loftier practices than those they now indulge, and to induce them to give up many degrading superstitions. But as we are also superstitious to some extent in many directions, we can all learn from each other what to cultivate and what to avoid, seeing that we are all, properly speaking, pupil-teachers rather than altogether pupils or altogether teachers in the school of life. Many a Protestant regards a great part of Roman Catholic devotion as unadulterated idolatry, and many a Roman Catholic takes exactly the same view of the means of devotion employed in Oriental countries, though the outward forms are so nearly identical that an impartial observer would regard one exactly as he would look upon the other. Now these monotonous repetitions of words and movements may mean very much to some people, while they mean nothing at all to others, therefore it is only fair that we should let those people enjoy them who receive benefit from their use, without adopting them ourselves unless we honestly feel that we could derive help from them, in which case we have a perfect right to use them. We are usually inclined to sneer at the practices of others when they appear to us ridiculous, though we are very apt indeed to become hurt or resentful when others laugh at our peculiarities. This is a certain mark of foolish self-conceit coupled with less than due regard for the rights of others. Works of devotion are, however, by no means confined to ritual observances even in India or Ceylon, though in that part of the world the practice of religious ceremonial enters quite as largely into the daily life of the people as it does into the life of the extremely orthodox Oriental Jew who counts it a great delight to observe punctiliously the 613 precepts of the Torah, many of which appear useless and antiquated to the modern Israelites of Europe and America. A work of devotion is, properly speaking, any work undertaken in a devout spirit and performed in reverent frame of mind, but as objects of devotion are very varied, we cannot classify all devout actions under a single heading. We often speak correctly of devotion to one's country, to an honored cause, to the welfare of one's family, and also to art, science, and business. The kind of work in which we engage receives its spiritual quality from the motive which prompts it, and the disposition which pervades it, therefore we are very likely to fall into serious error if we ever attempt to call certain definite external acts works of devotion in any exclusive sense. Writing a letter may be a thoroughly devout act, and it may accomplish untold benefit and bring a great blessing upon the writer, or the letter written may be merely frivolous, and so nearly unimportant that we can trace no definite result from its production, or again it may be written with a malicious motive and work great havoc. In these three instances exactly the same writing materials may have been employed in all cases, each letter might contain the same number of words in the same language, and all three be sent at the same time to the same city at the same rate of postage. Now, could anything be more ridiculous than to attempt to discourse upon the morality or immorality of writing an epistle of a certain length with a particular kind of ink on a certain grade of paper, and after having written it send it to a particular destination? But such a discourse would be no more unreasonable than one which undertakes to measure or determine the value or demerit of any outward action without taking into account the object of its performance and the mental state of the performer. Yoga, then, cannot be reduced to the level of mechanism, though we may use mechanical means in its performance, just as we all employ writing materials equally when we are engaged in epistolary correspondence of the highest merit and quite the reverse. We have now entered a field of thought in which we can glean many profitable harvests, if we carry steadily with us the one all-important feeling that we can obtain blessing, no matter what we are doing, or how we may be circumstanced, provided we invariably determine to infuse into all our words and actions a benefic spirit of resolute determination to bless humanity through all our undertakings.

CHAPTER X.

EZEKIEL'S WHEEL—WHAT IT SIGNIFIES.—ASTROLOGY IN PROPHECY.

Among the many remarkable chapters in the amazingly symbolic book of the Prophet Ezekiel, the Tenth is in some respects the most highly emblematical of all, and, unless it is clearly understood that it describes a vivid vision and is in no sense intended to be taken literally, it must certainly appear entirely incomprehensible. But let us make an endeavor to interpret, in some degree at least, its marvellous imagery, and as we peer below the depths of its astounding letter we shall soon begin to catch some glimpses of its many deeper aspects. Were we to attempt to exhaust the meaning of the vision by any single attempt at interpretation we should defeat the very end we have in view, which is only to suggest some few thoughts which may be helpful to students who are seeking a key to the inner sanctuary of symbolic literature which is now beginning to be widely dealt with in an entirely superhistorical manner. Prophetical imagery may have both a local and a superlocal significance, by which we mean that certain events symbolically described or foretold may have particular reference to a special age and people in an immediate sense, and at the same time be susceptible of much wider application. The writers of headings of pages in the King James version of the English Bible took amazing, and often entirely unwarranted, liberties with their often very poor translation of the Hebrew text, and it is these chapter-headings which have led to a vast amount of the misapprehension which extensively prevails as to the real meaning of the original. In the case of the chapter now before us this annoyance is not encountered, for the headings are simply descriptive, viz., "Vision of the coals of fire and of the Cherubim." The man clothed with linen, who is a very prominent character in many of Ezekiel's visions, may fairly be considered as one of those many angelic messengers of whom we read continually, all of whom are described as clad in pure white raiment, for at least two reasons: First, because all ambassadors sent forth by esoteric confraternities are invariably clad in white garments, and, secondly, because clairvoyant vision in all ages has enabled seers to behold the luminous white aura which radiates from all celestial messengers whether in the incarnate or excarnate state. The cherubs, who also play an important part among the characters in the vision, represented in olden times souls not yet terrestrially embodied, but awaiting incarnation, for the seers of every age and country have testified unanimously to spiritual pre-existence. The resemblance traced between a sapphire and a celestial throne suggests immediately the time-honored significance of that extremely beauteous gem, always a type of wisdom, sincerity, and constancy Obtaining fire from heaven and scattering it over the earth is a symbol to be met with throughout almost the entire range of classic literature, the well-known story of Prometheus being a highly typical example. Fire has occupied a place of singular honor among all nations, and as a religious emblem it has always held the center of the stage, and deservedly so when we consider its three leading and distinctive properties, which are to enlighten, to purify, and to warm. Heat, light and purification are instantly suggested with the thought of fire, and therefore the great alchemical work of transmutation is symbolized thereby. Much that refers to profound and awe-inspiring initiatory rites is conveyed by this far-reaching symbol. The man in white raiment going in and out of the mystic flame represents a thoroughly developed hierophant, one who has truly passed through the mystic death and attained to the glorious freedom of the new life of the risen and regenerate. The wings of the cherubim denote ability to pass through air or ether as easily as birds can fly and fishes swim, and doubtless with far greater rapidity. A comparison of the sound made by the motion of the wings of the cherubim to the voice of the Almighty when speaking, is a clear reference to the very ancient and wide-spread idea that GOD speaks to humanity on earth through the agency of angels. All revelations must of necessity be accommodated to the state of receptivity of those to whom they are addressed, for where there is no comprehension there can be no revelation, a revelation necessitating a comprehender as well as a revelator. According to some commentators the wheels among which the man in white raiment stands have an astrological significance, and in that curious book, "Art Magic," which gives much information of an unusual character, we find an illustration of Ezekiel's Wheel intended to set forth the astrological idea of ascending Macrocosmos and descending Microcosmos. Six signs of the Zodiac, Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, are on the line of ascent. Libra, the seventh sign, is the turning-point or balance of the scale. Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius, Pisces, are on the descending line. The wheels within wheels according to this rendering refer plainly to the different Houses of the Sun, as the twelve signs of the Zodiac are termed. In each of these Houses humanity accomplishes some special work, and during each Grand Cycle of 25,840 years our Sun passes through these twelve Houses, just as our little earth goes through them in a trifle over 365 days.

The four special signs described as having respectively the face of a cherub, a man, a lion, and an eagle, are the four so-called Fixed Signs of the Zodiac. These are Aquarius, Scorpio, Leo, Taurus. Aquarius is familiar to all of us as the man with the watering-pot; Leo is the lion, Taurus is the winged cherub as frequently represented in ancient symbolic art; Scorpio is the eagle and has been so represented as to its spiritual significance from ages immemorial. Christian art has employed these symbols to characterize the four Evangelists, that is why we so frequently behold an eagle lectern in a Christian church; though its more ancient and universal significance is rarely mentioned except by students of astrology, who naturally wish to prove the relationship between their own modern teaching and the wisdom of the ancient prophets. Astrology must always be to some extent under a ban until its professors everywhere disclaim all connection with fatalism and with pessimism, for these twin errors rob astrology of all the good it might otherwise accomplish. Idle curiosity may prompt many people to pry into the future without any belief that they can profitably utilize the knowledge they obtain, but the serious-minded, who are ever seeking for profitable instruction, can never take interest in any predictions which do not serve to encourage those who listen to them to buckle on their spiritual armor and conquer whatever conditions would prove adverse did we allow them to triumph over us when it is our mission and prerogative to rise above them, by meeting these seeming adversaries not as foes to be exterminated but as necessary material for purposes of eventual transmutation into forms as unlike the original as an eagle is unlike a scorpion. These four very extraordinary Living Creatures mentioned in Ezekiel reappear in the Apocalypse, which is a most significant illustration of the widespread use of an identical symbology. These are Masonic as well as Astrologic emblems and are doubtless well comprehended by those comparatively few really distinguished Masons who peer into the esoteric meaning of Masonic rites and are far from satisfied with bare initiation into the outer fringe of the Masonic garment. But however deeply versed in Masonic lore the ancient prophets may have been, they were before and above all else exhorters of the people unto civic as well as private righteousness.

The highly important significance of the transformation of Scorpio into Aquilla (the Eagle) has always been regarded as the accomplishment of the Magnum Opus of the Alchemists, who were always accustomed to veil their profound esoteric teachings concerning human regeneration under a general symbolism pertaining to the literal transmutation of metals, a feat which doubtless was, to some extent, actually accomplished by those well versed in mystic chemistry. But as the noblest and most trustworthy Rosicrucians, and all other students of genuine alchemy, invariably declared that no one could become a true White Magician until he had overcome all cupidity, the literal production of material gold was a decidedly unimportant work in the estimation of those great Magicians who made the regeneration of humanity, individually and collectively, the one supreme object of their indefatigable exertions. Earth, Air, Fire, Water, like North, South, East, West, are employed in mystical writings as significant of the four chief divisions of human life in all directions. The four typical rivers watering the Garden of Eden are, alchemically considered, the four great arteries which are the river-courses of the blood. The four rivers enumerated in Genesis may well be thought to have some connection with the four Living Creatures mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. Pison stands for the innominate artery which supplies blood to the right side of the head and to the right arm and hand. Gihon represents the second great artery at the arch of the aorta—the left common carotid—which supplies the left side of the head and, through the "Circle of Willis," can also supply the right side of the brain. Hiddekel refers to that which furnishes blood to the upper portion of the left hand. Euphrates stands for the descending aorta, which supplies the lungs and all organs below them, including the major sections of the chest and stomach. Keeping in constant remembrance the relation between Macrocosm and Microcosm we shall experience little, if any, difficulty in tracing the vital unity of these several correspondences, for though at first there may appear but a very slight and chiefly fanciful connection between the Signs of the Zodiac and the different sections of the human body, no sooner have we grasped something of the inevitable implications of the microcosmical idea than we see at once that the constellations and all they signify are not only without, but also most verily within every one of us. At the very outset of any practical instruction in astrology it is highly essential that the teacher should seek to remove the prevailing fallacy that when we are treating of planetary influences we are alluding only to such as are exerted over us by bodies distant many millions of miles from this earth.

Every influence exerted upon us from without must have its correspondence within, otherwise we could not be affected by it. It is because we are universes in minimum that we can know and feel something of the greater Universe outside. Hermetic Philosophy is the only adequate reconciler of physics with metaphysics and of idealistic with realistic philosophy, for in the light of Hermetism we can readily comprehend how our bodily senses can be entirely trustworthy, so far as their testimony extends, and at the same time agree with the idealist who insists that all that we perceive is within the consciousness of the percipient, for it is within us and without us at the same instant, precisely as there is air in our bodies at the same time there must ever be a far greater volume of atmosphere outside. Prophetic visions always introduce us to that universal sign and symbol language in which we usually dream, and which generally greatly baffles us until we have found a key to its interpretation.

CHAPTER XI.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG AND HIS DOCTRINE OF CORRESPONDENCES.

Whatever estimate we may seek to place upon some of the doctrines of the great Swedish philosopher and seer, Emanuel Swedenborg, it is impossible to overlook fairly his enormous contribution to spiritual and liberal religious and philosophic thought, for though many of his followers are extremely conservative,—and apparently intolerant of all claims to modern illumination after the time of Swedenborg,—no narrowness on the part of subsequent generations can remove any lustre from the career of the highly learned and truly marvellous man to whom we are all very deeply indebted for calling renewed attention to very ancient ideas concerning Holy Scriptures quite at variance with the conventional orthodoxy of his period. As a distinguished man of science and of letters, also as a marvellous clairvoyant, Swedenborg shines forth brilliantly in contrast with the general dulness and deadness of his age. The 18th century was remarkable for the prevalence of cold religious formalism and much looseness in morality, and to counteract both these depressing tendencies Swedenborg worked with skill and energy truly marvellous.

The literary output of this amazing writer would be wonderful if judged from the superficial standpoint of voluminousness alone, but when we take into account the extreme excellence of this enormous mass of literary material we cannot feel other than convinced that we are in the presence of a mind trained and cultured far beyond the ordinary. As the religious denomination known as Swedenborgian has for a great many years been industriously circulating many of Swedenborg's theological writings, either gratuitously or at merely nominal cost, the reading public is fairly well acquainted with "Heaven and Hell;" "Divine Providence"; "Divine Love and Wisdom," and several other of the smaller books, but we doubt if very many, apart from special students, have waded through "Arcana Cœlestia," "Apocalypse Unveiled;" or even "The True Christian Religion;" all of which are decidedly bulky volumes and written in that precise, leisurely, scholarly style which shows their author to have been a singularly careful, and evidently unhasting, though wonderfully fertile writer. To appreciate in any due degree the revolutionary character of Swedenborg's method of dealing with the accepted Bible of his day and country, we must remember that though he strenuously insists that there are two interior senses—Spiritual and Celestial—within the literal, which he calls the Natural sense of those portions of the Bible which he says are verily the Divine Word, he by no means allows that the entire 66 documents which constitute the Holy Bible of Protestant Christendom are to be regarded as an absolutely divine revelation. On the contrary, he places them just about where the Church of England places the Apocrypha, which it recommends for reading, even in church services, but to which it assigns no such authority as to the Old and New Testaments.

The Pentateuch, or Torah, according to Swedenborg, is indeed a divine revelation, but not externally as touching literal history, sacrifices, and various ceremonial observances, but as to an interior meaning which has to do, primarily, not with man's outer formation, but with the 7 stages of human regeneration, which are spiritually set forth in the opening chapter of Genesis. It is quite easy to see how complacently Swedenborgians smiled at that revolutionary Darwinism which convulsed the religious, as well as the scientific, world during the middle of the 19th Century, for the doctrine of correspondences could not be adversely affected if it were proved that man had been on earth millions of years instead of only 6,000. It is extremely interesting to look up interior meanings in Swedenborg's "Dictionary of Correspondences," for there we are told that Balaam's ass represented his natural affection for good, and that saved him from destruction when the direful consequences of his disobedience to Divine direction were ready to overwhelm him. To many minds such a mode of exegesis must appear arbitrary and far-fetched in the extreme, but such is not necessarily the case if we take into consideration the Hermetic method of teaching, which virtually all Mystics, alike of ancient and modern periods, have insisted upon as the only really important aspect of any edifying and spiritually enlightening literature. It cannot be seriously admitted by thoughtful minds that a record of merely exterior events in human history is specially revealed from Heaven, but it is conceivable that outward narratives have been used illustratively and allegorically to enshrine teachings of the utmost value through all succeeding generations.

As there can be no completer summary of Swedenborg's teaching, as to its foundations, than his dissertation concerning the interior meaning of the seven "days" of Genesis, we append his interpretations translated from the original Latin (the language in which he always wrote) contained in that intensely interesting work "The Life and Mission of Emanuel Swedenborg" by Benjamin Worcester. The six days, or times, which are so many successive states of man's regeneration, are in general as follows: The First state is that which precedes, both from infancy and immediately before regeneration, and it is called a void, emptiness and thick-darkness. And the first movement, which is the mercy of the Lord, is the spirit of God moving itself upon the face of the waters.

The Second state is when distinction is made between the things which are the Lord's and those which are man's own; those which are the Lord's are called in the Word 'remains,' and are here especially the knowledges of faith which man has acquired from infancy, which are stored up and are not manifest before he comes into this state. This state seldom exists at the present day without temptation, misfortune or grief, which cause the things of the body and the world, or his own, to become quiet and, as it were, to die. Then the things of the external man are separated from those of the internal; in the internal are the remains stored up by the Lord for this time and this use.

The Third state is that of repentance, in which from the internal man he speaks piously and devoutly, and brings forth good things, as the works of charity, but which are nevertheless inanimate because he regards them as from himself. These are called the tender grass, then the herb yielding seed, and afterwards the tree yielding fruit.

The Fourth state is when he is affected by love and illumined by faith; he before indeed spoke pious things and brought forth good things, but from a state of temptation and distress, not from faith and charity. These, therefore, love and faith, are now enkindled in the internal man and are called the two great lights.

The Fifth state is that he speaks from faith and thereby confirms himself in truth and good; the things which he then brings forth are animate, and are called fishes of the sea and birds of the heavens.

The Sixth state is, when from faith and thence from love he speaks true things and does good things, the things he then brings forth are called the living soul and creature. And because he then begins to act from love as well as from faith he becomes a spiritual man which is called an image of God. His spiritual life is delighted and sustained by the things that are of the knowledges of faith and of the works of charity, which are called his food; and his natural life is delighted and sustained by the things that are of the body and the senses; from which there is a combat until love reigns and he becomes a celestial man.

They who are regenerated do not all arrive at this state, but some, and the greatest part at this day, only to the first; some only to the second; some to the third; the fourth, and the fifth; few to the sixth, and scarcely any to the seventh.

The Seventh state signifies a condition of complete regeneration."

From the above outline our readers can gather at least a faint idea of how completely Swedenborg does away with all simply external interpretations of the Pentateuch, and when he proceeds to deal with the Book of Revelations he finds no difficulty in explaining the many elaborate hieroglyphics with which the mysterious Apocalypse abounds.

It is indeed to his "Apocalypse Unveiled" that we must turn for anything like an adequate view of his special doctrine concerning the Church of the New Jerusalem, which he regards as a new dispensation of truth, in the advantages of which the world is now measurably sharing, though the full glory of the new age has not yet burst upon us. This most wonderful of all his writings was never completed or published by the author, although carefully prepared for the printer as far as the middle of the nineteenth chapter. The general plan of the work closely resembles that of the "Arcana Cœlestia"; the full text of each chapter is given, then elaborate expositions of single verses follow; some of which are treated at great length, others briefly.

According to Swedenborg a new age of the world began in 1757, and it was after that year that he undertook to minutely explain the Apocalypse, which he declares (particularly in its closing chapters) symbolically describes the ideal condition of humanity yet to be realized.

John the Revelator is said to represent those who are in the good of life from faith in the Lord who remain steadfast through the desolation of the church, and who are the first to become aware of their Lord's coming, which being "in clouds," and in the midst of "seven golden candlesticks," represents a manifestation of light in the midst of obscurity in the letter of the Word. The seven churches are the members of the Christian Church in seven distinct conditions. What was seen through the door in heaven (Chap. 4) was the ordering of all things in preparation for judgment. Those who sit on different-colored horses mean those who variously understand the significance of the Word. Souls under the altar are those who have lived a good life reverencing the Lord, and though oppressed by rulers of the external church, have been preserved by divine care. The rolling away of heaven as a scroll represents the dissolution of that fictitious heaven which pretended Christians form for themselves as soon as their inner condition is disclosed by the light of the Lord's coming. The mystical 144,000 are they of the true church of every kind who are sanctified within. The "woes" follow the exploration of the states of those who rely on faith without charity. The woman clothed with the sun (Chap. 12) signifies the new church that is to come; the man child whom she brings forth is the strong doctrine of that church which is opposed frantically by the dragon which represents the false doctrine of faith alone. The ruling of the nations with a rod of iron by the man child represents the power of the new doctrine which will be illustrated both from the letter of the Word and by rational argument from the facts of nature. War in heaven results in the overthrow of those fictitious states which outwardly appear as heavens until their inner lack of true affection is discerned. The golden vials full of divine anger signify the holy good and truth of heaven flowing in and making evil secreted in the church manifest, that it may be vanquished. Babylon described as a "harlot," reveals the state of those who misuse their position in the church for ends of self-aggrandisement. The "Beast" is the letter of the Word in the hands of those who pervert it to base ends. The coming church, confirmed in genuine truth, is described as the bride of the Lamb, clad in fine linen; the doctrine of this church is described as a Holy City descending from God out of heaven into which there shall not enter anything false or defiling. The foregoing are but a few out of multitudinous explanations of striking metaphors with which this marvellous book abounds, but though few they suffice to afford some clear insight into Swedenborg's general line of interpretation. In addition to all this remarkable expository comment Swedenborg has given us an immense number of personal experiences of a superphysical character not only in his "Diary" but scattered through almost all his works. To any unprejudiced reader many of these narrations may serve the double purpose of acquainting us not only with Swedenborg's spiritual experiences but also with his own mental bias, which was particularly strong in certain definite directions. Being educated as a Lutheran he seems to have inherited a certain affection for some forms of Protestant Christianity and a very decided dislike for Roman Catholicism, and this, as Emerson has pointed out, together with many similar incidents, serves to foster the opinion, entertained very widely, that however true a seer he may have been his revelations were all more or less colored by the mental medium through which they flowed; they are therefore no more to be regarded as infallible than those of other seers. But this rational position is so distasteful to extreme Swedenborgians that they appear resentful when this great man, whom they so very highly extol, is placed upon something like the same level with other great philosophers who have also enjoyed spiritual revelations. The remark of the apostle Paul, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels," is universally applicable to all human experience, and it is just at this point that simple Theism proves its unconquerable superiority to all sectarian systems, adherents to which invariably claim far too much for some one leader whom they extravagantly exalt, and often far too little for other noble teachers with whose positions they are not in sympathy. The foolish statement that God makes a perfect revelation through an imperfect medium is a fantastic bubble which bursts as soon as it is pricked, for there is no question of divine but only of human ability at stake; and if we are in this world undergoing gradual training, and it is the divine will that we should unfold by a succession of progressive experiences, we may safely conclude that there is no cut and dried revelation once for all ready to our hand. It is undoubtedly far best for us to be situated exactly as we are, without such a revelation, but with every inducement and ever-increasing opportunity to arrive at more and more knowledge of truth for ourselves by faithfully and continually exercising those very faculties with which we are clearly endowed for the purpose of enabling us to find out truth through the agency of their exercise. Though this common-sense position, as it may well be called, is in entire agreement with all our actual experiences of human education, and is moreover strictly scientific in all its tendencies and implications, it can never satisfy any who demand a complete unveiling of the mysteries of the universe, for they set themselves in an attitude toward revelation which renders it impossible for there to be a gradual unwinding of the scroll of truth to human understanding, seeing that if their position be tenable, all truth must be already in our possession. Needless to argue that no really illumined teacher at any time anywhere ever took so insane a position, which is one, moreover, that no professedly Orthodox or Catholic theologian will attempt to maintain if engaged in controversy with an intellectual opponent.

It is much to be regretted that so few admirers of any great teacher seem willing to place him among the world's enlighteners, simply as one of them, instead of exalting their chosen hero to a rank enirely beyond that of all the rest. This attitude toward Swedenborg, on the part of his devotees, has led many to turn away entirely from his revelations because they could not accept them as infallible, though they doubtless contain much ennobling philosophy, and can well be studied as helpful textbooks by all who are seeking to acquaint themselves with the history of modern seership. Though, for ourselves, we totally deny everlasting continuance in hells, which most Swedenborgians believe is a necessary inference from their leader's disclosures concerning the spiritual world, we can entirely agree with Swedenborg's doctrine of dominant affection regulating our condition in the hereafter. Clairvoyance may be perfect, to the extent of clearly revealing post-mortem conditions as they now exist, without throwing any light whatever on how radically those conditions may have changed before another century has rolled away. We have not the slightest warrant for supposing that any soul will choose evil everlastingly, though we can comprehend the idea that if one did actually desire to spend eternity in a hell, the privilege would be accorded him of gratifying his dominant propensity. But how pitiably absurd is such a vile conjecture in the light of Swedenborg's primary teaching regarding human origin, for he attributes all life to a sole Divine Being, whose life animates the entire creation. Swedenborg accounts for evil by styling it an inversion of good, but why an inversion should continue forever can never be explained reasonably. There is no diabolical fount of life whence some portion of the creation has emanated, and if all souls are alike divinely created why should some choose to spend eternity in opposition to their Creator whom Swedenborg beautifully describes as perfect Love and Wisdom? In the hideous and utterly irrational idea of even a greatly modified unending hell we see traces of the pernicious Lutheran doctrine which Swedenborg never completely left behind, though he wonderfully improved and in every way greatly modified it. Running all through Swedenborgian theology is the supposition, to say the least, that some human souls have, during the brief term of a single embodiment on earth, so confirmed themselves in love of evil,—which of course implies hatred of good,—that of their own volition they will remain forever in a state of alienation from all truth and goodness. In this inference we can see nothing but shortsighted failure to discern the true inwardness of human nature. Where those fictitious characters are to be found in real life who have no love of goodness in them we have never been able to discover, though it needs no more than the most ordinary observation to discern widely different degrees of manifest goodness, not only in different individuals, but also in the same individuals at different times and in the midst of varying circumstances. We are often reminded by Swedenborgians that the Lord coerces no one, but leaves every individual free to choose a destiny; but the full acceptance of that proposition does not in the slightest measure sustain the position we are combating, for it can be assented to in its entirety by all who take a reasonable view of human nature and be by them employed to illustrate the certainty that that very freedom of choice upon which Swedenborg insists so strenuously will prove the agent through which the transformation of all hells into heavens will be ultimately accomplished. Were this point only a theological quibble, having no immediate bearing upon our conduct toward our fellow beings here and now, we might well consign it to the category of those mysteries which may be cleared up in a future life, but not in the present; but nothing can be more misleading than to assume that an anthropological doctrine can be void of present influence upon the mutual practical conduct of those who entertain it. The whole question of Prison Reform is affected vitally by the views of human nature which we at this moment entertain, and it is not too much to condemn as shockingly immoral a doctrine of innate and perpetual, therefore presumably irremediable depravity. With the breaking down, in nearly all Christian communities, of the frightful old views of hell which Swedenborg did so much to modify, a wave of humanity is now sweeping over the earth, which promises ere long to completely transfigure all our penal institutions; and so powerfully is the good influence exerted by the "new theology" being already felt that we can hardly take up a periodical, or even a newspaper, without finding some account of good work accomplished through the beneficent influence exerted by the dissemination and application of humane views of human nature. The Southern States of America have long been in the clutch of extreme religious and other phases of conservatism, and it has generally been considered that the North is far more open to accept needed reforms in thought and practise than the South; but it is now happily true that the South is entering upon a new era of prosperity and awakening to embrace the same noble philanthropic spirit which is now making rapid headway in the North and in the West. As recently as March 29, 1910, a representative Southern newspaper, "Virginian Pilot," Norfolk, Virginia, contained the following beautiful account of an address delivered in that city by Judge Benjamin Lindsey, of Denver, Colorado. Our special object in inserting the report in this volume is to show exactly how human nature actually responds in this world to the right sort of treatment, and it is this same human nature with which we have to deal when we are contemplating the future state of our humanity. As we read this noble record of the gracious helpful work of a truly brave and strong, as well as intensely kindly man, let us keep steadily before us the fact that Judge Lindsey is dealing with that element in society which is designated "incorrigible" in many instances by people who can see no latent love of virtue below the mass of débris behind which it is often deeply hid. When theologians as a whole believe that the law which regulates the universe is at least as good and wise as its manifestations in the persons of many living philanthropists, though they may still have much more to learn, they will cease speculating upon the fate of the "finally impenitent."

BOYS' CHAMPION IS ENTHUSIASTICALLY WELCOMED.

Judge Ben. B. Lindsey, of the Juvenile Court of Denver, Colo., one of the most noted workers in the interest of juvenile court work in the United States, and the author of the sensational political story, "The Beast in the Jungle," which has been running in Everybody's Magazine for the past six months, lectured to a large audience at the Academy of Music last night on "Juvenile Court Work." The lecture was given under the auspices of the Co-operative Clubs of Norfolk and Portsmouth and directly under the auspices of the Norfolk section, Council of Jewish Women.

After his lecture, which was received with great warmth, Judge Lindsey was besieged by the representatives of a half dozen clubs and organizations of the city and promised to make his appearance before four of them.

It is no wonder that the "kids" of Denver took Judge Lindsey into their confidence and told him their troubles when no other judge had ever been able to get a word either as evidence or confidence. Judge Lindsey is a man who has a personality which attracts youngsters and inspires confidence. He has an honest, appealing sort of a face with not a hard expression in it, but always a laugh about his eyes when the rest of his countenance seems serious.

He carried his audience away with him last night on many little trips into boys' hearts and boys' lives. He told about things which have happened to about every man who listened to him last night, but most of them had forgotten and were delighted when their memories were refreshed. He brought out the fact that interest is everything in a child's life and that the child is changing the whole scheme of things. What is most needed, he said, is a little love in the law and less of that inconsiderate harshness which classes the mischievous boy with the criminal man. Fewer jails and more schools; more education, more tolerance, more patience and more sympathy, and less browbeating, is Judge Lindsey's prescription for saving boys' futures. He believes that there is some good in every boy and that the good dominates the bad.

"We are dealing with human hearts and souls and qualities," said Judge Lindsey. "We ought to deal with a lad as a child is dealt with, and not a criminal. Give boys what they need—sympathy, assistance, encouragement and co-operation, and see what you get in return.

"Fathers and mothers in the home if they are wise will get the truth from the child taken in delinquency, for if a child gets by with a lie, in many cases, it is lost. Take them when they are young and mould their character while it is plastic and you make for better men and better citizenship."

Judge Lindsey divided the study of juvenile court work into three classes, each of which, he said, was closely allied with the other. He cited the physiological, the sociolgoical and the psychology of the boy's nature, each of which must be approached from an entirely different standpoint, but which are very closely linked together. Because of a total ignorance of these qualities, or perhaps because of an utter disregard for them, Judge Lindsey declared, 100,000 children go to the courts of the country every year, which in a generation makes more than 2,000,000 "kids," as he referred to them, who are up against hard propositions which they don't understand. These conditions are attributable to careless parents, political corruption, and the grinding of the mills of the wealthy, which he declared crushed hundreds of lives which might have become a valuable asset to the nation."

Once let the members of the New Jerusalem Church follow their gifted leader further than the actual words of his writings, now long stereotyped, may be able to carry them and they will see that the greatest honor we can pay to a spiritual pioneer is not to cling slavishly to the letter of the record he has left behind him but to go steadily forward along the line suggested by the obvious trend of his philosophy. If there be any spiritual revelation it must be progressive, and instead of stupidly claiming, as many shortsighted people do, that you must take a revelation in its entirety or else utterly reject it, we claim that all revelations, no matter of what nature, must be fearlessly and dispassionately examined in accordance with the wise injunction, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." The scientific spirit needs to prevail in religious as well as in all other circles. Nothing is too sacred for examination; no revelation can be final and none can be complete, because our capacities for acceptance and for comprehension are continually on the increase.

expressed the sincerest admiration and esteem for the hero of the occasion did not hesitate to call attention to his limitations while extolling his nobility of character and paying high tribute to the enormous value of his work. If some similar attitude were taken, by his admirers, toward Swedenborg, much good would undoubtedly be accomplished, and we should soon be able to assign to the gifted seer and sage of Scandinavia the place which rightfully belongs to him in his three-fold capacity of Scientist, Philosopher and Theologian. All who wish to estimate Swedenborg fairly, and to profit as much as possible from his immense literary output, should not confine themselves to his theological, but should make a study of his earlier scientific and philosophical writings also, for in these we can trace the gradual growth of his perceptions and watch, with much interest and profit, how he applies the universal law of correspondences to the entire field of nature, which he most industriously examined. Swedenborg's entire work will be far better comprehended, and his mission far more clearly understood, when some review of it in its entirety is undertaken by impartial and unprejudiced examiners. But these are usually difficult to find, because bias does exist, either for or against, to a large extent, even in the minds of men as widely comprehensive as Ralph Waldo Emerson, whose essay on Swedenborg is, to an extent, marred by his evident disrelish for any attempt to map out even a small portion of the unseen universe. Emerson's distinctive bias led him to eulogize Plato, almost extravagantly, while his review of Swedenborg suffered from the same cause. Many of Emerson's criticisms of Swedenborg's "heavens" are very just, but there is more to be said in favor of their naturalness than a man of Emerson's temperament would be likely to discover. It is quite true that, when describing domestic life in the spiritual world, Swedenborg's married angels do appear something like "country parsons and their wives," though on rather a glorified scale; but it is quite conceivable that Swedenborg was really intromited into just such a state in the spiritual universe, his clairvoyance enabling him to see exactly what he described and was in full sympathy with; and just because his ideals and aspirations concerning the hereafter were not quite the same as Emerson's, his own selected heaven would not be the same as that chosen by one whose tastes and feelings were in many respects unlike his own. By carrying out the dominant Swedenborgian theory of will and choice as ruling factors regulating our condition in the heavens, we can dispose of many difficulties which appear at first insuperable, and it must be with Swedenborg himself for guide that his own philosophy will yet be much more fully elucidated. Here we may rest our argument, at least for the immediate present. We all make our own spiritual conditions here and hereafter, and the same law works uniformly in all worlds and through all ages. In accordance with the strictest implications of this rational and orderly proposition, we can logically proceed to construct a sound, sane, and ever-widening philosophy.

CHAPTER XII.

THE BOOK OF EXODUS—ITS PRACTICAL AND ESOTERIC TEACHING.

When rapidly running through some of the contents of Genesis, we dwelt particularly upon those wonderful Type Men, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (transformed into Israel), and then Joseph,—a character of such rare beauty and comprehensive excellence that words fail utterly to do full justice to the magnificent ideal thus set before us. Turning now to Exodus, we find one majestic solitary figure towering in sublime moral magnificence far above all the rest, even Moses, the unrivaled prophet who to this day remains the grandest law-enforcer of whom we have any distinct record. In Genesis we are made acquainted with Egypt in the days of its ancient splendor, when the Pharaohs (Native Rulers) were just and honorable men and extended to Joseph, the representative Israelite, not only a cordial welcome but also assigned him the exalted station to which his extraordinary capabilities entirely entitled him. Then were the happy days when Egyptian and Israelite dwelt side by side in harmony, wisely co-operating for the general good. In those remote days it appears that Egypt had well-nigh perfectly solved some of those intricate industrial problems which are greatly vexing the world to-day. The Hebrews were originally a pastoral and agricultural people, while the Egyptians were given to arts and crafts; they were also navigators and chemists of a high degree of proficiency. Racial differences have always existed, and it is perfectly right that we should recognize them still, but difference rightly understood never implies discord; on the contrary, it constitutes the only basis for exquisite harmony. There could be unison but not harmony in song if all voices were of the same pitch and all singers sounded the same note; so is it with the great human chorus composed of the various races of humanity; they are properly distinct, but they never ought to appear discordant.

The Book of Exodus introduces us to a very different state of affairs, when it informs us that "another king arose who knew not Joseph"; a brief, comprehensive sentence containing in germ the entire history of the fatal progress of Egyptian degeneracy, resulting finally in that abject decadence which brought about the complete overthrow of the Pharoic dynasty, tragically described in the graphic account of the destruction of the Egyptian host in the Red Sea, while those who had been cruelly enslaved and maltreated by Egypt's degenerate rulers were making their escape from bondage and taking their first vigorous steps on the road to complete enfranchisement. It is in the midst of a degraded Egypt that the sublime figure of Moses rises into a position of conspicuous leadership. We know quite well that the character of Moses is far from perfect, but perfect characters are never discover-able among us; we all, even the greatest of us, have certain very definite moral and mental limitations, and were we to refuse to accord honor to a great leader because he exhibited some failings and frailties, we should be compelled to entirely abandon all that useful, because temperate and sagacious, hero-worship which, when kept within reasonable limits, is unquestionably a highly elevating factor in human development. The beautiful Bible story of Moses is full of picturesque detail, commencing with the Ark of Bulrushes in which he is found when an infant by an Egyptian princess, who takes the little Hebrew boy into her kindly charge and secures for him all the advantages which the highest culture of the day could afford. The Hebrew name Moshe means literally drawn up out of the water, and has no exclusive reference to the mere incident of a literal rescue from physical drowning at a time when the curse of anti-Semitism had invaded Egypt, to such an extent that drastic measures were employed for killing off in infancy multitudes of male Hebrews. The spiritual significance of the name Moshe denotes one whose consciousness has become elevated to a higher than the simply intellectual level; water signifying intellect esoterically. The life of Moses, which extended to 120 years, is divided into three periods of forty years each. The First Period is devoted to education; the Second to civil employment; the Third to seership. We are told in Exodus that Moses was fully eighty years of age when he turned aside at Horeb to behold that great sight, the bush burning with fire which, however, remained unconsumed. Though very beautiful poetic allusions have been made to this bush, as though it were a vegetable, by John Greenleaf Whittier, Theodore Parker, and other excellent modern writers, and their references are thoroughly well justified, we know that the original meaning of the bush is human nature itself. Moses was a veritable prince among anthropologists, and because of his intimate and profound acquaintance with human nature essentially, it is truly said that he beheld the Divine Similitude. In the thirteen articles of Jewish faith, compiled in the twelfth century of the present era by Moses Maimonides, we find the following saying: "There hath never risen yet in Israel a prophet like unto Moses; one who hath beheld his similitude." Taking these words in connection with the sublime sentences which precede and follow them, we are fully justified in connecting this statement with the declaration in the first chapter of Genesis that humanity is created in the Divine likeness, therefore those truly great prophets who have revealed Divine Law to humanity with special fulness and clearness, are simply those who have attained to a higher degree of spiritual development than the majority. Reverence for great men may be carried to an extreme, but there is surely no just reason for denying the self-evident fact that once in a while some especially illumined teacher does appear among us, never, properly, as an object of worship, but as a true and faithful guide to some fuller comprehension of the one living and true God whom all the prophets in Israel have most emphatically declared to be the only proper object of human adoration. Let "higher criticism" dispute over historical occurrences as it may, the sublimity of the moral law contained in the Book of Exodus can never suffer in the slightest degree by reason of anyone's alleged ignorance of the time and place of its original enunciation. The intrinsic value of the Ten Commandments is in no sense affected by any surrounding circumstances in ancient or modern days, and it is surely to the Mosaic type of man that the world is indebted for such clear and wonderful deliverances concerning courses of thought as well as action, necessary not only to the preservation of human society but to its continual elevation to ever higher and higher levels of attainment. Were the other nine commandments to be treated only as pertaining to outward conduct, the Tenth would always remain so thoroughly related to our most interior life of thought and feeling that its pure spirituality would ever constitute it a beacon light for human guidance, until the blessed time arrives when no commandments will be longer necessary, because a perfect love for goodness and truth will be so fully developed within us that we shall no longer need any external prohibition or exhortation. Moses may well be regarded as a truly great Adept and Initiate into those universal Mysteries which Theosophists and many others are now endeavoring to unveil and practically apply to existing human necessities. A people in bondage like Israel in Egypt may well be looked upon as representing a stage in human evolution prior to the awakening of spiritual consciousness. The Bible seems to tell us that people are very comfortable in servitude until a new love of liberty awakens within them; then they become restless and restive, and in the endeavor to shake off their bonds they always encounter trial from within and persecution from without. Such has ever been the history alike of individuals and of nations; thus the story of Exodus applies not only to deliverance from physical slavery, but, in a much higher sense, to spiritual emancipation. Whenever a great crisis is reached in the progress of a nation, some great deliverer arises wonderfully equipped to lead a multitude which could not lead itself; likewise whenever an individual reaches a similar crisis in interior development, some hitherto unknown intuition causes, at one and the same time, discontent with prevailing modes of life and a more or less distinct vision of some higher state attainable. We observe that Moses is the younger and Aaron the elder brother, but the Divine voice speaks to Moses and through Moses to Aaron, then through Aaron to the multitude. This statement agrees exactly with the pre-eminence of the younger Jacob over the elder Esau, and gives significance to a famous modern phrase, "That which is latest born is highest born." Here we can readily trace the complete foundation of the universal truth of involution and evolution, for no matter in what direction we turn for example and illustration, we find it invariably stated, in the most widely divergent treatises, that the lowest forms of existence appear earliest and the highest class come last of all. We talk very curiously about "olden times" when we mean earlier days; but just as we grow older from year to year, so must time grow older; this year is therefore the oldest year the earth has known, and as human beings are justly supposed to have been gathering experience through all the years which have passed, and to be therefore far maturer in judgment at seventy than at seventeen, so as the earth advances we have the right to expect that knowledge will continually increase, therefore the newest generation and the youngest individuals may be in very truth the oldest. Moses represents the intuitive man who sees everything through spiritual perception; he is therefore purely a prophet, while his elder brother Aaron has only that intellectual understanding which enables him to deal with those external matters which always pertain to the priestly office. As we follow the Book of Exodus from stage to stage, we find how naturally the author tells us that there comes a time when Aaron can be made to yield to the idolatrous wishes of the people while Moses is absent, but Moses remains relentless in his refusal to yield to any popular demand which his conviction cannot sanction. This has always been the great historical difference between prophet and priest, and it certainly exists manifestly at the present day. It is the superb courage, the dauntless moral bravery of Moses, which singles him out as a type of very much that is abidingly noblest in our common human nature, and it is not too much to claim that every true leader of a multitude must possess and exhibit, in unusually large degree, those prophetic qualities which cause their possessor to brave every possible danger and difficulty for the purpose of arriving at truth and emancipating, as far as possible, enslaved humanity. That very noble and intensely conscientious political economist, Henry George, whose writings deserve the deepest study, gave many a truly inspiring lecture on Moses, taking that heroic ancient prophet as a type of what a valiant leader in any age and anywhere should be. There must be no temporizing, no pandering to injustice, no seeking to curry favor with unrighteous monopolies for selfish ends, or through timidity, but firm, uncompromising adhesion to one's uttermost convictions of right, no matter at what cost to one's self or whether the very people in whose interest one is specially working recognize the good intentions of the one who seeks to deliver them or not. Without these qualities and qualifications there can be no such prophet as Moses in the modern, any more than there could have been in the ancient world.

The real prophet is so much more than one who simply foretells coming events that, though there may be some element of forecasting in a prophet's ministry, he is before all else a champion of liberty and an exhorter to righteousness.

The curious story of the plagues of Egypt offers food for thought along several distinctive lines, one of which is the nature of magic and the part it played in ancient Egypt and Israel. Nowhere do we find a clearer line of demarcation drawn between white magic and black, than in the trial of strength between Moses and Aaron on one hand and Pharaoh's court magicians on the other. Up to a certain point whatever Moses and Aaron could do, and did, the soothsayers readily duplicated, therefore there could be no victory for either side until the crucial test was made at the time when men and animals were alike suffering from painful and fatal diseases. The power to heal by magical means has been claimed for true prophets and their disciples in all lands and through all ages, and it has been quite reasonably maintained that no healing efficacy can possibly reside in the black magician's art, because he never works with a desire to benefit humanity, but, on the contrary, to unduly exalt himself and enslave others. We are quite ready to credit the statement in Exodus that while Moses and Aaron could and did perform beneficent works of healing, when the sorcerers attempted to do the same they only succeeded in enlarging the area of misery they were thus vainly attempting to reduce. Reason certainly compels us to decide that in order to accomplish any really beneficent work in the world, no matter by what means, we must have the love of humanity at heart; therefore it has always been justly claimed that power to heal resides only among holy prophets, never among those who, though genuine wonder-workers, producing marvellous phenomena through the performance of magical rites, are in no way actuated by any sincere desire to confer blessings on their neighbors.

The plagues of Egypt were of a startling nature, but they were not in themselves edifying, nor could they throw any light on the divine commission of Moses. They were doubtless due, in large measure, to the exercise of that strange hypnotic power about which we hear so much at present and which always greatly mystifies those who endeavor to rationally explain the wonders often performed in India in sight of European travelers by Hindu magicians. Turning a staff into a snake and a snake back into a staff may be altogether an illusory phenomenon, the spectators being temporarily affected by the mental power of the magician, and it may also be, as many Theosophists distinctly claim, that these wonder-workers have acquired through rigid self-training a control over Nature-Spirits which can be made to do their bidding. Causing the waters of the Nile to assume the semblance of blood, and also the mysterious production of quantities of locusts and other pests, would be well within the province of any sort of magician according to universal testimony regarding magic, but there would be nothing in all this to suggest any divine activity. When we come to the affliction of the beasts, many Jewish commentators have suggested that as certain animals were accounted sacred and unduly venerated in Egypt, the power exerted by Moses and Aaron to subject these creatures to affliction was intended as a convincing rebuke to prevailing idolatry, showing that the bull and other idolised animals were not able to protect themselves against attacks which might be made by men upon them; thereby proving that they were neither divinities nor under the special protection of divinities. Whatever we may think of that interpretation—and there is something to be said in favor of it—a clear moral issue is at stake only when we reach the point where the great prophets in Israel relieve the suffering alike of men and animals while their opponents can only increase distress. This is a very old and also a very new lesson, quite as much needed at the present moment as in any time of old, for we are witnessing to-day an almost overwhelming recrudescence of interest in everything avowedly magical, and especially in everything Egyptian, so much so that the weirdest and most fantastic tales have been very recently circulated concerning the dire catastrophes which have befallen impertinent persons who have behaved rudely to a painted mummy case, representing an Egyptian princess, in the British Museum.

We have no right ever to positively deny what we cannot definitely disprove, either on ethical or intellectual grounds; but we have a right to refrain from blindly endorsing almost incredible narratives, and particularly are we justified in discountenancing alarming beliefs concerning the powers of sorcery which, wherever entertained, can have no other effect than to weaken the nervous system and cloud the mind with dim forebodings of disaster. The plagues of Egypt must have had a highly salutary effect in two directions: First, they served to show exactly where a line can and must be drawn between beneficent and maleficent wonder-working; Second, they were instrumental in leading to the dethronement of tyranny and the gradual emancipation of an enslaved multitude.

Turning from an outer to an inner view of these strange records, a mystic commentary thereon will lead us to see in the Egyptians of the Book of Exodus all those, even at the present day, who, because dwelling in the night of ignorance and enslaving superstition themselves, are bent on doing all they can to hold others in captivity.

In the great mass of the Hebrews we may imagine

those who, though by no means as yet fully enlightened, are nevertheless awakening to a sense of their captivity and becoming filled with what we now often call divine discontent, are struggling to break their bonds. In Moses and Aaron (Moses especially) we behold the picture of those few who are so thoroughly consecrated to high ideals and so completely bent, no matter at what hazard to themselves, on carrying forward the glorious work of liberating the enslaved, that they do all and dare all to the utmost extent of their ability to accomplish the noble end to which they feel they have been called by the divine voice within them. The two great and serious problems of moral and industrial slavery need solution in modern Europe and America even as they needed solving in ancient Egypt, and we may well hope that there is to be found a modern as well as an ancient Horeb and Moses. The tragic overthrow of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea, presents in glowing imagery the inevitable disaster which must finally overtake all governments and monopolies which fight to maintain themselves at the expense of every humane consideration. We must not gloat over the sufferings of individuals, who physically perish in the days of some great revolution which results in the upward progress of humanity, but we may well triumph in the thought that cruelty and injustice invariably play a losing game, for, as Robert Browning beautifully expresses it, "God's in His heaven; all's right with the world." This magnificent truth so sublimely uttered and so constantly reiterated by all the world's greatest prophets and poets, should prove an anchor of refuge in every time of trial, no matter how severe our trials may be, by nerving us with that true optimism which can alone sustain us in times of affliction by enabling us to cling with unflinching faith to a doctrine of the universe which places Divinity at its center and destroys all belief in the ultimate triumph of inequity in any portion of it. There are two texts in the Book of Exodus, equally sublime, but adapted to diametically opposite human conditions, which we do well to so lay to heart that we may receive inspiration from them both in times of needed repose and in periods which call for instant and vigorous action. The first of these is, "Stand still and thou shalt see the salvation of God"; the second is, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." To understand the import of these two mighty sayings, we must take well into account the circumstances in which they both were uttered. The first came at a time when, if the people had stepped forward, they would have been instantly drowned, and had they gone backward they would have run into the swords of their pursuing enemies. The second applied to taking decisive action at such a period as we often call "the psychological moment." One lesson for us to learn is that sometimes there is nothing for us to do, and then it is that we require to summon all our energy to do nothing. No course to pursue is more difficult and no act is more heroic than to remain quite quiet in a time of panic, when people all around us are frenzied with excitement; and nothing again evinces more thoroughly developed intuition than to make a necessary move at exactly the right moment, and in exactly the way which will prove most permanently effective.

When the people went out of Egypt they carried with them all that was worth conveying away of the religious ideas and ceremonies and also of the social usages of the Egyptians. This is symbolically stated in the statement that they borrowed jewels of gold and silver and "spoiled" the Egyptian. In this single sentence we have a distinct clue to the influence of Egyptian upon Hebrew culture, and we have also a plain intimation that when the old Egyptian civilization came to an end all that was really valuable in it was carried forward to other lands and eventually became incorporated in the institutions of other countries. Figuratively speaking, again applying the story of Exodus to universal human development, we may well decide that nothing worthy of preservation can ever be really lost, though it may often change its outward form, and sometimes remain to a large extent buried (but never dead), to come to active life again when some new age begins to dawn in human history, and some new race is evolving to embody the excellences of the past coupled with new developments unknown in ancient epochs.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE STORY OF THE PASSOVER AND THE PILLAR OF FIRE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Quite a number of different versions have been given of the special lessons intended to be conveyed by the Plagues of Egypt. We have already referred to their magical character, and endeavored to show that they present a very clear distinction between white magic and black—i.e., between Occult Power exercised with beneficent intent in the one case, and for the purpose of working injury in the other. There is yet another reason given for the Plagues than that of showing the distinction between wonders wrought to assist in procuring liberty for the enslaved and similar wonders performed for the purpose of keeping serfs still in bondage, a demonstration of Divine power over the Egyptian Idols which the Ten Plagues specifically attacked. Miraculous or magical power was believed by the Egyptians to be in the possession of their idols, which they always regarded as far more than emblems or symbols; believing as they did that their divinities in some mysterious manner communicated with them through the agency of these images, and also in a very particular manner through the various living creatures which they held particularly sacred. Several writers have not hesitated to affirm that the Plagues were sent almost solely for the purpose of destroying faith in the various Egyptian divinities, a proposition to which we can well assent, provided we are convinced that thirty-five centuries ago the worship of these idols was intimately associated with the perpetuation of cruel slavery and many grossly immoral practices. There is no suggestion in the book of Exodus that the magicians of Egypt were devoid of power or that their performances were simply conjurors' tricks; but the very word conjuror meant originally one who could conjure or evoke certain unseen influences and compel them to do his bidding.

No objection need necessarily have been taken to any form of Nature worship, provided it had not been abused to the ends of human injury; but directly it had become thus perverted there was surely an excellent reason for protesting vigorously against it, and working wonders with the intent to demolish it. We must always keep steadily before us the one idea that whatever was done by Moses and Aaron had this sole object in view—the liberation of oppressed people from servitude. The first wonder destroyed confidence in the power of serpents which were very highly venerated in Egypt and in many other ancient countries, for we are told that Moses and Aaron could perfectly control them and cause them to appear and disappear at will. When man can show conclusively that these reptiles are completely subject to his sway, they can no longer be regarded as proper objects for human adoration, for it is self-evidently absurd to bow before inferior creatures which are subject to our will and cannot protect themselves against any assault we may make upon their alleged superiority. To pollute the waters of the Nile, the sacred river of the Egyptians, was to prove that their river deities were unable to protect the stream against the assaults made upon it by those greatest of wonder-workers, Moses and Aaron, who spoke in the name of a far more powerful Deity. We cannot suppose that any people could be at once led to acknowledge One Only Supreme Being, but they could quite easily be induced to admit through the agency of manifest marvels that the Divinity worshiped by the Hebrews was an altogether superior being to their own local divinities; and for the purpose of the Exodus it was clearly necessary to establish in the mind of Pharoah and his generals that the divinity worshiped by the Israelites had greater power than the many gods and goddesses to whom the Egyptians in general were accustomed to render homage. The plague of frogs was directed against an Egyptian god who was supposed to regard these unclean creatures as peculiarly sacred, and no sooner did frogs become a definite nuisance to the Egyptians than they ceased to venerate them, and were thus rescued from that particular phase of idolatry. No greater mistake could well be made historically or otherwise than to suppose that only Hebrews were liberated at the time of Passover, for the narrative in Exodus distinctly informs us that a mixed multitude went out of Egypt. The Egyptians as a nation were not drowned in the Red Sea, but only Pharoah's pursuing army who had set forth with the one intention of dragging back into slavery those who were just escaping by way of the Red Sea passage. The various plagues, therefore, were intended to enlighten, not to curse, the Egyptians, though it is said to have come to pass that those who refused to give heed to salutary warnings were overthrown in a time of widespread calamity. The presence of various obnoxious insects in sacred temples as well as in secular houses served to desecrate all those places, and it had long been commonly believed that no insect regarded as unclean could possibly invade an Egyptian sanctuary. That old tradition may well have taken its rise in very ancient times when the priesthood was pure and noble, and did actually possess some real ability to consecrate buildings and sacred vessels as well as to sanctify its own religious vestments, but that time had long passed, and the priesthood of the days of Exodus had become, for the most part, so corrupt that no real sanctity could possibly attach to it or to its ministrations. The subject of the power to consecrate is very finely treated by Annie Besant in "The Changing World," particularly in the section headed "The Sacramental Life," in which she furnishes a large amount of information concerning "Words of Power," to which she attributes the very results in these days which have been claimed for them from time immemorial. So very much, according to this view depends upon the consecrator that no object can be consecrated simply by the celebration of a rite or the employment of a formula; it takes a holy man or woman to perform a holy act; the simple fact of one's being a nominal priest or priestess confers no genuine grace or power. Just as in India a mantra can only be successfully used by a holy person who speaks the right syllables in exactly the right manner, so can we readily discover by observing contemporary mental therapeutic practice that while nothing is easier than to learn a set of formulas and repeat them by rote, the actual efficacy of this mode of treatment depends far more upon the man or woman who makes use of it than upon the formula itself, though it may also be fairly claimed that there is a suggestive value in certain formulated sentences quite apart from the special condition of the individual who employs them. Again and again we are told in Exodus that Moses and Aaron gave credentials of their divine commission by healing the afflicted, a work which Pharoah's magicians utterly failed in accomplishing whenever they undertook it; it was not therefore the production of the Plagues, but their removal, which proved that Moses and Aaron were on the righteous side while their opponents were the servants of unrighteousness. Nothing could well be more odious than to believe that anybody at any time displayed delegated divine authority by producing plagues or causing pestilence, but when we have learned that though that work can be quite successfully performed by black magicians, the power to remove plagues testifies some degree of divine authority the case is entirely different, and by no means irrational or incredible. We are told that the magicians, when they witnessed the power of Moses and Aaron accomplishing wonders far beyond their own power to duplicate, exclaimed, "This is indeed the finger of God," an expression which clearly shows that they were amenable to reasonable conviction and did not hesitate to confess their inferiority when such was clearly demonstrated. There was in Egypt at that time a singular belief in a divinity who presided over flies, and indeed every creature mentioned in the story of the Plagues was in some way connected with prevailing idolatry. It was, however, only after the slaying of the first-born sons that Pharoah is said to have become so terrified that he not only let the people go, but urged the captives to depart with utmost haste, lest even greater calamities should fall upon him and his subjects. This terrible ordeal through which the Egyptians had to pass suggests the outworking of the Law of Karma, which metes out exact justice in the long run to every individual and to every nation. This slaying of the first-born of the Egyptians may be regarded as the fruitage of the previous slaying of the male children of the Hebrews by command of an earlier Pharoah. What we do to others we often unknowingly and unwittingly do to ourselves; for all evil thoughts, words and deeds directed against others are like boomerangs: they strike back the individual who throws them out. Herein lies the open secret of the much-maligned but ever true law of retaliation, expressed in the famous sentence, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." This is the law of the universe, and no one can ever evade its operation; but it is a beneficent law, and when rightly interpreted impresses us deeply with a sense of divine equity, but conveys no thought of vengeance, for we need the discipline of suffering ourselves if we have caused others to suffer. There is something actually sublime in that great phrase of Emerson's, "No one can do me an injury but myself," which clearly means that we are never really hurt by any opposition from without, but only by deterioration from within. Knowing that a great many Christians entirely misconceive the law of retaliation and believe that the New Testament condemns it, we hope they will soon come to understand it rightly, and they will when they see that it is at no point in conflict with the Golden Rule which beautifully advises us to do unto others only and exactly what we wish others to do unto us. No great teacher ever instructed his disciples to knock out their neighbors' teeth and pluck out their eyes, but all great teachers have urged upon their students the necessity for just and kindly conduct in all the relationships of life; consequently, if Christians obey the Golden Rule they will not find the Jewish law working against them in any particular, even though it be carried out in its minutest detail. We do not mean to say that all Jewish legislation, any more than all Christian legislation, has been either just or merciful, but we are not now endeavoring to deal with the particular acts of certain individuals, but only with the broad outlines of a code of morals set forth in the Pentateuch. In the literal enforcement of equitable law we must always be compelled to make the utmost compensation or restitution in our power for all injuries we have inflicted on others; but this certainly does not mean that others are to perform upon us the same ferocious acts that we have performed on our neighbors, for no good end would probably be served by that kind of savage retaliation. There can be no real justification for inflicting any penalty on anyone except with some benevolent end in view; but as different people are reached by different methods, adapted to their varying stages of moral and mental development, seemingly harsh measures are often kind in reality, while very lenient ones are frequently ineffective. We must, however, be very careful, if ever we feel disposed to take the law into our own hands, for we are wisely told in the Bible that retribution belongs to God, and all matters will be adjusted equitably through the outworking of an unchanging universal law with which we must simply endeavor to place ourselves in harmony. We should do all in our power to discourage any form of gloating over the discomfiture of our personal antagonists, and if we celebrate the Passover in any helpful manner, we must rejoice only in a commemoration of human liberation from slavery and think of the means provided to accomplish this noble end merely as those best suited to a bygone age in a distant country. The lesson of the Passover itself is universal and perpetually enduring, even in the case of curious ceremonial details, such as the eating of bitter herbs and unleavened bread, which have a far deeper significance when viewed esoterically than any mere remembrance of a hurried flight from Egypt on a certain eventful night between three and four thousand years ago.

Even the curious traditional songs sung in Jewish homes on Pesach Eve are replete with deep interior meaning, though such curious specimens as

"One Only Kid" may well be classed with fables and folk-songs in general. Children always love songs, fables, parables and all kinds of object lessons, and they grasp what there are intended to teach far more readily than they learn by the less attractive methods employed by teachers who exclude symbols from their curriculum. "One Only Kid" is a fair specimen of ancient combinations of allegory and anecdote. The main object of the song is to demonstrate the instability of all mortal things and the sole permanence of Deity and of God's unchanging law. The child sings at time of Passover celebration of his father's buying a kid, which was eaten by a cat (originally some large member of the feline family was indicated). Now the cat was a very sacred animal in ancient Egypt; so sacred was it held that cats mummied thousands of years ago are yet in a good state of preservation in the British Museum. But after the cat had slain the kid, a dog came and bit the cat. Now the dog was held sacred in Babylonia and Assyria, to which power Egypt was rendered tributary after the Israelitish exodus. History is therefore taught in the quaint old melody as well as religion. The dog in turn is beaten with a stick, which is emblematical of Persia, where it was a type of the strictest possible administration of justice, as we learn from the Zend-Avesta. Then a fire burns the stick, and this is said to represent the conquest of Persia by Alexander of Macedonia, who rushed forth like a devouring flame, and in less than seven years completely overthrew Persian supremacy. The fire now is quenched by water, which typifies the Roman power which swept like a flood over the major portion of the then known world. Eventually an ox appears, and drinks up the water which had quenched the fire, and this is looked upon as an emblem of Moslem rule. But the ox meets its fate at the hands of a butcher, who is said to signify the Crusaders who as relentlessly attacked the Mohammedans as they had attacked those whom they had previously conquered. But there comes a time when the butcher must fall before the sword of the Angel of Death, who will ultimately remove all strife from the earth and usher in the glorious age of universal peace foretold by all the greatest of the prophets of all climes and ages. The Holy One (Blessed be He) slays the Angel of Death who has removed the butcher who slew the ox which drank the water that quenched the fire that burnt the stick which beat the dog that bit the cat that ate the kid. Finally the prophets assure us all wars will cease and this planet will reach the zenith of its perfection and become the abode of only holy and happy multitudes. Such is the predicted end of the world, for by end is meant object in view. To what end are you working? is a familiar inquiry. Wisely indeed does John Uri Lloyd, in his wonderful romance, "Etidorhpa" (Aphrodite spelled backward), represent a radiant maiden appearing to a venerable man who had undergone the weirdest imaginable experiences, and saying to him, "I am the end of the world," a highly significant sentence, meaning that the object of all terrestrial experience is to bring forth perfected humanity, which must be the only sane and satisfactory solution of our planet's tragic history.

The Pillar of Fire which went before the children of Israel during their forty years' march through the wilderness between Egypt and Palestine, has been accounted for literally by some modern students on the basis of discoveries in the vicinity of Mount Sinai in Arabia, pointing to the volcanic character of the district. A simply materialistic version of the fire by night and cloud by day is that the crater of the volcano furnished exactly such phenomena. Be this as it may, and the suggestion is quite credible, the esoteric meaning of the narrative is in no way impaired by any physical discoveries. Natural facts have all a spiritual origin, and they are always made use of illustratively in all the sacred literature of the entire world. The inner meaning of all spiritual allegories must have reference to continuous human experiences, therefore let us be ready to endorse whatever material science may reveal concerning outward phenomena, and at the same time search diligently for those deeper truths of human experience which relate us with the usually unseen, but by no means permanently unknowable spiritual universe.

We should have to write volumes, not chapters, did we attempt, even in outline, to review and comment upon the many thrilling incidents we have left untouched in this brief mention of the Book of Exodus. Among the most powerfully suggestive are the stories of Quails and Manna and the fashioning and destroying of the Golden Calf. The story of food supplies is an intensely profitable topic on which to meditate, for the heaven-sent manna suggests an explanation of the nature of evil so lucid and comprehensive that he who runs may clearly read. Provision for human necessities comes sweet and wholesome from heaven to earth, typifying all human faculties and all natural and proper means for sustaining our exterior existence; but if we do not make a right use of faculties and opportunities, and moreover if we do not use these at the proper time as well as in the right way, they become perverted, unwholesome and offensive. If we are gluttonous and over-eat of the good food provided, we are made seriously ill by "quail," when we could be healthily sustained by "manna." All things are good in their right place and time; perversion, excess and misappropriation are the sole causes of the many miseries we bemoan. In the absense of Moses (who denotes intuition and spiritual guidance in general), and when only Aaron (who signifies unillumined intellect) is leading us, we are sorely apt to revert instead of to advance, and to require a material idol, like an image of the Egyptian Apis, to adore instead of trusting in the true spiritual Divinity. The nations to be exterminated before we can enter our Land of Promise figuratively denote all dispositions and practices which are called in the New Testament "fleshly lusts which war against the soul." We must all accomplish our own individual as well as our collective exodus, which is naught else, in its last analysis, than complete freedom attained from all kinds of servitude, through strict adhesion to the voice of the Divine within, obedience to which can alone secure complete emancipation from every phase of thraldom which yet embarrasses the human race.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE MESSAGE OF BUDDHISM—PURITY AND PHILANTHROPY.

There is a great fascination attaching to the name of Gautama, the Buddha, almost all over the world to-day: partly on account of the wide reading of Sir Edwin Arnold's extremely beautiful poem, "The Light of Asia," and partly by reason of the extremely widespreading interest in a general study of Comparative Religion. To some minds Buddhism appeals as a system of philanthropic philosophy, not properly religious, because it appears that there are no definitely theological elements in the system as originally taught and promulgated, but as definitions of religion are many and varied, and as several hundred millions of our fellow human beings accept it as their religion, and declare that they take refuge in Buddha as confidently as the devoutest Christians take refuge in Christ, Buddhism may fairly rank, not only as a religion, but as one of the great religions of the world. James Freeman Clarke, in his splendid treatise, "Ten Great Religions," has styled Buddhism the Protestantism of the East, though from its present ceremonial aspects it far more closely resembles Catholicism. It differs radically from Brahminism in its repudiation of caste and by its insistence upon a philanthropic life, regardless of ritual observances. Though recently readmitted into India, for many centuries Buddhists were forced to live outside the land which gave their religion birth, and it was in Ceylon and in Thibet that the two great divisions of the Buddhist faith found their representative respective homes. Northern Buddhism is distinctly Theistic, consequently it cannot be pessimistic, for Theism and Pessimism are diametrically opposed; but Southern Buddhism has been accounted atheistic and also pessimistic. We incline to another view of Buddhistic teaching in its entirety from that taken by those who make these claims concerning even a section of it. The character of the traditional Buddha, Prince Gautama, is extremely beautiful, though it is by no means perfect in all regards. About 600 B. C. this prince was born in India, at a time when mighty teachers were about to stir the world in many districts. Old legends state that the birth of the child who was to become a Buddha was heralded by many wondrous signs, such as are traditionally associated with the advent of all great spiritual leaders. One testimony is that certain eminent astrologers declared that the infant prince would either become a singularly powerful earthly monarch or else renounce the world and become the Buddha he became, the choice being in his own will. His father earnestly desired that he should take the regal earthly pathway and did his utmost to further that ambitious end, but from very early years the boy showed indifference to worldly honors, and began to evince extreme solicitude for the downtrodden and afflicted wherever he beheld them. All in vain did the king make efforts to keep all sight of human distress beyond the sight of his youthful son; the boy could not be effectually shielded from the vision of prevailing misery, and it is related in many an Indian tale that if his father's orders were strictly observed, so that no pitiable spectacle of misery could reach the lad's outward gaze, the Devas would present to him pictures of distress, the contemplation of which, though only saddening him at first, soon aroused within him an unconquerable determination to break away from royal restraints and plunge into the vortex of suffering humanity to discover the cause for such harrowing phenomena. At the early age of sixteen the young prince was married to a charming princess, to whom he was devotedly attached, and his life in general was one spent in the midst of all procurable mental and physical delights.

But nothing could silence the distress which increased within him whenever he mentally contrasted his own luxurious lot with the wretched portion of multitudes of others who apparently deserved as well at the hands of the universe as he. Unrest increased within him to such an extent that he could enjoy nothing while he felt that others were suffering whom possibly he might relieve. It was with that sentiment his incipient Buddhahood began to dawn, and it was that same emotion which led him to renounce every delight in life and to go forth on the serious quest for knowledge regarding the source of human misery which no splendor and no personal affection could induce him to ignore.

It was in the very earliest stages of his career that this ardent lover of afflicted humanity inclined toward pessimism, and it is never an occasion for surprise when the young and tender-hearted give way to feelings akin to despair on their first introduction to sorrow and death, which are always heartrending spectacles until we have learned to regard them with philosophic calm and as not ultimately irreconcilable with Divine beneficence. Grief and death as ends in themselves never can be thus reconciled, but as factors in evolution they come to be seen as transmutable into very decided blessings; and as Gautama proceeded along his upward spiritual journey he not only apprehended that glorious truth, he taught it with joyful enthusiasm to all disciples who would accept it.

In his early hermit days he followed the rigidly ascetic path which gave him discipline but could not bring him joy. No satisfaction could he win from the teachings of the ascetics with whom he consorted; he could only learn the lesson pointed out by the author of Ecclesiastes, that from the standpoint, first of the sensualist and then of the intellectualist, whose eyes have not yet been opened to discern spiritual realities, "all is vanity and vexation of spirit." Teachers of conventional religion could recommend fastings and all manner of austerities, and these the growing Buddha tried, but they could not yield him peace, nor could they answer the mighty question, the true reply to which he was determined in some manner to obtain. It is recorded that he lived a domestic life for thirteen years, for his age is given as twenty-nine when he took the decisive step and broke away from family ties to enter upon a mission to the suffering of the world. Much might be said pro and con as to the value of the example hereby set, and it would need considerable caution to handle this episode judiciously and helpfully. Certainly this was no case of desertion or of leaving a family unprovided for, because a palace remained the home for wife and child, while the husband and father was out on his pilgrim mission. Oftentimes we hear men eulogized for going to the battlefield, and it is by no means uncommon for patriotic wives, regardless of the greatest personal suffering, to rejoice in the valor of their husbands; surely then, if warfare can supply sufficient reason for leaving home and kindred, the consciousness of a mighty spiritual mission may be urged with even greater earnestness. There is always something intensely noble in the spirit which prompts to voluntary self-sacrifice for good of others, though there is something mean and contemptible in that hysterical thought about one's personal salvation which has prompted many to seek refuge from the world in convents and monasteries, lest they should suffer individual contamination by associating with unrighteousness. Whenever there is an apparent conflict between a lesser and a larger work, it is always heroic to choose the larger, especially when that choice involves relinquishment of domestic joys and other legitimate pleasures which are standing in the way of the fulfilment of a larger ministry. Gautama soon began to teach that every man must work out his own salvation; there is no place for any vicarious atonement in his system. But how is salvation to be worked out? That is the vital question. The Buddha's doctrine of the Way of Enlightenment differed widely from the inculcations of the Brahmin priests, for as he discovered truth by delving into the inmost recesses of his own being, so did he counsel his disciples to do the same. Concerning the Ultimate Reality he never dogmatized, but he declared when one reached the state of Buddhahood he perceived it without speculation. Between Nirvana and Para-Nirvana, enlightened Buddhists make a great distinction, Nirvana being a condition of rest and peace, while Para-Nirvana signifies a state of realization of Divine Unity beyond the power of language to describe. The general philosophy of Buddhism is summed up in the teaching concerning the four Great Truths, which are: Concerning Suffering; Concerning the Source of Suffering; Concerning Cessation of Suffering; Concerning the Way that Leads to Release from Suffering. Suffering is due to attachment to the illusions of the mortal plane; therefore deliverance from pain can only be accomplished by the transference of our affections from the transitory to the permanent. Instruction on this theme carries us far along a most important pathway, but is a road we need to tread very cautiously, lest we mistake callousness for spirituality. Against this danger Mrs. Besant has warned her readers very clearly, and it would be well for all who show a tendency to confound indifference to human affection with hopeful signs of spiritual development to read very thoughtfully the excellent counsels and warnings given by this representative Theosophist, whose appreciation of the excellences of Oriental philosophy is unsurpassed in any direction. There can be no real emancipation from suffering until we can no longer derive benefit from its continuance. The only sane and sensible view to take of suffering is that it is a corrective and educational experience, entirely good and indeed altogether necessary, so long as we can only learn certain needed lessons through its agency, then not only superfluous, but actually impossible when we have outgrown conditions in the midst of which it can serve a useful purpose. This is the teaching of the entire book of Job, a magnificent poem, dramatically portraying the uses of affliction and calculated to inspire the studious reader with a sense of profound gratitude for the ministry of those painful experiences which lead up to a blissful knowledge of truth otherwise unattainable. To call Buddhism pessimistic is almost as absurd as to call Judaism pessimistic, because individual Jews may appear to be pessimists; yet the parrot cry is raised continually that Buddhists are all pessimists, and seek a substitute for bliss in the oblivion of annihilation. The Buddhist Church has indeed become so largely formalistic that ritual observances, to which its alleged founder attached no importance whatever, have been allowed to obscure the pure ethical teachings of the greatly unfolded soul on whose doctrine the institution professes to be founded, and it is always possible for doubt and pessimism to grow and thrive where only ceremonoy and tradition are insisted on. The doctrine of Karma, to which Buddhists all adhere, is an optimistic view of ultimate attainment

when rightly comprehended. The source of suffering is in the illusory belief, with which we are all to some degree tinctured, that the outward shapes of things are the only realities, therefore we cling frantically to those transitory vehicles of the spirit, and suffer bitterly when they are disintegrated. If it be asked why humanity falls into this illusion, an answer is readily forthcoming—viz., that as we need our outward bodies temporarily, and we should not be likely to preserve them if we did not value them, the over-estimate we place upon them is simply an exaggeration of their importance. It is not by steeling ourselves against affection and becoming anchorites that we can tread Buddha's eight-fold path to blessedness, but by learning to see things in due relative proportion and find this abiding entity, though the mortal sheath may disappear. Suffering ceases when we have outgrown all desire for separated existence, but we have no right to infer from this that there is no individual immortality; rather can we behold a glorious vision of life immortal when all entities composing our humanity are so perfectly united in mutual love that they constitute an indivisible unity. "Kill out the sense of separateness," exhorts Mabel Collins, in "Light on the Path," which is a paradoxical presentation of Buddhistic doctrine. Separateness does not mean individual distinctness, but mutual antagonism, and just so long as the slightest vestige of antagonistic feeling remains in any consciousness, the possessor thereof has not yet attained the bliss of the condition called Nirvana, which we are assured the Buddha reached before he quitted his mortal em-

sions. Propositions were therefore made that Christianity be carefully examined with a view to testing its adaptability to the religious needs of Japan, when straightway appeared about thirty distinct varieties of Christianity, each one put forward by its advocates as the nearest to the original Gospel of Jesus. What effect could so bewildering an array of rival Christianities have on the examiners but to cause them to decide that their own Shintoism was far less confusing, and though it might not be ideal, it was at any rate better adapted to Japan than such a bewildering array of competing denominations. Now if there are so many varieties of Christianity after nineteen centuries since its primitive inception. it is not surprising that in the course of about twenty-five centuries different phases of Buddhism have appeared, each sect or party claiming to give the truest and completest version of Gautama's original enunciations; but on that account we have no right to discard what we can clearly see is "wheat," because we refuse to endorse the "tare" which has sprung up in the same field with it. Institutionalized Buddhism is not the Buddha's simple doctrine unalloyed with foreign elements, but all the established systems do contain very much that is worthy of a great world-enlightener, together with much that is conspicuously unworthy. In the Christian world we can trace the form of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy to the Roman Empire, and in Presbyterianism we can see the plan of the Roman Republic. No great spiritual teacher ever surrounded himself with the pomp and circumstance of a regal court, and in the case of the Buddha all accounts declare that though he was born into it he voluntarily renounced it. It is quite possible to carry out ceremonies in the name of one who cared nothing about them, provided he did not expressly forbid them, but to claim that he established them is sheer imposture which may delude the ignorant but can never deceive the educated. It is always the "letter" which killeth while the "spirit" giveth life, and yet it seems impossible to clothe any spirit without some letter. Organized Buddhism has erred exactly where all other systems have erred—viz., in over-emphasizing non-essentials, until with the lapse of ages the garments have come to be so highly prized that the original wearer has been quite obscured by such massive drapery and such heavy veils. Buddhism to-day is emerging from its long captivity and will soon present a smiling face to the world, no longer shrouded with the veils of cumbersome unnecessary ritual observances, and no longer exploited by ignorant and oppressive priests.

Nowhere in modern literature have we such a complete and beautiful setting forth of the essence of Buddhism as in Sir Edwin Arnold's poem, "The Light of Asia," which, though composed by a patriotic Englishman, received unqualified endorsement at the hands of the High Priest of Buddhism in Ceylon. Dr. J. M. Peebles and other distinguished American travelers have met with cordial welcome in that lovely island where, at Colombo, there has long been established a Buddhist School for Girls, under the kindly auspices of the Theosophical Society, where English women teach Cingalese maidens much that is highly useful and quite in harmony with the ancient Buddhistic faith.

It may seem strange to some that British women should engage in such a work, but it is one of great utility and calculated to accomplish a widely beneficent end. India and Ceylon are parts of the British Empire, therefore it is the plain duty of enlightened British people to do their utmost to bring about good-fellowship between the native populations and the British. Instead of endeavoring to take from them their ancestral faith and bid them scorn it as a "heathen abomination," it is the clear duty of those whose "souls are lighted with wisdom from on high" to so walk in the light of that wisdom as to hasten the dawning of that glorious new morning when in the sunlight of a larger knowledge of truth the several nations of the earth shall see their way to righteous federation. There can be a fraternity of religious systems, each one purified from the excresent accretions which have long concealed much, though never the whole of its indwelling excellences. Buddhism makes a brave showing when restored to its original simplicity, and the heroic figure of Guatama stands forth as one who loved all forms of life and found an expression of Divinity in everything. "Cosmic Consciousness" is a favorite phrase with many people to-day, and it is to the life and teachings of the Buddha that we may well turn for a beautiful historical example of it. With the iron rules of Caste a lover of the entire human race can have no sympthy, especially when such rules are applied to serve the ends of oppression and result in ignoring individual worth, while slavishly bowing before inherited position. It was the special glory of Gautama that he taught his country people the essential truths contained in their beautiful historic Vedas, which are full of exquisite spiritual teaching, fundamentally at variance with the religious tyranny established in India against which the Buddha's most vigorous protest was made. We may sum up the essential teachings of the purest forms of Buddhism in two splendid words — Philanthropy and Purity — the same two majestic substantives which Canon Hensley Henson of Westminster employed in a noble sermon which he preached on Trinity Sunday, 1907, in St. Margaret's, Westminster, when he summarised the essentials of universal religion in exposition of the famous text from the Epistle of James, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Not a hint here of any belief in any dogma as necessary to salvation. But this we are told is a Christian saying. Let it be so; it is also in strict accord with original Buddhism, and may well form a link between sincere and spiritually-minded people adhering to either cult or creed.

CHAPTER XV.

MAGIC IN EUROPE IN THE MIDDLE AGES—ITS CONNECTION WITH MYSTERIOUS HEALING AND MARVELLOUS DELIVERANCES.

Though Judaism is, on the whole, a distinctively Theistic and Ethical Religion, comparatively little given to either Mysticism or Magic, there have been many notable instances of thoroughly respectable and noble-minded Jews, among whom are to be found some distinguished Rabbis, who have practised magical arts and taught them to a few carefully selected disciples. There are numberless passages in the Old Testament which contain ferocious denunciations of Babylonian sorcery and witchcraft, as we have endeavored to show in other sections of this volume; but the aim of these denunciations was to entirely discountenance all dabbling in vicious psychic practises which had for their object the working of some sort of injury. Laws against witchcraft, which are not yet entirely erased from modern statute books, were originally intended to inflict severe penalties upon all who sought by magical means to endanger the safety of individuals, or to work harm upon a community by attempting to blight the harvest, poison the wells, or in some other manner work grievous injury upon a community. Obviously such laws were not directed against any who sought to practise a White Art, which had for its sole objects healing the sick and in other ways conferring blessings upon humanity; but as neither priests nor legislators always knew just where to draw the line between White and Black Magic, and moreover as charges of witchcraft, brought often against unpopular but entirely innocent persons, served to divert attention from the real culprits when offences had actually been committed, legislation against witchcraft very often defeated, rather than served, the ends of justice. It also encouraged many degrading superstitions which retarded the progress of sanitary science, while it engendered and fostered that very state of dread of some malign influence at work against us, which is one of the most deterrent influences which can possibly be set in motion when a patient is nervously unstrung and needs confidence in Divine, not diabolical, agency, to help him to recovery.

The great beauty of Judaism, as a religious system, is that it requires no belief in devils on the part of its adherents, but rather discountenances than encourages such belief; at the same time Jews, as a community, have seldom been entirely free from some dread of evil spirits, though the fundamental teachings of Judaism are quite at variance with any doctrine of evil spirits such as orthodox Christianity still foists upon the world and which, in a modified form, many Spiritualists and Occultists still engender.

One of the most curious and interesting literary examples of Jewish belief in Magic is to be found in a treatise entitled "The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin the Mage, as delivered by Abraham the Jew unto His Son Lamech." A translation from the original Hebrew into French, contained in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris, has been rendered into English by S. L. MacGregor-Mathers, whose works on Rosicrucianism and other mysterious and unusual themes are of great interest to those who desire to step aside from the beaten paths of literature and stray into weird and fascinating byways. The English translator of this curious MS., which goes back, in the original, to 1458, declares that Bulwer Lytton and Eliphas Lèvi were acquainted with this MS., which contains much material from which such a story as Lytton's "Zanoni" might easily have been embellished. The treatise is divided into three books, the first of which deals principally with the travels of the author, which were quite extensive and brought him into close association with many highly placed and well-distinguished personages. The second book is filled with matter pertaining to Ceremonial Magic, which, like all treatises of this sort, arouses much more curiosity than it satisfies. It is excellent reading for any who want to know exactly what the best type of Mediæval Magicians really believed, and how they set to work to accomplish their mysterious performances, and it has the great advantage of containing a large amount of excellent moral counsel, to the effect that all who engage in such occult undertakings must do so with a full sense of the grave responsibilities they are assuming, and always with righteous ends in view. The third book describes enchantments of various kinds, some of which enter upon the field of necromancy, and prove that it was actually believed that within the space of seven years after death it was possible to induce the departed spirit to temporarily reanimate the discarded physical frame, if that had been preserved through the interim. It is quite clear that the noblest among magicians declared that such a feat should never be attempted except in cases of extreme gravity, and only where it was highly important to gain information directly from the departed spirit; but happily for the world of to-day, those most absorbed in Spiritualism are seeking only to get in touch with their departed friends by employing methods which have no connection with the arts of necromancy.

Evil spirits are said to be rightly obedient to the will of the trained magician, who puts them to work as servitors, but if he loses self-control or permits himself to misuse magic for base ends, he then becomes subject to the dark forces, who cause him much suffering as well as inconvenience. There can hardly be any doubt that much good has often been accomplished in connection with the better kinds of magic, particularly in the wide domain of therapeutic practise, where we know the influence of ideas and suggestions over physical conditions is inestimably great.

It is recorded that this magical Abraham healed a multitude of disorders of many varieties, including leprosy. There is nothing incredible or irrational in this statement, for there is no reason why any disease should be looked upon as essentially incurable. On this whole subject of seemingly miraculous healing the popular mind needs a great deal of setting straight, and we see many signs of promise that popular fallacies are soon to be dispelled by the appearance on the scene of practical activity of a large number of well-equipped mental practitioners, who will give rational accounts of their ministry and thereby deliver the topic of Suggestive practise from the many phantasies which still surround it. Ceremonies carry great weight with many people, who seem as yet quite unable to grasp the simpler and directer teachings of Psycho-Therapy. From five to six centuries ago the masses were far less acquainted with the rudiments of rational psychology than they are to-day, and had it not been for the incantations of wonder-workers on their behalf, many a sufferer would have remained incurable, incurability being an entirely relative term. A case may be quite incurable in one set of circumstances and readily cured when the patient is transferred to different surroundings. Change of mental attitude is the prime essential in nearly every malady, and there are indeed no cases of any sort where faith and hope and courage are not extremely valuable helpers. Is is said that as many as 8,413 persons were healed through the agency of the magician whose work we are now considering, and it is highly important to note exactly the position taken by the healer concerning the nature of his ministry. Abraham was born in 1362; his age was therefore forty-eight in 1410, when he calls himself ninety-six, in consequence of a curious reckoning which makes a magical year only six months in length. Abraham teaches that the best years of a man's life for the practise of ceremonial magic are from twenty-five to fifty, probably because he had discovered that, on an average, the mental and physical faculties are simultaneously most active during that period, though there are many undisputed instances of great mental and physical vigor appearing in combination much before the age of twenty-five and very long after fifty. The following quotation is very explicit in showing how magicians have claimed to be able to secure for their clients the efficient services of unseen servitors, and though we may incline to attach far more importance to the patient's own mental attitude than to magical rites per se, we cannot deny that there may be serving spirits ready to obey the will of a magical director, much as nurses stand ever ready to obey the instructions of doctors under whom they are working and in whose skill and wisdom they have confidence.

"Up till now I have healed of persons of all conditions, bewitched unto death, no less than 8,413, and belonging to all religions, without making an exception in any case. I gave unto mine Emperor Sigismond, a very clement prince, a Familiar Spirit of the Second Hierarchy, even as he commanded me, and he availed himself of its services with prudence. He wished also to possess the secret of the whole operation, but as I was warned by the Lord that it was not His will, he contented himself with what was permitted, not as Emperor, but as a private person; and I even by means of my art facilitated his marriage with his wife; and

I caused him to overcome the great difficulties which opposed his marriage. I delivered also the Count Frederick by the means of 2,000 artificial cavalry (the which I by mine art caused to appear according unto the tenor of the twenty-ninth chapter of the Third Book here following), free out of the hands of the Duke Leopold of Saxonia, the which Count Frederick without me would have lost both his own life and his estate as well (which latter would not have descended unto his heirs).

"Unto the Bishop of our City also, I showed the betrayal of his government at Orembergh, one year before the same occurred; and I say no more concerning this because he is an Eccesiastic, passing over in silence all that I have further done to render him service.

"The Count of Varvich was delivered by me from prison in England the night before he was to have been beheaded.

"I aided the flight of the Duke and of his Pope John, from the Council of Constance, who would otherwise have fallen into the hands of the enraged Emperor M; and the latter having asked me to predict unto him which one of the two Popes, John XXIII and Martin V, should gain in the end, my prophecy was verified; that fortune befalling which I had predicted unto him at Ratisbon. At the time when I was lodged at the house of the Duke of Bavaria, for matters of the greatest importance, the door of my room was forced, and I had the value of 83,000 Hungarian pieces stolen from me in jewels and money. As soon as I returned, the thief (although he was a Bishop) was forced to himself bring it back to me in person and to return with his own hands to me the money, jewels, and account books, and to give me the principal reasons which had forced him to commit the theft, rather than any other person."

A great many more instances of various kinds, equally wonderful, are given, but the few we have quoted are typical and serve to show what were the stupendous claims made for his art by Abraham, who always used it conscientiously.

Works of this kind abound in literary and historic interest, and they are also freely interspersed with salutary moral counsels, but we doubt whether there are many among us who can put the magical formulas to any practical account; and is there any good reason why we should actually attempt to do so? Professedly Occult literature is largely given over to uncanny narratives, some of them calculated to induce a creepy dread, especially at Christmastide, when ghost stories are especially popular, but this feature, at least in our opinion, needs to be repressed rather than exaggerated, and of one thing we may be quite convinced—viz., that if there be such malign or uncanny psychic influences in our immediate vicinage as many people continue to believe, our surest protection against them is to cultivate such heroic faith in the omnipotence of goodness that we shall cherish no lurking dread of evil. The talismanic value of different psalms is insisted upon by many mediaeval writers, and there is doubtless considerable reason for attributing to them extraordinary efficacy, because they breathe a spirit of perfect trust in Deity and discountenance all fear of evil influences, both seen and unseen.

In a very curious and scarcely reliable production, called fantastically "The Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses," we find the entire Psalter endowed with magical potencies. Each one of the 150 psalms is said to be a talisman against some kind of sickness or danger. Whether the entire Book of Psalms can be usefully employed in such a manner is open to controversy, but we can readily see how a recitation of such psalms as the 23d and 91st in particular, may prove of great assistance in times of severe mental distress and difficulty. The peculiar tenacity with which people cling to the Psalter lends color to the claim that it possesses some magical qualities, but in its accepted English version, at any rate, it needs a large amount of revising and a vast deal of wise interpreting to make it suitable for such undiscriminating use as the Church of England, in its daily services, makes of it. Swedenborgians and Mystics get over all moral difficulties, when they encounter imprecatory clauses, by declaring that as to their interior meaning they refer, not to personal enemies but to impersonal lusts "which war against the soul." When we wisely pray for the destruction of our enemies we are really seeking the annihilation of our own vicious tendencies, the encouragement of which may certainly render us susceptible to unholy influx, no matter from what source it may proceed. Were this view always taken and explained to choir boys before they sing in cathedrals and parish churches, there would be no valid reason for protesting against the unceasing use of the entire Psalter; but how often is this matter explained? and when it is not, the pernicious influence of supplicating the Almighty to destroy one's personal foes, if one be supposed to have such, is terrible in its effects upon the ethics of the rising generation. The wide incompatibility between Mediæval magic and the best kinds of modern mental therapeutic systems, is that the former is loaded down with belief in enemies against whom we must work by the employment of magical spells, while the latter endorses the sublime saying of Emerson, "No one can do me an injury but myself."

Christian Scientists, while verbally repudiating any endorsement of magical theories and practises, are strangely inconsistent in clinging to their pet bug-a-boo "malicious animal magnetism." Were they as a denomination once for all to give up that old devil with a new title, they could soon make for themselves a noble place among the advanced philosophers of our day; but just so long as that recrudescence of a most objectionable part of the superstitious belief of old-time magicians clings to their movement, they will engender the very dread of evil which their famous text-book "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," by the founder of the cult, Mary Baker G. Eddy, renders utterly illogical in the celebrated phrase "All is good; there is no evil." Whatever that sentence may exactly mean,—and many different interpretations have been placed upon it,—it cannot logically be accepted in connection with any dread of evil. All the good accomplished by old-school magicians, and all the good done by modern mental therapeutists is accomplished by strengthening the will and calming the mind of sufferers, to whom evil appears a great and terrible, usually an invincible, reality. Abraham's story of conjuring up artificial soldiers seems all of a piece with some scenes in Marie Corelli's "Sorrows of Satan," particularly the magical appearance and disappearance of phantom servitors at the "Willowsmere" festival which was organized by "Lucio Rimanez." We are treading on very treacherous ground if we venture to speak dogmatically concerning the possible connection between our ordinary external life and mysterious unseen influences, and we have no right whatever to wilfully close our eyes in the face of any well-supported evidence. It is however very necessary to insist that great danger to health and reason attend upon dabbling in ceremonial magic to gratify morbid curiosity, and far greater are the penalties we shall have to pay if we allow ourselves to be actuated by any malicious motive. No matter in what department of Psychical Research we may be seeking for knowledge we must never fail to remember the wise words of Alfred Tennyson, who sometimes felt an intense desire to rend the veil and gaze upon what lies behind it. To all everywhere who are thinking of embarking upon the dimly-lighted ocean of magical evocation, or even attempting to get into conscious communion with their departed (or at least unseen) loved ones, we commend the following quatrain from "In Memoriam."

"How pure in heart and sound at head,
With what divine affections bold
Should be the man whose thoughts would hold
An hour's communion with the dead.

They haunt the silence of the breast,
Imagination calm and fair,
The memory like a cloudless air,
The conscience as a sea at rest.

In vain shalt thou or any call
The spirits from their golden day,
Unless, like them, thou too canst say
My spirit is at peace with all.

But when the heart is full of din
And doubt beside the portal waits,
They can but listen at the gates
And hear the household jar within."

We notice in these exquisite lines how the thoughtful poet has assigned doubt to the same low place to which all magicians persistently consign it. Doubt, they declare, renders all attempts invalid, chiefly on account of the weakening effect doubt has on the doubter. And here let us learn a much-needed lesson ere we attempt to succeed in any form of mental practise. Thoughts are transmissible; mental states are communicated from practitioner to patient and from teacher to pupil. How, then, can we reasonably expect to prove successful in a work we undertake half-heartedly?

The particular methods employed, in a majority of instances, are not nearly so important as the mental state of the one who employs them. Henry Wood and other able modern writers have reviewed the medical practice of the Middle Ages most instructively, and while we cannot approve of all the strange medicaments and weird practices advocated, to study a Mediæval pharmacopœia is to gain much insight into the enormous influence that mental states have always exerted over physical conditions. When we treat the subject of Healing in Bible Times impartially, we shall be able to trace exactly the same influences at work many centuries earlier in Asia Minor which reappeared and held the centre of the stage in Europe during periods nearer to the present day.

As the same law works universally, time and place may be accounted well nigh negligible factors whenever we are considering problems, the solution of which is only to be found by studying deeply our human constitution.

CHAPTER XVI.

ANCIENT MAGIC AND MODERN THERAPEUTICS— PARACELSUS AND VON HELMONT.

Ennemoser's "History of Magic, translated from the original German into excellent English by William Howitt (to whose other works we have referred), contains an enormous amount of intensely interesting information concerning all mysterious arts and practices, many of which serve to throw a vast deal of light upon matters usually regarded as too obscure or fanciful to merit much serious notice, but which are certainly engaging the profound attention of many of the most brilliant intellects of the present day. Theosophists and Occultists in general have no difficulty in ascribing mysterious phenomena to the action of various orders of Nature Spirits (sometimes designated sprites), who can be rendered submissive to the commanding will of a qualified magician, and if the existence of these fascinating creatures be conceded, an explanation of magical phenomena is by no means difficult. Animals are rightly subservient to humanity, and they gladly obey and serve those who treat them decently; indeed, they are often so greatly devoted to humanity that they continue to evince affection even when the treatment they receive is cruel and barbarous.

On the unseen side of Nature, magicians claim there are races of sub-human entities who sustain a similar relation to humanity to that sustained by animals on the common objective plane, and while it is less easy to gain ascendancy over these races than over physical animals of domesticated types, it is no more difficult for the trained magician to make them his servitors than for an animal trainer to subdue the ferocity of the natives of the jungle, who, by combined firmness and kindness, can always in time be rendered docile, provided the trainer does not allow himself ever to lose self-control. It is not, however, by any means exclusively with "Nature Spirits" that magicians deal, for a very large portion of their most effective work is due to mesmeric or hypnotic influence, also to the projection of thought-forms, which appear as definite on the mental plane as do ordinary material objects on the physical.

We will now proceed to consider a few of the methods employed by the ancient Hebrew Prophets when engaged in their benevolent work of healing the seriously afflicted, and in some cases raising to life again the seemingly dead. Concerning the actual raising of the dead, we know nothing. Bible narratives only inform us that certain people declared that others had actually died when they were so far beyond the reach of ordinary methods that they certainly would have died very shortly had they not been restored by the power of God working through the prophets. We hear a great deal in these days about Divine Healing, and we often wonder whether it can be ever justifiable to apply so great an adjective to any form of healing in particular, seeing that we have no right whatever to limit our idea of Divine activity to those particular modes of practice which we personally employ, or of which we specially approve. An honorable physician who conscientiously administers medicine has quite as much right to affirm that he believes it to be God's will that outward remedies should be administered, as any Christian Scientist has to say that a certain school of mental practice is of divine appointment. It is just at this point that Christian Scientists make themselves ridiculous by claiming everything for those particular methods which they as a denomination endorse and adopt, while they discountenance all beside.

It is quite true that the Jewish religion, as well as the Christian, can reasonably appeal to the Scriptures in support of the plea that even if every wonder of healing now claimed by Christian Scientists is all that it is said to be, there are no miracles performed in this century any greater than those performed long ago in ancient Israel, and at a later period by Christian apostles. Elijah and Elisha are two of the greatest prophets mentioned in the Old Testament as functioning especially in the rôle of healers. Both of these mighty men are said to have raised to life again a widow's son who was pronounced dead, and both of them, according to the record, employed what we might call in these days a combination of mental, spiritual, and magnetic methods. Prophetic doctrine and practice do much to confirm the idea that God works through all natural instrumentalities, but as man possesses far more of the Divine Spirit than does any sub-human creature, human ability far transcends any curative virtue which we may find in vegetable or mineral. The most extreme cases of suffering, together with the severest and farthest advanced stages of fatal disease, naturally require a mode of treatment far more powerful and effective than ordinary simpler cases; therefore it was always believed that only the greatest among the prophets were able to heal leprosy or to raise to life those who appeared dead, though they might have been only in a dying condition. There is one case which suggests more food for thought, perhaps, than any other in connection with Elisha's ministry, viz., the case of Naaman the Syrian Captain, who was directed by a Hebrew maiden who waited on his wife to the great prophet in Israel, who is said to have received him at first very curtly and to have positively refused to perform any magical acts, no matter how much treasure Naaman was ready to heap upon him.

This story brings out in prominent relief the opposition to ceremonial magic entertained by the Jewish Prophets at a time when it was almost universally believed that sicknesses were caused by evil spirits and that these could be driven out by enchantments. Wherever such a belief is entertained, man is usually made to appear a puppet in the hands of unseen forces, frequently malignant, which can be driven away by some subtle processes performable only by trained exorcists. This theory of suffering, and its remedy, has the very great moral disadvantage of implying that our own mode of life has little (if anything) to do with our general health: a doctrine which is utterly opposed to all the salutary teaching of the Pentateuch, which devotes a large amount of space to minute directions concerning methods of living which, if duly observed, prevent diseases even more effectually than they provide remedies for those which may have already appeared in a community. From the standpoint of sanitation alone, the Mosaic law is highly admirable, and this has been so completely proved many times in Europe during Christian centuries, that one of the charges brought against the Jews in times of general pestilence was that they practiced unholy magical arts which enabled them to withstand the ravages of plagues which decimated surrounding Gentile populations. The real cause of this surprising immunity was a strict observance of the sanitary laws laid down in the Torah. We are now witnessing a very wholesome revival of popular interest in sanitation; few (if any) physicians to-day refusing to admit that if we live clean and wholesome lives we need not suffer as communities from Zymotic and Tuberculous diseases.

The fresh air cure for consumption, taken in connection with general cleanliness and a simple nutritious diet, works hand in hand with all intelligent mental healing. Whatever elevates the mind fortifies the body; whatever depresses the mind, weakens the body; and in like manner whatever injures the body reacts prejudicially on the mind. The absurd and blasphemous idea that God sends sickness (except in the very restrictive sense that we bring it upon ourselves when we act in opposition to some law of nature, which is necessarily an outward expression of Divine order), receives no sanction at the hands of the Bible, though many ministers of religion have told God in their prayers that He has been pleased to send sickness upon members of their congregations, whereas, if they had taken the prophetic attitude, they would have prayed that those who were afflicted might come into a fuller knowledge of Divine law and learn to harmonize their lives with its requirements. When Elisha told Naaman to wash seven times in Jordan, so that he would recover from leprosy, he greatly insulted his haughty visitor, who became very angry, and indignantly refused to pay attention to so impertinent a direction; but after Naaman had returned home, and found his disease making still further progress, he gradually changed his mental attitude, and, returning to Elisha, expressed willingness to comply with his directions. Bathing seven times in Jordan signifies reforming his own life, not simply or chiefly taking a number of baths in a sacred stream.

The vital point in the narrative is where the prophet tells his patient that he must do something for himself, and not expect the doctor to do everything for him. This is a very bold position to take when one is dealing with Army officers or any other people of distinction, who are accustomed to give orders and receive homage rather than obey the directions of others. Probably no one short of a prophet would have sufficient bravery to speak his mind quite plainly to a very wealthy patient occupying a singularly high position in society. There are no incurable diseases, per se, but there are many disorders which are seemingly incurable because we are not in possession of the necessary means for their vanquishment. The law regulating the isolation of lepers may be regarded as a useful and humane one, considering the fact that where no remedy is at hand it is not kindness to the sufferers, but injustice to the populace, to permit persons with infectious diseases to mingle freely with people in general who may be susceptible to contagion. Precautionary measures are, of course, inferior to prophetic power to heal, but we do not attain unto higher powers or greater knowledge by foolishly disregarding useful sanitary regulations. There are probably some people to-day who can quite safely mingle with lepers, and there are certainly a few who know of a cure for leprosy; and it is not too much to hope that in the near future knowledge of how to heal disorders long regarded incurable will have become common mental property. When this happy state of things has come permanently to exist, we may rest assured that the teaching given by true doctors, who are far removed from pharmacists, will be of such a character that the most disagreeable diseases of which people are now most afraid will soon entirely cease, and their very names be blotted from our dictionaries.

Though in a very large majority of instances we may fairly attribute so-called magical cures of disease to faith and imagination in the patient—imagination being a therapeutic agent of immense power and value—it by no means necessarily follows that there is no value whatever in magical ceremonials which are conducted with earnest confidence by disciplined magicians, and there is yet another aspect of the subject which must not be overlooked, viz., the actual efficacy, on the psychical as well as on the physical plane, of certain medicaments employed in occult medical arts. Dr. Franz Hartmann, in a very instructive treatise on this question, has shown how different orders of practitioners in the Middle Ages had recourse to knowledge of the potencies of many plants and herbs not included in the common pharmacopœia.

The general doctrine of Occultists of all schools being to the effect that there are various planes of Nature, unseen as well as seen, and that we can learn how to render the unseen as well as the seen serviceable to us—a plant or herb in the eyes of an Occultist is an existence on some other plane in addition to the physical—therefore it can be reasonably claimed that occult medication is applicable to the psychical as well as to the physical side of human necessity. Some of the grosser means employed in Europe a few centuries ago may appear disgusting, as well as stupid, from the standpoint of fastidious sentiment, but we cannot boast of a medical system to-day entirely free from extremely disagreeable practises. If we take exception to some of these, we are instantly told by their advocates that a doctor's work is to strive to the utmost to deliver his patient from the clutch of disease; therefore, we cannot be fastidious where life and death may be involved; and this position is fundamentally so sound that it is well-nigh indisputable. We can, however, raise our protest against lymphs, serums, etc., which we know to be foul and pernicious, and especially against such as can only be obtained at the expense of great cruelty, which is never tolerated, whether practised on man or beast, by any Occultist of the beneficent type. It is highly noteworthy that the most vigorous protests against vivisection proceed from students of Occultism who have plunged somewhat deeply into the abyss of mystery which has for ages enshrouded all magical ceremonial.

Dr. Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland, who gave us "The Perfect Way," were among the most vehement denouncers of all experiments on living animals; and the Theosophical Society, as a body, is at present definitely active in the interests of the suppression of vivisection, not only out of regard for the sufferings of animals, but also in the interests of humanity, whose cause can never be truly served by outraging humane sentiments which, in addition to cultivating much that is sweet and beautiful in our dispositions, also serve the purpose of safeguarding us on unseen planes of Nature. It may prove interesting and instructive to briefly outline a few of the prominent methods in vogue among magicians, so far as they have been publicly recorded, that we may compare them with some of the therapeutic measures accounted valid to-day. In comparatively recent times no name stands out more conspicuously in the annals of magical healing than that of Theophrastus Paracelsus, who founded a very remarkable school in which Magnetism was extolled as the mighty agent through which healing is to be accomplished. We are so thoroughly used to the term "magnetic healing," and it is often so vague as well as comprehensive, that it seldom conveys any very clear idea of claims made or methods employed beyond the commonly accepted idea that magnetizers put their hands on their patients and claim that some efficacious emanation is transferred from one body to another. Paracelsus, being a man of profound learning and deep insight into the hidden realms of Nature, would naturally give us views on magnetic healing very different from those expressed by comparatively illiterate people who often accomplish much good without any scientific understanding of how they do it. Paracelsus taught a doctrine, with certain modifications of his own, which had been handed on from age to age from the remotest period of which we have any records, and it was to his combined knowledge and skill that he owed his marvellous abilities as wonder-worker as well as teacher.

We can all teach theoretically what we have intellectually grasped, but to make practical demonstrations of our knowledge requires much more than mental information; thus it has always been proven that a peculiar mode of life must be followed by those who would successfully officiate as demonstrators of healing by magnetic means, for in magnetic treatment the individuality and personality of the operator must be involved to a much greater extent than in a conventional practise of medicine where the written prescription is regarded as a factor of prime importance. But though the administration of compounded medicine constitutes a large part of accepted medical practice, it is well known, and freely admitted throughout the medical profession, that the personality of the doctor weighs very heavily in the scale of his failure or success, and as a personality which some people may think charming is distasteful to others, and magnetic emanations which quiet some sufferers disturb others, uniform success in all cases judged similar from symptoms, rarely if ever falls to the lot of any practitioner. Occultists teach that we have peculiarities of inner as well as of outer organizations which need to be ministered to in a specific manner, and because the broad term magnetism is often employed to cover the psychic effluence of a mental as well as physical practitioner, such a saying as I like, or I do not like, that person's magnetism, is heard frequently in circles where the scientific aspects of the question are totally unknown. The system of Paracelsus has sometimes been denominated "mineral," because he taught that the mineral as well as the vegetable and animal kingdoms contains a subtle elixir of life which can be scientifically distilled when one is sufficienly acquainted with magical formulas.

Had Paracelsus lived at such a time as the present, he would probably have had much less recourse to a terminology which has been called "mystical jargon," as this hieroglyphic means of communication between teachers and pupils, and between fellow initiates, was not intended only to preserve secrets from the "profane," but was very largely employed as a necessary precaution in times when every one suspected of practising magic was in serious danger. With a key to interpretation of mysterious symbols, one can readily uncover a good deal of the teaching of Paracelsus, but his entire body of doctrine is written in a double cipher, so that it has intentionally two distinct but closely related meanings, one pertaining to the literal practise of the healing art, the other to the demonstration of arcane teaching concerning the work of transmutation, which has, in its turn again, two distinct significations. There can be no doubt that Paracelsus was naturally quite highly gifted, and that he also used his talents with a very special view to rescuing the practise of medicine from the abject degeneracy into which it had fallen in his day, when the disciples of Galen spent most of their time in foolish controversy and dispute, and accomplished very little in the way of healing.

The claim of Paracelsus was that he went direct to Nature, repudiating all the teachings of the schools which in his day were very nearly worthless. He had studied Metallurgy, and had become a mining expert; he travelled widely, and gathered information wherever he went, all of which he turned to excellent account. His biographers say of him that he learned of all kinds of people, and was never too proud to accept knowledge from even the very humblest. When he had already acquired great fame as a healer of wounds, as well as possessor of an immense amount of miscellaneous information, he became a lecturer in the University of Basle, to which the most celebrated men were attracted from all over Europe. He manifested in his teachings great veneration for Hippocrates, who had pursued the very method by which he himself sought truth. He declared that apothecaries were opposed to him because he would not endorse their charlatanry; his own recipes were very simple, never consisting of from forty to sixty ingredients, as did those of the Galenic doctors. In an essay on the power of the magnet, he says: "The magnet has long lain before all eyes, and no one has ever thought whether it was of any further use or possessed any other property than that of attracting iron. Sordid doctors complain that I will not follow the ancients, but in what should I follow them? All that they have said of the magnet amounts to nothing. Place what I have said of it in the balance, and judge. Had I blindly followed others, and not myself made experiments, I should know no more than what every peasant sees, that a magnet attracts iron. A wise man must inquire for himself, and it is thus I have discovered that the magnet, besides this obvious power of attracting iron, possesses another and concealed power.

"In sickness, you must lay the magnet in the center from which the sickness proceeds. The magnet has two poles, one attracting, one repelling. It is not a matter of indifference to which of these poles a man applies. In falling sickness and every kind of epilepsy, where the attack affects particularly the head, it is proper to lay four magnets on the lower part of the body with the attracting pole turned upward, and only one on the head with the reflecting pole downward, and then you bring other means to their aid." Paracelsus considered that more valuable information was condensed in these few paragraphs than was spread over all the verbose statements of the ordinary physicians of his time.

Paracelsus was also an astrologer, and laid great stress on Siderial magnetism, which he regarded as both spiritual and physical. In this he agreed substantially with the renowned Chaldeans of old, who attributed the influence of the planets to their spiritual energy far more than to their physical movements. He has much to say concerning "Magnes Microcosmi," the little world which he regards as the universe in minimum. Man, he teaches, contains the four great elements, fire, air, water and earth, and must be nourished by them, not only palpably through the stomach, but also imperceptibly through the magnetic force resident in all nature, from which every individual draws specific nourishment. He has also much to say concerning our reciprocal relations with the Sun and the various planets, maintaining that they receive from us even as we receive from them. His celebrated "Magisterium Magnetis" is a tincture extracted from the magnet which he declares is a specific capable of drawing out every variety of diseases from the human body. He even went so far as to claim that this mysterious tincture communicated its properties to all objects near it, and that it did not only attract iron, but also other bodies of various kinds.

Paracelsus compares the human body to wood, and the life within it to fire. He calls magic the philosophy of Alchemy. He declares that a certain attractive power is born with all men, and through this power we become capable of continually attracting into our bodies the properties of the elements. In close harmony with this idea, he explains the cause and method of infection, which he rightly considers to apply to the contagion of health as well as disease, a claim which lies at the root of all modern as well as ancient magnetic treatment. This remarkable man declared that though he founded his doctrine on his own experience, he discovered it to be in very close accord with the teachings of the Bible, which he had studied so fully that he knew almost the entire Book by rote. It certainly does seem remarkable that people who profess to credit as genuine the wonderful accounts of magnetic healing, which are scattered all over the Bible, should take exception to the laying on of hands and other simple magnetic methods as means of cure, though it may be argued that the mineral magnet is not mentioned in the Scriptures in connection with the work of healing accomplished by either Jewish prophets or Christian apostles. The spirit of the elements, claims Paracelsus, rules the lower propensities of man, but as there is in reality only one life, a common essence pervades all forms of existence. All created things he denominates letters and books, describing human origin and descent. The human body is, according to his system, a perfect microcosm which man himself must learn to completely control, for while the body comes from the earth, the spirit comes from a higher world. Concerning divination, he has much to say, especially with regard to the Astral body, which he clearly distinguishes from the elementary body which rests during sleep, while the Astral continues active. In this Mediæval teaching we find the word "astral directly derived from the stars, from which it is said to emanate, and among which it is capable of travelling. Animals as well as men possess Astral bodies, and are therefore capable of experiencing presentiments. Paracelsus wrote a curious book on "Fools," whom he declares all contain some measure of wisdom, which occasionally breaks forth like sunshine through a fog. This comparison agrees well with many present-day statements concerning the human aura, which is really an atmosphere or photosphere surrounding every individual, bright and luminous in the case of highly developed natures, dark and murky in cases where little progress above animality has been made. We find in the teachings of Paracelsus a firm belief expressed in the efficacy of enchantments, but while he believes in the power of curses as well as of blessings, he makes it clear to students that it is only the weak, the foolish and the vicious who can be seriously affected by any sort of malediction, while blessings can be fully received by the most highly cultured and spiritually advanced members of the human race. With regard to the highest kind of magic, he says that to practice it requires a powerful imagination, in addition to firm faith; no ceremonies are really necessary, and they are usually nothing but humbug. "The human spirit is so great a thing that no man can express it; as God is eternal and unchangeable, so also is the mind of man. If we rightly understood this mind, nothing would be impossible to us. Imagination is invigorated and perfected through faith; every doubt seriously hinders a magical operation, for it is faith that establishes the will. Because men do not perfectly imagine and believe, their arts are uncertain while they might be perfectly certain."

Another very wonderful man—one of the worthiest and ablest of the successors of Paracelsus —was Baptista Von Helmont, who, on account of his vast knowledge, acute judgment, and amazing penetration, created a new epoch in medicine. In the history of magnetism he takes the very first rank, since he brought into this dark field a clearer light than anyone before or since has done. Deleuze, in his famous work on "Animal Magnetism," speaks of Helmont in terms of unstinted praise, and gives a great deal of interesting information concerning his life and methods. He was the first to give the name of gas to aerial fluids. In Ennemoser's "History of Magic," we are told that this good and great man had often to defend his doctrine and practice against the stupid charge that its origin was diabolical, and to the satisfaction of the learned and intelligent of his day, his logical rebuttals proved quite convincing, though the ignorant and fanatical still clung to that senseless and debasing delusion.

Concerning Magnetism he says that it is of a heavenly nature and unrestrained by the boundaries of space. Whoever, therefore, avails himself of magnetic means, undertakes a God-pleasing business. Regarding the power of suggestion, he has left many worthy sayings on record, proving that our modern methods were well known and largely practised by Alchemistical Philosophers, who in some notable instances seem to have attributed all efficacy to suggestion, though incantations and other ceremonies were often used; in this they forestalled the conclusions of many learned psychologists of to-day. The power of evil is very much restricted in the doctrine of Helmont, who by no means denies it in toto, but distinctly shows how evil (i. e., disorderly) influences can be operative only on the surface of existence, while whatever is good (i. e., orderly) possesses practically unlimited power, because it is working with (not against) the great purpose of the universe. The use of herbs entered largely into Helmont's practise, and to many vegetable products he assigns magical properties; as, for instance, when he says that if you hold a certain extraordinary herb crushed in your hand, and at the same time hold the hand of another person, he or she will retain a great liking for you for at least several days. A singular story is told by this acutely observant man of a sensitive woman, who invariably suffered an attack of gout if she occupied a seat on which a brother of hers used to sit regularly five years previously; this man had suffered acutely from the distressing malady. Persons of blunt and irresponsive temperament may readily laugh at such tales, because they have no experiences of their own calculated to confirm them, but highly sensitive natures know that such facts do occur, and it is quite in accord with the best and wisest sanitary regulations of our day to admit the reality of such phenomena sufficiently to induce us to cremate all articles which have been long associated with chronic invalidism as well as with avowedly infectious maladies.

Helmont, in common with all magicians, does not only acknowledge the power of men over animals, he also teaches the influence exerted by animals over all ordinary men, and he tells many a weird tale of animal fascination, and cites some of his own experiences in support of his contention. Fascination is a very powerful weapon with which animals are equipped, and without it in the struggle for existence many would have been swept away which now exist and multiply. Psychometry is now confirming many of Helmont's narratives, and as it certainly seems that the average sensitiveness of civilized humanity is palpably increasing, we may soon need to know quite a great deal of mystical philosophy to enable us to enjoy good results of this increasing sensibility, instead of being embarrassed and debilitated thereby. A very beautiful summary of Helmont's truly sublime philosophy we present in the following quotation: "When God created the human soul, He imparted to her essential and original knowledge. The soul is the mirror of the universe, and stands in relationship to all living things. She is illuminated by an inward light; but the tempest of passions, the multitude of sensual impressions, the dissipations, darken this light, whose glory only diffuses itself when it burns alone, and all is peace and harmony within us. When we know ourselves to be separated from all outward influences, and desire only to be guided by this universal light, then only do we find in ourselves pure and certain knowledge. In this state of concentration, the soul analyses all objects on which her attention rests. She can unite herself with them, penetrate through their substance, penetrating even to God Himself, and feeling Him in the most important truths." Another great statement of this wonderful man reads thus: "The physician chosen of God is accompanied by many signs and wonders for the schools. He will give the honor to God, as he employs his gifts to assuaging the sufferings of his neighbor. Compassion will be his guide. His heart will possess truth and his intellect science. Love will be his sister; and the truth of the Lord will illumine his path. He will invoke the grace of God, and he will not be overcome by the desire of gain. For the Lord is rich and bountiful, and pays hundredfold in heaped measure. He will make his labor fruitful, and he will clothe his hands with blessings. He will fill his mouth with comfort, and His word will be a trumpet before which diseases will fly. His footsteps will bring prosperity, and sickness will flee before his face, as snow melts in a summer morn. Health will follow him. These are the testimonies of the Lord to those healers whom He has chosen—this is the blessedness of those who pursue the way of kindness; and the Holy Spirit will, moreover, enlighten them as the Comforter."

CHAPTER XVII.

JEANNE D'ARC, THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

Among the most remarkable sceresses known to modern Europe, the name of the famous Maid of Orleans stands eminently conspicuous, particularly when we take into account the period in which she lived and the people among whom she moved. Five hundred years or less ago, woman's position in Europe was widely different from what it is now; thus it was far more remarkable that a simple peasant girl could successfully head the French army during the fifteenth century than that such a phenomenon might occur to-day. From whatever standpoint we approach Jeanne's history, we cannot well call it other than miraculous, and as a psychological study it far outdistances in general importance all considerations pertaining to the immediate cause which she espoused or the particular victories she accomplished.

Domrémy, her birthplace, was a romantic village on the border between France and Prussia, and many were the legends which clustered thickly around it regarding apparitions of saints and angels which gathered about the spot. A particularly romantic story concerned a famous tree in the village, which had the reputation of being a trysting-place between spirits and mortals, and it was under its shade that the simple maiden first heard mysterious voices and became imbued with the conviction that she had a mighty mission to fulfil under celestial direction. S. Margaret and S. Catherine, patron saints of Domrémy, are said to have appeared to her when she was a mere child, and gradually unfolded to her the overwhelming tidings that she must place herself at the head of the French army and secure the coronation of the Dauphin after she had routed the English troops, which were then largely occupying her native country.

We often hear it said in these days that women cannot carry arms, and therefore have properly no right of suffrage; but this assertion was completely refuted nearly five hundred years ago, when an innocent maiden accomplished, as a general, what no man among her countrymen seemed able to achieve. The story of the Maid of Orleans settles the sex question at its very outset by demonstrating that individual ability is the only passport to certain victory, and we can never tell when genius will appear clothed in male or in female habiliments. Sometimes a youth, at other times a maiden, will be raised up to accomplish daring deeds that none but the greatest of heroes can undertake successfully, and we never know whether such genius is likely to rise from the ranks of nobility or peasantry; but when it does appear, it carries all before it like some mighty cyclone against which all opposition must inevitably prove fruitless. It is unquestionably not the ordinary normal vocation of a woman to become a soldier, and warfare itself may become defunct much sooner than most of us suppose; but when the times required an intrepid military commander to save a land from foreign dominance, it came to pass that the unseen powers which govern mortal destinies did at least on one highly memorable occasion raise up an untutored maiden to wave the banner and carry the sword successfully on the field of martial conquest. The many difficulties which Jeanne had to encounter were so formidable and well-nigh insuperable that they might easily have daunted the courage of even a seasoned warrior; but the innocent child, with unshakable confidence in her Heaven-directed mission, brushed all these obstacles aside with the power of that unflinching faith which does indeed, figuratively speaking, remove mountains. Though her mother, a very spiritually-minded woman, readily listened to the maiden's thrilling accounts of angelic interviews, her father, even though he may not have entirely discredited them, was so shocked at the idea of his daughter heading an army that he made no secret of his sentiment that he would rather see her drowned than embark on so utterly improper an undertaking. But an uncle favored her enterprise, and under his guardianship she set forth on the arduous and perilous career which she was fully convinced could end in no other way than gloriously; for not only did she believe that two saints were promptting her; she felt that the mighty archangel Michael was her chief inspirer, and with this conviction to buoy her spirits, her courage never faltered even in the face of the most determined opposition which she encountered from ecclesiastical dignitaries as well as from the secular authority. The story of her movement from place to place, until she finally reached the Dauphin, and eventually secured his coronation at Rheims, reads like a fairy tale, a work of fiction almost too highly colored to take rank with serious novels. But we are dealing with actual history, not with sensational romance, and here indeed is demonstrated the truthfulness of the long-celebrated adage: "Truth is stranger than fiction."

The clairvoyance of the Maid of Orleans was triumphantly demonstrated on the occasion of her first encounter with the man whom her bravery was to elevate to the throne, for though he had completely disguised himself, and placed a substitute in his accustomed place, this ruse proved entirely ineffectual. The Dauphin, who was a very impressionable man, became greatly interested in Jeanne's mission, and soon became willing to render her the aid she needed to equip an army. One of the most remarkable incidents in the Maid's career was her extraordinary discipline, which manifested itself immediately in the improved conduct of the soldiers and in the amazing courage with which she inspired all under her command. Being herself of a highly religious nature, and deeming it of the utmost importance that religious rites should be faithfully observed, she readily induced the army to pay renewed attention to their long-neglected devotions, and she soon succeeded in inspiring a demoralized body of men with real reverence for all the virtues she so highly exemplified in her own heroic person. There is a marvellous contagion in perfect trust and quenchless bravery, and from whatever viewpoint

we may regard the story of visions and voices from the unseen world, we must be ignorant indeed of the first principles of psychology if we fail to perceive how mighty an effect on others one's own indomitable courage can exert. Whether the commander be Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, Wellington, Washington, or the Maid of Orleans, no army has ever proved continuously successful except when headed by some intrepid general whose own conviction was unflinching that victory must surely wait upon obedience to his (or her) command. It seems incredible that Joan of Arc could have accomplished even the simple leadership of a battalion had she not been able to impress those under her with something of her own confidence in Heavenly guidance, for an immature maiden at the head of a regiment of soldiers is a spectacle so grotesque, when viewed from any ordinary standpoint, as to suggest a farce rather than a serious battle. Doubtless the charm of her personality had something to do with her successes, but we must keep steadily in mind that here was no voluptuous woman appealing to the admiration of beauty-loving men, but a saintly virgin whose especial charm consisted in her supreme devotion to spiritual ideals, her confidence in celestial prompters and her unflinching determination to serve her country at all hazard, guided as she believed by the very finger of the Almighty. It seems from all histories that a certain magical charm was exerted by her banner, the very sight of which nerved her troops to daring, as they had accepted the suggestion that that symbol was a token of Heaven's approval of their march. A very noteworthy incident in this astounding record is the well-attested fact that when the Maid followed implicitly directions given by the spirit-voices, she was invariably victorious, but when she had accomplished, to the full, the special work to which those voices led her, she subsequently permitted herself to be led into battle when they were silent, victory no longer crowned her leadership, but she sustained serious physical injuries at the hands of the opposing troops, and soon entered upon that sad episode in her formerly triumphant career which finally reached the tragic end of martyrdom. Among the many histories of this truly wonderful girl, perhaps the most fascinating of all is the volume of "Personal Recollections," translated from the French by that always delightful writer Samuel Clemens, familiarly known as Mark Twain, who says: "The details of the life of Joan of Arc form a biography which is unique among the world's biographies in one respect. It is the only story of a human life which comes to us under oath, the only one which comes to us from the witness-stand. The official records of the Great Trial of 1531, and of the process of Rehabilitation of a quarter of a century later, are still preserved in the National Archives of France, and they furnish with remarkable fulness the facts of her life. The history of no other life of that remote time is known with either the certainty or the comprehensiveness that attaches to hers. The Sieur Louis De Conte is faithful to her official history in his personal recollections, and thus far his trustworthiness is unimpeachable; but his mass of added particulars must depend for credit upon his word alone." The story, as told by this well-recognized authority, is divided into three books, written with a peculiarly vivid charm which makes the reader feel that he is himself living amid the extraordinary scenes so graphically depicted, and the original French seemingly has lost nothing by translation into Mark Twain's wonderfully beautiful English. To review this narrative with any degree of fulness would be to practically re-write it; but the following extracts from the story of Joan's trial and martyrdom may tend, in some slight degree, to familiarize our readers with what actually occurred at the time when a recognized saint of the Roman Catholic Church of to-day earned her right to beatification. "At nine o'clock the Maid of Orleans, deliverer of France, went forth in the grace of her innocence and her youth to lay down her life for the country she loved with such devotion and for the king who had abandoned her. She sat in the cart that is used only for felons. In one respect she was treated worse than a felon, for whereas she was on her way to be sentenced by the Civilon, she already bore her judgment inscribed in advance upon a mitre-shaped cap which she wore.

"In the car with her sat the Friar Martin Ladvenu and Maitre Jean Massieu. She looked girlishly fair and sweet and saintly in her long white robe, and when a gush of sunlight flooded her as she emerged from the gloom of the prison and was yet for a moment still framed in the arch of the sombre gate, the massed multitudes of poor folk murmured, 'A vision! a vision!' and sank to their knees praying, and many of the women weeping; and the moving invocation for the dying rose again, and was taken up and borne along, a majestic wave of sound which accompanied the doomed, solacing and blessing her, all the sorrowful way to the place of death. 'Christ, have pity! Saint Margaret, have pity! Pray for her, all ye saints, archangels, and blessed martyrs; pray for her! Saints and angels, intercede for her! From thy wrath, good Lord, deliver her! O Lord God, save her! Have mercy on her, we beseech Thee, good Lord!'

"It is just and true, what one of the histories has said: 'The poor and the helpless had nothing but their prayers to give Joan of Arc; but these we may believe were not unavailing. There are few more pathetic events recorded in history than this weeping, helpless, praying crowd, holding their lighted candles and kneeling on the pavement beneath the prison walls of the old fortress.

"And it was so all the way. Thousands upon thousands massed upon their knees, and stretching far down the distance, thick sown with the faint yellow candle-flames, like a field starred with golden flowers.

"But there were some who did not kneel; these were the English soldiers. They stood elbow to elbow, on each side of Joan's road, and walled it in, all the way; and behind these living walls knelt the multitudes.

"By-and-bye a frantic man in priest's garb came wailing and lamenting, and tore through the crowd and the barrier of soldiers, and flung himself on his knees by Joan's cart, and put up his hands in supplication, crying out!

"'O, forgive; forgive!'

"It was Loyseleur!

"And Joan forgave him; forgave him out of a heart that knew nothing but forgiveness, nothing but compassion, nothing but pity for all that suffer, let their offence be what it might. And she had no word of reproach for this poor wretch who had wrought day and night with deceits and treacheries and hypocrisies to betray her to her death.

"The soldiers would have killed him, but the Earl of Warwick saved his life. What became of him is not known. He hid himself from the world somewhere, to endure his remorse as he might.

"In the square of the Old Market stood the two platforms and the stake which had stood before in the churchyard of St. Ouen. The platforms were occupied as before, the one by Joan and her judges, the other by great dignitaries, the principal being Cauchon and the English Cardinal, Winchester. The square was packed with people, the windows and roofs of the blocks of buildings surrounding it were black with them.

"When the preparation had been finished, all noise and movement gradually ceased, and a waiting stillness followed which was solemn and impressive.

"And now, by order of Cauchon, an ecclesiastic named Nicholas Midi preached a sermon, wherein he explained that when a branch of a vine—which is the Church—becomes diseased and corrupt, it must be cut away or it will corrupt and destroy the whole vine. He made it appear that Joan, through her wickedness, was a menace and a peril to the Church's purity and holiness, and her death therefore necessary. When he was come to the end of his discourse, he turned toward her and paused a moment, then he said: 'Joan, the Church can no longer protect you. Go in peace!'

"Joan had been placed wholly apart and conspicuous, to signify the Church's abandonment of her, and she sat there in her loneliness, waiting in patience and resignation for the end. Cauchon addressed her now. He had been advised to read the form of her abjuration to her, and had brought it with him; but he changed his mind, fearing that she would proclaim the truth—that she never knowingly abjured—and so bring shame upon him and perpetual infamy. He contented himself with admonishing her to keep in mind her wickednesses, and repent of them, and think of her salvation. Then he solemnly pronounced her excommunicate, and cut off from the body of the Church. With a final word he delivered her over to the secular arm for judgment and sentence.

"Joan, weeping, knelt and began to pray. For whom? Herself? Oh, no—for the King of France. Her voice rose sweet and clear, and penetrated all hearts with its passionate pathos. She never thought of his treacheries to her, she never thought of his desertions of her, she never remembered that it was because he was an ingrate that she was here to die a miserable death; she remembered only that he was her King, that she was his loyal and loving subject, and that his enemies had undermined his cause with evil reports and false charges, and he not by to defend himself. And so, in the very presence of death, she forgot her own troubles to implore all in her hearing to be just to him; to believe that he was good and noble and sincere, and not in any way to blame for any acts of hers, neither advising them or urging them, but being wholly clear and free of all responsibility for them. Then, closing, she begged in humble and touching words that all here present would pray for her and would pardon her, both her enemies and such as might look friendly upon her and feel pity for her in their hearts.

"There was hardly one heart there that was not touched—even the English, even the judges, showed it, and there was many a lip that trembled and many an eye that was blurred with tears; yes, even the English Cardinal's—that man with a political heart of stone but a human heart of flesh.

"The secular judge who should have delivered judgment and pronounced sentence was himself so disturbed that he forgot his duty, and Joan went to her death unsentenced—thus completing with an illegality what had begun illegally, and had so continued to the end. He only said—to the guards:

" 'Take her'; and to the executioner, 'Do your duty.'

"Joan asked for a cross. None was able to furnish one. But an English soldier broke a stick in two, and crossed the pieces and tied them together, and this cross he gave her, moved to it by the good heart that was in him; and she kissed it and put it to her bosom. Then Isambard de la Pierre went to the church near by and brought her a consecrated one; and this one also she kissed, and pressed it to her bosom with rapture, and then kissed it again and again, covering it with tears and pouring out her gratitude to God and the saints.

"And so, weeping, and with her cross to her lips, she climbed up the cruel steps to the face of the stake, with the friar Isambard at her side. Then she was helped up to the top of the pile of wood that was built around the lower third of the stake, and stood upon it with her back against the stake, and the world gazing up at her breathless. The executioner ascended to her side and wound the chains about her slender body, and so fastened her to the stake. Then he descended to finish his dreadful office, and there she remained alone—she that had had so many friends in the days when she was free, and had been so loved and so dear.

"All these things I saw, albeit dimly and blurred with tears; but I could bear no more. I continued in my place, but what I shall deliver to you now I got by others' eyes and others' mouths. Tragic sounds there were that pierced my ears and wounded my heart as I sat there, but it is as I tell you: the latest image recorded by my eyes in that desolating hour was Joan of Arc with the grace of her comely youth still unmarred; and that image, untouched by time or decay, has remained with me all my days. Now I will go on.

"If any thought that now, in that solemn hour, when all transgressors repent and confess, she would revoke her revocation and say her great deeds had been evil deeds, and Satan and his fiends their source, they erred. No such thought was in her blameless mind. She was not thinking of herself and her troubles, but of others, and of woes that might befall them. And so, turning her grieving eyes about her, where rose the towers and spires of that fair city, she said:

"'Oh, Rouen, Rouen! Must I die here, and must you be my tomb? Ah, Rouen, Rouen! I have great fear that you will suffer for my death.'

"A whiff of smoke swept upward past her face, and for one moment terror seized her and she cried out, 'Water! Give me holy water!' But the next moment her fears were gone, and they came no more to torture her.

"She heard the flames crackling below her, and immediately distress for a fellow creature who was in danger took possession of her. It was the friar Isambard. She had given him her cross and begged him to raise it toward her face and let her eyes rest in hope and consolation upon it, till she had entered into the peace of God. She made him go out from the danger of the fire. Then she was satisfied, and said:

"'Now keep it always in my sight until the end.'

"Not even yet could Cauchon, that man without shame, endure to let her die in peace, but went toward her, all black with crimes and sins as he was, and cried out:

"'I am come, Joan, to exhort you for the last time to repent and seek the pardon of God.'

"'I die through you,' she said, and these were the last words she spoke to any upon earth.

"Then the pitchy smoke, shot through with red flashes of flame, rolled up in a thick volume and hid her from sight; and from the heart of this darkness her voice rose strong and eloquent in prayer, and when by moments the wind shredded somewhat of the smoke aside, there were veiled glimpses of an upturned face and moving lips. At last a merciful swift tide of flame burst upward, and none saw that face any more, nor that form, and the voice was still.

"Yes, she was gone from us; Joan of Arc! What little words they are, to tell of a rich world made empty and poor!

"Joan's brother Jacques died in Domrémy during the Great Trial at Rouen. This was according to the prophecy which Joan made that day in the pastures, the time that she said the rest of us would go to the great wars.

"When her poor old father heard of the martyrdom, it broke his heart, and he died.

"The mother was granted a pension by the City of Orleans, and upon this she lived out her days, which were many. Twenty-four years after her illustrious child's death, she travelled all the way to Paris in the winter time, and was present at the opening of the discussion in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, which was the first step in the Rehabilitation. Paris was crowded with people, from all over France, who came to get sight of the venerable dame, and it was a touching spectacle when she moved through those reverent, wet-eyed multitudes on her way to the grand honors awaiting her at the Cathedral. With her were Jean and Pierre, no longer the light-hearted youths who marched with us from Vaucouleurs, but war-worn veterans with hair beginning to show frost.

"After the martyrdom, Noel and I went back to Domrémy, but presently, when the Constable Richemont superseded La Tremouille as the King's Chief Adviser, and began the completion of Joan's great work, we put on our harness and returned to the field and fought for the King all through the wars and skirmishes, until France was freed of the English. It was what Joan would have desired of us; and, dead or alive, her desire was law for us. All the survivors of the personal staff were faithful to her memory and fought for the King to the end. Mainly we were well scattered, but when Paris fell we happened to be together. It was a great day and a joyous; but it was a sad one at the same time, because Joan was not there to march into the captured capital with us

"Noel and I remained always together, and I was by his side when death claimed him. It was in the last great battle of the war. In that battle fell also Joan's sturdy old enemy, Talbot. He was eighty-five years old, and had spent his whole life in battle. A fine old lion he was, with his flowing white mane and his tameless spirit; yes, and his indestructible energy as well; for he fought as knightly and vigorous a fight that day as the best man there.

"La Hire survived the martyrdom thirteen years; and always fighting, of course, for that was all he enjoyed in life. I did not see him in all that time, for we were far apart, but one was always hearing of him.

"The Bastard of Orleans and D'Alençon and D'Aulon lived to see France free, and to testify with Jean and Pierre d'Arc and Pasquerel and me at the Rehabilitation. But they are all at rest now, these many years. I alone am left of those who fought at the side of Joan of Arc in the great wars. She said I should live until these wars were forgotten—a prophecy which failed. If I should live a thousand years, it would still fail. For whatsoever had touch with Joan of Arc, that thing is immortal.

"Members of Joan's family married, and they have left descendants. Their descendants are of the nobility, but their family name and blood bring them honors which no other nobles receive or may hope for. You have seen how everybody along the way uncovered when those children came yesterday to pay their duty to me. It was not because they are noble; it is because they are grandchildren of the brothers of Joan of Arc.

"Now as to the Rehabilitation. Joan crowned the King at Rheims. For reward, he allowed her to be hunted to her death without making one effort to save her. During the next twenty-three years he remained indifferent to her memory, indifferent to the fact that her good name was under a damning blot put there by the priests because of the deeds which she had done in saving him and his sceptre, indifferent to the fact that France was ashamed. Indifferent all that time. Then he suddenly changed, and was anxious to have justice for poor Joan, himself. Why? Had he become grateful at last? Had remorse attacked his hard heart? No; he had a better reason—a better one for his sort of man. This better reason was that, now that the English had been finally expelled from the country, they were beginning to call attention to the fact that this King had gotten his crown by the hands of a person proven by the priests to have been in league with Satan, and burnt for it by them as a sorceress —therefore, of what value or authority was such a kingship as that? Of no value at all; no nation could afford to allow such a King to remain on the throne.

"It was high time to stir now, and the King did it. That is how Charles VII. came to be smitten with anxiety to have justice done the memory of his benefactress.

"He appealed to the Pope, and the Pope appointed a great commission of churchmen to examine into the facts of Joan's life and award judgment. The Commission sat at Paris, at Domrémy, at Rouen, at Orleans, and at several other places, and continued its work during several months. It examined the record of Joan's trial, it examined the Bastard of Orleans and the Duke D'Alençon, and D'Aulon, and Pasquerel, and Courcelles, and Isambard de la Pierre, and Manchon, and me, and many others whose names I have made familiar to you; also they examined more than a hundred witnesses whose names are less familiar to you—friends of Joan in Domrémy, Vaucouleurs, Orleans, and other places, and a number of judges and other people who had assisted at the Rouen trials, the abjuration, and the martyrdom. And out of this exhaustive examination Joan's character and history came spotless and perfect, and this verdict was placed upon record, to remain forever.

"I was present upon most of these occasions, and saw again many faces which I have not seen for a quarter of a century; among them some well-beloved faces—those of our generals and that of Catherine Boucher (married, alas!), and also among them certain other faces that filled me with bitterness—those of Beaupere and Courcelles and a number of their fellow-fiends. I saw Haumette and Little Mengette—edging along toward fifty, now, and mothers of many children. I saw Noel's father, and the parents of the Paladin and the Sunflower.

"It was beautiful to hear the Duke D'Alençon praise Joan's splendid capacities as a general, and to hear the Bastard endorse these praises with his eloquent tongue, and then go on and tell how sweet and good Joan was, and how full of pluck and fire and impetuosity and mischief and mirthfulness, and tenderness and compassion, and everything that was pure and fine and noble and lovely. He made her live again before me, and wrung my heart.

"I have finished my story of Joan of Arc, that wonderful child, that sublime personality, that spirit which in one regard has had no peer and will have none—this: its purity from all alloy of self-seeking, self-interest, personal ambition. In it no trace of these motives can be found, search as you may, and this cannot be said of any other person whose name appears in profane history.

"With Joan of Arc, love of country was more than a sentiment—it was a passion. She was the genius of Patriotism—she was patriotism embodied, concreted, made flesh, and palpable to the touch and visible to the eye.

"Love, Mercy, Charity, Fortitude, War, Peace, Poetry, Music—these may be symbolised as any shall prefer; by figures of either sex and of any age; but a slender girl in her first young bloom, with the martyr's crown upon her head, and in her hand the sword that severed her country's bonds—shall not this, and no other, stand for PATRIOTISM through all ages, until time shall end?"

Such, in brief, is a fair record of one of the most marvellous cases of inspired bravery and true martyrdom the world has ever known. There may still remain psychological mysteries connected with the Maid's career which neither physical nor psychical research has yet been able fully to fathom, but that is no reason why we should withhold our consent to such abundant testimony as has clearly been afforded to the super-physical element in the career of this mysterious girl whose name, nearly five centuries after her departure from the physical body, is gaining continually added fame and lustre. Europe as well as Asia, the Christian centuries as well as older times, have all borne witness to the reality of spiritual interposition in the affairs of humanity on earth, thereby entirely putting to flight the erroneous assumption that this world stands alone in space, or that its inhabitants while incarnate are isolated from companionship with intelligent entities on other than physical planes of manifestation. Whenever a work needs to be done, fitting instruments are raised up to accomplish it, and these in the present, as well as in the past, appear often at first entirely unsuited to the mighty tasks they have been selected to fulfil. Time vindicates all things. Justice reigns, and must forever triumph.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS, A NINETEENTH CENTURY SEER—A GLIMPSE AT HIS PHILOSOPHY.

Among the truly wonderful pioneers of the great new wave of thought which during the past century largely revolutionized the entire thinking world, the name of Andrew Jackson Davis, author of "Nature's Divine Revelations," "The Great Harmonia," and many other wonderful literary productions, deserves to hold a singularly high and honored place. We hear so much of the influence of heredity and of environment, that we are generally much astonished when we find a highly gifted writer displaying amazing knowledge on almost every subject, if concerning his ancestry and early history we know nothing in any way remarkable.

The mother of Andrew Jackson Davis seems to have been a good, honest, ordinary woman, displaying no remarkable traits or characteristics, and as to the boy's early history we can only discover that he attended common country schools and was in early youth apprenticed to a shoemaker. Without some spiritual theory to account for genius, we can only remain utterly bewildered in presence of the great library of outwardly unassuming but intellectually imposing volumes which have recently been reissued by the Austin Publishing Company, Rochester, N. Y., and which carry us back to the 'forties and 'fities of the nineteenth century. Quite apart from the phenomenal character of their authorship, the works themselves are a stupendous revelation, embracing as they do profound and learned treatises on all the natural sciences, besides undertaking to give us wonderful enlightenment concerning the (ordinarily) unseen universe.

In the case of Emanuel Swedenborg, we can trace the gradual evolution of a mighty intellect. Swedenborg was born into a distinguished family of scholars, and he gradually ascended by well-defined successive steps from treatises on natural science and philosophy to dissertations concerning the spiritual universe. But while Swedenborg was over fifty years of age when he undertook to unveil the wonders of life in spiritual spheres, the Seer of Poughkeepsie was under twenty, and quite illiterate in the collegiate sense, when he began unfolding with marvellous insight and wealth of diction the wonders of those innumerable super-physical states and conditions concerning which the majority of even the best-informed among scholars professed to know next to nothing. Were the works of Davis wild romances or accounts of rhapsodic visions lacking alike in logical coherence and continuity, we might quickly dismiss them as psychic vagaries, and pay no serious attention to their inculcations; but in Davis's writings we are brought face to face with a fund of scientific and historical information which renders the books marvels of erudition even if we pay no heed to the accounts of unseen spheres which we are told the youth clearly beheld when in a superior condition. It was in 1846 and 1847 that the first of these great works was brought to public notice, therefore just before the year when the "Rochester Knockings" are said to have inaugurated the advent of Modern Spiritualism. Davis was therefore a forerunner of all those modern prophets who startled America with their disclosures concerning life beyond death, and all of whom in the early days of the Spiritualistic movement seemed to take a somewhat different view of their relation to the world of spirits than that claimed for himself by Davis. We all know that the common idea of mediumship is of a state or condition in which the medium is under the control or direction of some outside influence, and usually it is claimed that such influence works through the medium, whereas in the "superior condition" of Davis, which in this respect largely resembled that of Swedenborg, he claimed to see and hear for himself what was going on in other worlds, or on other planes of existence, by virtue of the enlargement of his own perception enabling him to see much further into the universe than is possible with only ordinary faculties. We read in his Autobiography, called "The Magic Staff," that at first he was magnetized or mesmerized, and while in the magnetic or mesmeric state exhibited singular lucidity. But the men who thus operated with him were entirely incapable of transmitting through his agency the wondrous information which soon began to pour in torrents through his lips, though their manipulations do seem to have opened a door into the trance condition, which soon gave place to a higher state of independent clairvoyance. How far magnetism or mesmerism can prove a genuine aid to psychic development is a very open and much-disputed question, but the bulk of testimony in this direction, which we may reasonably deem reliable, is that it does often prepare the way for higher developments which follow, principally by removing that extreme self-consciousness, which, when coupled with inordinate attention to the external side of things, is doubtless the chief barrier in the way of mental and spiritual lucidity. Though it is quite clear to every logical thinker that no one can impart knowledge which he does not possess, it is by no means unreasonable to assume that certain obstacles may be removed, which are usually in the way of receiving information psychically, through the agency of the mesmerist. In the middle of the last century mesmeric operations were greatly in vogue among many learned doctors, prominent among whom stood the famous Dr. Gregory of Edinburgh, whose long-famous work, "Animal Magnetism or Mesmerism and Its Phenomena," contains a great many thoroughly well authenticated accounts of remarkable clairvoyance induced by mesmeric treatment. But most of this clairvoyance was very much of a piece with the thought-transference, telepathy, and mental telegraphy, about which we are now hearing and reading constantly. Contrast the meagre results of many recent endeavors to communicate with the unseen world on the part of such distinguished scientific celebrities as, for example, Sir Oliver Lodge, with the magnificent inspired output of the Seer of Poughkeepsie, and we are only the more bewildered with the dazzling splendor of a revelation which has been almost entirely overlooked by the scientific world, even while a distinguished portion of it has been engaging itself with an attempted solution of the very problems which this revelation seems so very largely to have solved. But we must not forget that however satisfactory as well as wonderful this revelation may appear, it does not seem to supply that distinctly evidential individual testimony to personal immortality which our modern seekers are striving to obtain, unless we admit the many instances of recorded clairvoyance with which his writings abound as supplying such evidence. We can quite readily imagine the attitude taken by our modern Psychical Research Committees regarding conclusive evidence, and should we press such alleged evidence upon them, they would naturally inquire where is your proof that such visions are other than results of a fertile and highly vivid imagination? To this inquiry we can indeed offer no reply which might prove universally conclusive. Still, it may reasonably be argued that the information given is so extensive, profound, and rational that the very large probability is that it emanated from the source whence its recipient declared that it did proceed. But in these days "cross-correspondence," and other new phases of telepathic intercourse, hold the center of the stage in certain scientific circles, and these phenomena are indeed intensely interesting and deserve the fullest attention at the hands of earnest students everywhere. But on that account we are by no means justified in narrowing the field of our vision and confining our researches within the very limited domain in which many investigators seem desirous of pursuing their inquiries. Having glanced over the contents of a valuable recent book by Sir Oliver Lodge—which has been widely reviewed in periodicals of all descriptions and has furnished texts for many lectures and essays—we find the most characteristic evidences of both mundane and supra-mundane telepathy to consist in dialogue of an extremely commonplace nature, a fact which Professor Hyslop and many other earnest investigators regard as confirmatory of the fact that individuality is expressed much more fully by means of an exhibition of minor peculiarities than through the agency of profound utterances which, however valuable from a philosophical standpoint, convey no convincing impression of having emanated from a particular individual intelligence. One of the special characteristics of the avowed inspiration of A. J. Davis is that he received it from a "sphere" of intelligence rather than from any special individual, and for that very reason it may lack a peculiar personal character, such as characterizes friendly messages between companion souls, while it gains immensely in profundity of sentiment and grandiloquence of speech. The work of Davis was evidently far more to set people thinking concerning mighty problems relating to universal life than to give them private information relative to their personal affairs; yet, because the smaller can always be included within the greater the diligent student of the Harmonial Philosophy can find almost every question fully answered which pertains to the personal side of life here and hereafter. The "magic staff," which Davis said he was recommended, by his spiritual prompters, always to rely upon in every time of doubt and difficulty, was couched in these words: "Behold, here is thy magic staff: UNDER ALL CIRCUMSTANCES KEEP AN EVEN MIND. Take it; try it; walk with it; talk with it; lean on it; believe on it forever." We are told that these words came to him in radiant light, but a doubt seized him, and he asked: Is that longest sentence my magic staff, "Under all circumstances keep an even mind," is that the mystic cane which I thought I had lost or forgotten? In a twinkling the sheet of whiteness vanished, and in its place beamed forth YES. This satisfied him, and from that day forward he declares that he always leaned on that reliable staff, which never deserted him throughout his long, eventful life, which only closed when he was past eighty-three years of age. This revelation came to him in 1844, some time previous to the more wonderful experiences which quickly and thickly followed, till at length we find no less than twenty-seven wonderful volumes growing under his hand, in consequence of his always following the guidance of that marvelous inspiration which exalted him to the rank of a truly marvelous prophet and philosopher. Personal details are always interesting when they concern remarkable personages, for they serve to throw some light upon the temperament as well as character of those who are destined to perform unusual work in the world. Davis says of himself, when reviewing his boyhood years: "I had a love of truth; a reverence for knowledge; a somewhat cheerful disposition; a deficient imagination; unbelief or ignorance concerning the existence of ghosts, etc.; dread of death, and a still greater dread of encountering what might exist beyond the grave; a tendency to spontaneous somnambulism; an ear for what I then called imaginary voices; a memory defective as to dates; a mind nearly barren of ordinary education; a heart very sympathetic in cases of trial and suffering; and lastly I was disposed to meditation and the freedom of solitude." Speaking of his physical condition, he says that his body was imperfectly developed; breast narrow; spine short and weak; stomach very sensitive; muscular fabric unsound and inefficient; nervous system highly impressible, and he ends this uninviting description of his personal appearance and condition by declaring that he was not calculated to inspire strangers with much interest in his existence. These statements are of great scientific interest in so far as they furnish overwhelming proof that the development of the psychic faculty in a delicate lad, when wisely carried forward, far from leading to physical disability or mental deterioration, served to build up a robust mind and body, which not only endured considerable physical and mental exertion through a protracted lifetime, but also served the benign and noble purpose of conveying a vast amount of health-giving information to multitudes. That there are dangers connected with sensitiveness of every kind, no reasonable student will deny, but these are often greatly exaggerated, and in no instances is this rendered so painfully apparent as among people who foolishly discountenance and berate all exercise of supraphysical faculty. Among the many works of Davis his "Lyceum Manual" is singularly fascinating and affords a beautiful and comprehensive basis for the healthy instruction and exercise of children and young people in liberal Sunday Schools. Though the Lyceum Movement has somewhat waned in America, it has taken deep root, and is now greatly flourishing all over Great Britain and in many of the British Colonies. The system of teaching and exercising is so beautiful and natural that it unfolds the whole nature of the youth or maiden who follows it out in its entirety, and instead of forcing upon children doubtful theological dogmas, which no one attempts to fully comprehend, young people in a Lyceum are gently led on through a contemplation of the beauties of external nature to penetrate into the mysteries of the yet more glorious spiritual universe. In the Fifth Volume of the "Great Harmonia" we are confronted with almost a complete epitome of the teachings of the world's greatest seers and sages, from very ancient to quite modern times, and through all these narratives we can trace far more than ordinary insight into the underlying principles which these master minds have clothed in systems of thought and embodied in schools of philosophy, the influence of which is at this day even greater than when these mighty doctrines were originally promulgated. We here append a few citations:

From "The Great Harmonia," Volume II, entitled "The Teacher," we extract the following (page 250): "I consider motion the first manifestation of mind—an indication of the Great Mind which resides back of, and in, Nature; and a prophetical indication of the existence of a corresponding mind as an ultimate or perfection of Nature.

"I consider Life the first development of Motion, and the second indication of intelligence.

"I consider Sensation the first development of Life, and the third indication of future or ultimate Intelligence.

"I consider Intelligence the highest development of Motion, Life, and Sensation, and a perfect manifestation of the internal living and unchangeable organization, and when I employ the terms Soul, Spirit, and Mind, I mean the internal and immortal individual. When Motion, Life, Sensation, and Intelligence are conjoined and organized, I term that organization a unity of elements and attributes; and these elements and attributes arrange according to their natural order, under the comprehensive terms of Love and Wisdom—terms which are perfectly expressive of the natural characteristics and legitimate manifestations of those internal principles. Therefore, when I use the nouns substantive—Soul, Spirit, Mind, and Individual—the thought which suggests their employment is resting invariably upon the inward Homo, upon the individual Oneness, which is constructed upon those principles which elevate that oneness above the plane of change and disorganization. Hence the question is answered affirmatively —the terms are unqualifiedly synonymous."

The question referred to was: Are Soul, Spirit, and Mind synonymous? — one which is so frequently asked to-day that we selected the answer to it out of an immense variety of replies to all sorts of questions put to A. J. Davis, thinking it might serve almost better than any other to elucidate the philosophy of the Poughkeepsie Seer in his own words.

We will not attempt any commentary upon the words quoted, because we desire to acquaint our readers with what a truly remarkable seer has uttered, rather than to put any gloss of our own upon his words by argument or comparison. Concerning the final destiny of the individual immortal human entity, Davis says, in reply to a query thereon (page 254): "The Spirit will have no 'final home'; because to an immortal being rest would be intolerable—it would be next to annihilation." . . . "But the spirit will progress eternally! It will always be in harmony with surrounding circumstances, and thus will always reside in heaven. The same differences will exist in future spheres of life as exist in this world,—I mean those differences which are established by the real intrinsic perfection of the constitution, education, and harmony of the individual. But the spirit will walk in those shining paths which angels tread, in opening communications between the celestial inhabitants of celestial spheres and those high-born spirits of our earth." Only one more quotation will we offer from the vast mass of material at our disposal, as the object of this essay is to whet our readers' appetites for the massive volumes from which these brief excerpts are extracted. This last morsel is from "What and Where is God?" (page 270): "Surrounded by an inconceivable number of forms and organizations,—each one of them occupying a specific and progressive position in Nature,—the human mind can but perceive that the cause of them must be, Himself, an infinite Cause; that to produce organizations he must be, Himself, first, Intelligent; and that to produce an infinite machine, he must be, Himself, not only organized and intelligent, but he must have had some glorious end or result to accomplish, according to which his Universal Machinery was constructed. Surely, this is plain reasoning. God, therefore, philosophically considered, is an infinite Cause; Nature is an infinite Effect; and the object, for the accomplishment of which the whole was thus constituted, is the infinite Use or End. God is the Great Positive Mind;—all else is Negative." Atheism indeed receives no support from Davis, as it receives none from any of the world's spiritual enlighteners; but neither does any narrow theology receive endorsement — an all-embracing God is the only real Deity.

CHAPTER XIX.

BIBLE SYMBOLISM—AARON'S BREASTPLATE AND OTHER TYPICAL ORNAMENTS AND EMBLEMS—THE MORAL INFLUENCE OF BEAUTY AND THE SIGNIFICANCE OF COLOR.

Among the most attractive symbols of antiquity none can be more beautiful and expressive than precious stones, and these have always figured very largely in religious ritual as well as in secular adornment. Nowhere in the Bible can we find a more impressive instance of the use of glittering gems than in the breastplate of the Jewish high priest, Aaron, whose adornments are minutely described in the twenty-eighth chapter of Exodus, verses 15-21, as follows: "Thou shalt make the breastplate of judgment with cunning work, after the work of the ephod thou shalt make it; of gold and of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine twined linen shalt thou make it. Four-square it shall be, being doubled; a span shall be the length thereof, and a span shall be the breadth thereof. And thou shalt set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones; the first row shall be a sardis (ruby), a topaz, and a carbuncle; this shall be the first row. And the second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. And the third row a ligure (cyanus), an agate, and an amethyst. And the fourth row shall be a beryl, and an onyx, and a jasper. They shall be set in gold in their inclosings. And the stones shall be with the names of the Children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name shall they be according to the Twelve Tribes." This magnificent breastplate, called Urim and Thummim, was regarded in ancient sacerdotal days as a special instrument for obtaining information from Heaven, a fact which throws much light upon the sacred magic of the Israelites of old. A very interesting and elaborate dissertation concerning this breastplate is contained in "The Science of Correspondences Elucidated," by Edward Madely and B. F. Barrett, in which the authors claim that we have a key to its interior significance by dividing its four sections thus: First row downward, predominating color, Red, Celestial Love of Good. Second row, Reddish Blue, Celestial Love of Truth. Third row, Whitish Blue, Spiritual love of Good. Fourth row, Bluish White, Spiritual Love of Truth. The distinction here made so definitely between Truth and Good is in strict agreement with all of Swedenborg's discriminations, with which these authors are in complete accord, and we shall all do well to ponder thoughtfully exactly wherein the difference really lies. Truth is of the enlightened understanding and addresses itself to intellect, to reason in particular, while Good has to do directly with our affections, which, though intimately associated with our understanding, are nevertheless distinct from it. As very great interest is now being widely taken in some supposed connection between the twelve Signs of the Zodiac, the twelve Tribes of Israel, and certain precious stones, our readers may be interested to know that an ancient tradition assigns a ruby to Reuben; an emerald to Judah; a cyanus (lapis-lazuli) to Gad; a turquoise (beryl) to Zebulon; a topaz to Simeon; a sapphire to Dan; an agate to Asher; an onyx to Joseph; a carbuncle to Levi; a diamond to Naphthali; an amethyst to Issachar; a jasper to Benjamin. Turning to Numbers, Chapter II, we find the following classification of the twelve Tribes, with their standard bearers: Judah heads the three tribes to the East; Reuben to the South; Ephraim to the West; Dan to the North; the Camp of the Levites and the Tabernacle of the Congregation being in the midst. The same order is indicated in the order of march described in the same book (Chapter X) when the Ark of the Covenant is carried in front of the army. The different arrangements at various times, and in altering circumstances, readily suggests varying significations denoting the changing states of human experience. Red stones always occupy the place of highest esteem, because red is the first of the primaries and is universal in its correspondence, it being the color of the completed octave. As Adam only means a red man, and red is the lowest of the seven prismatic hues according to rate of vibration, it is not only a title applied to the sensuous man, not yet awakened to spiritual consciousness, but is equally applied to those who are regenerated, whom we designate "second Adam," like the upper A which commences a new scale in music. "Stones of Fire" are often mentioned in the Bible in connection with great judgments and mighty deliverances, which are frequently referred to as preceded by "hailstones and coals of fire." In the extremely fascinating imagery of the marvelous book of Ezekiel we find allusions to precious gems which throw a large amount of light upon their mystical as well as magical significance. By the use of these two terms in the above connection we mean by magical all that pertains to the working of outward wonders by the employment of prescribed and tested ceremonial rites; by mystical we mean interior results obtained in a spiritual manner without any recourse to ritual of any description. The mystical method is very much higher and more abidingly reliable than the magical, though both are mentioned with approbation in the Bible, each being adapted to a particular stage of human conscious susceptibility to Divine and Celestial influxes. In the twenty-eighth chapter of Ezekiel we are told that the King of Tyre has been in Eden, the Garden of God, where every precious stone was his covering until he fell into iniquity and was consequently expelled and dethroned. When, in the days of his moral uprightness, this monarch was figuratively on God's holy mountain it is said that he walked to and fro amid "stones of fire," at which time he was designated "a covering cherub." This clearly shows that in ancient times such expressions were used to denote high offices held by holy people who were worthy of such exalted station, and not permitted to retain it in any case after they had disqualified themselves by the practice of unrighteousness. Many people to-day are asking whether any value attaches to the actual wearing of gems, or whether we must attribute all alleged and seeming efficacy to the force of auto-suggestion. A reasonable reply to such enquiries must be at least threefold. First, we must remember that jewels are imprisoned sunlight and they have truly a force of their own, to which highly sensitive people are peculiarly susceptible; this is a demonstrable scientific proposition which can be tested and proved experimentally by Materialists as readily as by Occultists. Second, associations with gems are extremely permanent, and these are psychical as well as physical, as psychometry abundantly reveals; a gem is extremely retentive of any influence it has absorbed, and many precious stones —opals and pearls especially—are very susceptible to the condition of the persons who wear them. Third, individual taste has much to do with the effect which a stone will have on its wearer, but tastes, preferences and antipathies are revealers of character and temperament, and unless there is some very forcible extraneous cause for our likes and dislikes as applied to gems and colors we invariably are attracted instinctively to those stones and colors whose vibrations agree with us and help us, while we are similarly repelled by such as either overstimulate or depress us, in consequence of their rate of vibration being either too high or too low to meet our necessities. The High Priest in ancient Israel wore a breastplate composed of twelve precious stones because he must represent all the twelve tribes equally, and a man capable of filling so highly representative a position worthily must be beyond the ordinary run of attractions and repulsions. A thoroughly balanced man or woman admires all beautiful objects in nature and in art, and feels at home with all of them, at the same time understanding their respective uses and significances and employing them accordingly. Among gems the diamond is the most universally admired and worn; this is largely on account of its bright all-including whiteness, out of which every brilliant hue can sparkle in the sunshine, and also in artificial radiance. Almost every one feels at home with the diamond, just as we are all at home with white, while different limited colors affect us differently in our varying moods and seem highly appropriate in such situations as demand them, but quite out of place in other circumstances, though in themselves they are always beautiful. There is not the slightest reason why we should not avail ourselves of the beauty of nature, and surely nothing can be more unnatural and ridiculous than to dispense with all adornment when nature is so lavishly profuse with decoration, and it requires no more time or effort, in the long run at any rate, to make life outwardly as well as inwardly beautiful, than it does to peg along in a manner calculated to lower instead of raise the tone of our vitality, and thereby lessen instead of increase our working capacity. Though we all know that foolish extravagance in dress and adornment, together with all other forms of ostentatious display, are not productive of desirable results in human society, we ought not ever to be unmindful of the fact that sordid ugliness and crime are often very intimate associates. John Ruskin never hesitated to preach his gospel of beauty as a moral elevator, and it certainly does appear that, on an average, there is far less crime where beauty is cultivated than where ugliness reigns supreme. Drunkenness is often largely due to a state of mental dulness bordering on despair. Men and women work in dingy workshops and live in dingy dwellings unworthy of the name of homes, and with what result? They almost invariably exhibit signs of moral, mental and physical deterioration, and are very rarely as cheerful in disposition or as optimistic in sentiment as those who surround themselves with more attractive objects. We may well feel compassion and express sympathy for all who are apparently compelled to live in gloomy places, but there can be no valid excuse for deliberately planting ourselves in such surroundings, except for the benevolent purpose of ministering to those who are incarcerated therein. When we have the choice of circumstances in our own hands it would be well indeed did we invariably elect to surround ourselves with beauty, and it was originally intended that the people at large should be instructed in this lesson by beholding the extreme beauty of the sacred places in which they performed acts of worship. Those who seemingly require no special temple and no officiating priests can certainly lift their souls in aspiration amid the glories of undisfigured natural surroundings, and as the highest compliment which can be paid to any artist is to assure him that his work is a perfect facsimile of nature, we can have no greater beauty even in structures of the rarest magnificence than we behold in those charming districts of the world where natural scenery is allowed to remain untampered with. The Garden Cities now springing up in England are exerting a highly beneficial effect upon the civilization of the country, because they are helping people to get further away from that hideous artificiality which has for a long time past exerted an undermining influence upon health and morals. Rapid transit is beginning to prove an immense benefit to multitudes by making it quite easy for men of family to transact business in the centre of a great city and bring up children in the very heart of a lovely country. Dress as well as circumstances and diet receives a great deal of attention in the Mosaic Law, and not only the attire of those who are set apart to perform peculiar religious functions, but the ordinary costume of the masses, receives some definite notice. It is an undeniable fact that Jews to-day, as a community, are very fond of jewelry, and it has been said that the very word jewel pertains to Judaism. Be that as it may, the Old Testament lays great stress on personal adornment, in addition to cleanliness, in many imposing instances, and in so doing it does not show itself barbaric, as some foolish people suppose, probably because all unsophisticated peoples are, like children, fond of bright colors and general display; but in this matter, as in very many others, it evinces singularly deep insight into what is conducive to general well-being.

Colors apart from jewels (which, however, embody them in the most perfect manner and to the fullest possible degree) have a value and exert an influence far beyond what is ordinarily supposed. Dr. Edwin Babbitt, in his famous treatise, "The Principles of Light and Color," has given out an immense amount of information of extreme value, which has not received anything like the degree of attention its great merit richly deserves, though we are happy to say that the large illustrated volume, rather too ponderous for general reading, has found its way into a very large number of libraries in many lands, and we have good evidence that it has beneficently influenced the practice of many progressive doctors, and also helped many sufferers on the road to recovery by explaining to them a rational, and not difficult, mode of home treatment. In any country retreat or seaside resort it ought to be easy to open up a Solarium and apply the Light and Color treatment, provided a director can be found for each institution who really understands the science of the system, and is provided with an adequate mechanical equipment; and even without a full supply of chromo-lenses and thermolumes, a great deal of useful work can be done by simply fitting up a few rooms with the necessary colored window glass. The house ought to be so situated that it commands more than an average amount of sunlight, and the various rooms—in the Northern Hemisphere with Southern, and in the Southern Hemisphere with Northern exposures—should be equipped with colored windows, always kept scrupulously clean, so that the special rays of light needed in different conditions can be enjoyed to the full by those undergoing treatment. But though it is to sunshine primarily that we must look for the color vibrations necessary, we have in electric light so valuable an adjunct that at seasons of the year and in localities where the sunshine is often very limited we can arrange electric light fixtures so that we obtain almost the same results by night as by day, and in cloudy as in brilliant weather. A thoroughly equipped Solarium, furnished in every detail in accordance with the prescription of certain highly trained and widely experienced Occultists, would be nothing less than a magnificent Temple of the Sun, in which patients to-day might receive treatment identical with that which made many an ancient temple famous. Multitudes of sufferers all over the world are readily amenable to Solaric and Electric treatment simply and beautifully administered, and in these days when new methods are eagerly sought after and painstakingly examined, the time is indeed opportune for a revival of this best, simplest, humanest method of healing through direct co-operation with Nature in one of her most glorious and attractive forms the world has ever witnessed. With the rapidly increasing sensitiveness of the present generation crude methods and gross remedies are passing out of vogue; there is, constantly, a loud and imperative call for measures which will prove effective and convincing and in no way injure or terrify nervous invalids. In Solaric treatment, accompanied by wise and beneficent Suggestion, we find exactly what our age requires, viz., a Psycho-Physical method which embraces a reasonable appeal to the mind and also satisfies a widespread demand for something which can be readily comprehended by persons who have not grown to a state where they can be fully satisfied with methods exclusively metaphysical. Nature everywhere employs Form, Sound, and Color; we are, therefore, thoroughly in accord with Nature if we avail ourselves of these three great aids to harmony, which were all acknowledged and employed by the greatest healers of antiquity, whose marvelous achievements stand out to-day on the pages of world-wide history, not only challenging our attention and exciting our wonder, but bidding us drink from the same overflowing natural fountain from which they drank so wisely and so copiously, that we too may demonstrate in our age, as they did in theirs, the boundlessness of the supply furnished to us by the glorious central luminary which is the agent of all our life and the active sustainer of all growth and beauty.

The seven prismatic hues may be regarded as four landings and three stairways, symbolically speaking. Red is the first floor, Yellow the second, Blue the third, Violet the fourth. Orange is the first staircase, Green the second, Indigo the third. Red always excites the physical system and can be most advantageously employed to antidote all sluggish and costive conditions. Orange is less physically stimulating than Red, and as it inclines toward Yellow, which stimulates intellectual activity, it is extremely useful in those numerous instances where a mild tonic and purgative is required for mind and body at once. Yellow is, par excellence, an excitant of the intellect and it exercises a cooling, refreshing, and mildly stimulating effect upon those whose work requires constant and diligent attention to intellectual pursuits. Green is the home color of our planet, and standing in the middle of the scale is a corrective of nostalgia and a most harmonizing and tranquilizing color to employ in all places where many people exhibiting diverse characteristics are required to congregate. Blue is the decidedly ethical harmonizer and is to be specially recommended in all cases where passions are too easily excited and where material objects exert too great a sway. This color is a soporific, a true conqueror of insomnia and nervous headaches; fevers yield to its tranquilizing influence, as its action is to cool the blood, lower the pulse, and generally soothe senses while tending to free the mind from anxiety and worry, leaving it free to engage in the profitable contemplation of ideal conditions. Purple (or Indigo) excites toward spiritual contemplation and always suggests intellectual, coupled with moral, dignity. Violet is the spiritual color, par excellence, and it is found extremely effective in aiding well-conducted psychic experiments. To fit up a private solarium is not very expensive, as only eight rooms are necessary, though we can easily add profitably to their number. One room must have clear white glass, as white is the common unifier, and the other seven chambers must have respectively one each of the seven prismatics. A ninth room for the introduction of Rose Pink would be a great advantage, as this lovely color, though not one of the mystic seven, is of immense value in counteracting despondency and all pessimistic tendencies. Pink is the color of hope, and quite often light streaming through pink windows or electric light globes will drive away all tendency to gloom and to despair, and so invigorate a melancholy sufferer as to go far to prevent insanity and suicide. We trust that these few hints on Color Treatment will serve to awaken increased interest in this momentous theme, which needs to be pursued indefinitely.

CHAPTER XX.

LIFE AND MATTER—THE LATEST VIEWS ON EVOLUTION—POSITION OF SIR OLIVER LODGE.

Among modern thinkers of high repute in the English-speaking sections of the scientific world scarcely any name stands out more prominently at present than that of Sir Oliver Lodge, the distinguished president of Birmingham University in England. Standing, as this conspicuous educator does, in the very front rank of modern teachers,—who while strictly scientific have also a deep regard for the noblest elements in religion,—this truly learned man presents us with far more moderate views of the general doctrine of evolution than we need ever expect to find in the writings of materialistic evolutionists like Haeckel on the one hand and conservative theologians on the other. The present attitude taken to Charles Darwin, as evidenced during the celebration at Cambridge in 1909, shows that the foolish idolatry which was at one time lavished on that great biologist's writings by his fervid admirers, equally with the absurd denunciation of his views poured forth by his vituperative opponents, has practically died away, and given place to a much fairer and milder estimate of the great scientist and his remarkable discoveries. There was a time when the theory of evolution was regarded with horror by the Church of England, and hailed with delight by professing atheists, who thought they found in it complete confirmation of their denial of Deity. But all such views have now been relegated to the limbo of forgetfulness, at least in scientific circles; though they still survive among the unthinking and the illiterate. Darwin himself was never dogmatic, and he repeatedly warned the public against accepting as final theories which he put forth tentatively. He was, however, very positive in his declaration of ascertained facts, and he always contended that the only reasonable method of dealing with facts was to allow them to speak for themselves, regardless of any theories which might stand in the way of their impartial investigation. Prof. Alfred Russel Wallace, who was quite independently a co-discoverer with Darwin of many important facts bearing directly on the theory of evolution is a confirmed Spiritualist, while Darwin was a confessed agnostic. This circumstance is quite sufficient to show that the theory of evolution, even when accepted in its entirety as it is by Wallace, does not by any means preclude a studious observer of natural phenomena from keeping a perfectly open mind with reference to evidences concerning other planes of existence than the physical; natural facts of a material character neither serving to confirm or deny the reality of a spiritual universe. Sir Oliver Lodge is far less agnostic than Darwin and less spiritualistic than Wallace, his position being that of an earnest student of psychic phenomena whose general attitude to all things super-physical remains to an extent indefinite, i. e., from the standpoint of those who consider nothing definite unless it be incontestably dogmatic. We may safely say that a truly scientific attitude of mind, being always open to evidence and constantly engaged in experimentation, must of necessity consider a great many questions as remaining always open; for if we are continually learning more and more of Nature's processes, we are compelled often to take and hold hypothetical positions on our way to ultimately certain conclusions; and even certainties are not finally final, for there is always something yet to be discovered which may throw fresh light upon questions we may now consider definitely settled. Though this position is very unsatisfactory to minds which long to rest in completed certainties, to the truly inquiring intellect this constant search for added knowledge constitutes life's chief delight, and it is certainly quite consistent with the ennobling thought that this world is a school in which we are being gradually educated to prepare us for higher seminaries when we have graduated from this particular college in the universe.

There are certain sublime statements expressed in noble poetry, such as Whittier's splendid couplet: "Step by step since time began We see the steady gain of man," which harmonize exactly with all reasonable views of evolution now entertained and promulgated by the world's leading intellects who are devoting themselves to ever-enlarging research into the mysteries of Nature. Such a title for a book as "Life and Matter," at once challenges attention, because it distinctly separates the idea of Life from the thought of Matter, thereby carrying us back to the earliest and most satisfying view of the unchanging relationship between the two. Life is the acting power; Matter is the substance acted upon, and it is through Matter of some grade or other that life is made manifest. Such in brief is the consensus of modern scientific as well as theosophical teachings. Matter can be of many grades, or planes, therefore we are not left to restrict the use of the word to the gross matter of the physical aspects of our globe. Once let this proposition be fully established and all difficulty vanishes when we are endeavoring to consider substantial worlds beyond as well as within the limit of our ordinary physical senses. Psychical Research, in which Sir Oliver Lodge has long taken very prominent part, has thoroughly convinced him, as it has also convinced many other prominent scientists, that telepathy, mental telegraphy, clairvoyance, and much else commonly regarded as mystical may be after all quite as natural and orderly as those more generally accepted uses of mental faculty with which the public at large has already become much more familiar. We are constantly making fresh discoveries concerning our inner selves which are adding considerably to our self-knowledge. We have looked upon ourselves for so long as confined within very narrow fields of action that we are naturally surprised, and to some extent bewildered, when we come to find out that no such limits need necessarily confine us. Every fresh scientific discovery and mechanical invention compels us to set to work to readjust our views of human capacity, and by the time we have become thoroughly accustomed to the achievements of the present day, we have admitted very much that our not very remote ancestors would have considered either incredible or supernatural. The scientific world does not attempt to draw any definite line between natural and supernatural, because it humbly confesses that it has by no means reached a perfect knowledge of the natural; and until one has done this, and knows that he has done it, it is self-evidently absurd for him to talk about what lies beyond nature. The wise expression, "different planes of nature," used frequently by Annie Besant in her highly instructive book, "The Changing World," suffices to convey the idea that our present mental evolution is opening up before us some considerable knowledge of other grades of matter than those acknowledged by old school materialists, who in the face of all evidence in support of psychic experiences simply waived the whole question aside as one pertaining to a mixture of humbug and hallucination. Sir Oliver Lodge speaks of "would-be materialists," and of Haeckel's "conjectural philosophy," and he goes very far to prove that much has been accepted in Germany and elsewhere as demonstrated science which actually rests on no firm scientific foundation. In a chapter entitled "Monism" he says: "Between science and philosophy there need be no permanent barrier, nor need it be regarded as otherwise than permissible for a man of science occasionally to look over into the philosophic region and survey the territory on that side also, so far as his means permit. And if philosophers object to this procedure it must be because they have found by experience that men of science who have once transceuded or transgressed the boundary are apt to lose all sense of reasonable constraint and to disport themselves as if they had at length escaped into a region free from scientific trammels—a region where confident assertions might be freely made, where speculative hypothesis might rank as theory and where verification was both unnecessary and impossible."

Sir Oliver Lodge, after the above opening paragraphs, goes on to review Haeckel's views quite radically, and soon proceeds to prove the inconsistencies of that eminent German advocate of Scientific Monism, who now complains that many of his former colleagues have deserted him, and he in his advancing age is left as an almost solitary witness for a position which was extremely popular in the earlier days of the controversy pertaining to evolution. "The Riddle of the Universe," considered by many readers to be Haeckel's masterpiece, contains a vast amount of valuable as well as interesting matter, and on the question of the rights of animals this veteran takes ground almost identical with that occupied by the great bulk of professed Theosophists. It is only where he is negational that his views come sharply into collision with those of nature students, who, while fully appreciating the values and beauties of the external aspects of the universe, are at the same time keenly alive to the yet sublimer wonders and more expansive glories of regions undiscoverable by simply physical investigations. Life, according to Sir Oliver Lodge, is "a guiding and directing principle," and he very pertinently asks us to consider "whether guidance and intelligent direction are really possible, or whether everything proceeds according to some blind necessity from which will and purpose are altogether excluded." It is when discussing the difficult and intricate question of human free-agency that this ripe thinker contributes, in our judgment, a particularly valuable contribution to modern thought. On that vexed problem he says: "Life is something outside the scheme of mechanics—outside the categories of matter and energy; though it can nevertheless control or direct material forces—timing them and determining their place of application—subject always to the laws of energy and all other mechanical laws; supplementing or accompanying these laws, therefore, but contradicting or traversing them no whit."

From the foregoing we can readily trace an attitude of mind very similar to that of nearly all Theosophists, whose particular contribution to philosophy is the stress laid by them on the incessant orderly activity of intelligent entities on other planes of Nature than the physical; it being asserted uncompromisingly that just as we on earth have limited and ever-increasing ability to direct exterior nature, but never except through the agency of unvarying law, so on the other side of the veil of sense, where clairvoyance may sometimes penetrate, intelligent entities more powerful, because wiser than we, are manipulating events precisely as we manipulate them, so far as necessary conformity with law is concerned, but in consequence of far greater acquaintanceship with law, manifesting ability to produce results very far transcending all we can yet accomplish.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE LAW OF SEVEN AND THE LAW OF UNITY.

In a curious old book of Arcane Teachings we find the sevenfold idea carried out with great wealth of detail, particularly as regards the Seven Cosmic Laws which regulate the Universe, at all events so far as humanity on earth has yet discovered them. These Seven Laws are enumerated in the following definite order:

1. Law of Orderly Trend, under the operation of which order is universally made manifest from the groupings of atoms in the formation of the minutest organism to the arrangement of planetary bodies in the constitution of gigantic Solar Systems.

2. Law of Analogy, through the operation of which we can trace a perfect agreement, or exact correspondence, between all forms of manifestation in whatsoever direction we may investigate. What is true of Matter is likewise true of Energy and Mind. The great Hermetic axiom, "As above, so below," is revealed through the changeless operation of this everywhere-to-be-discovered law. An ancient Arcane axiom, "Ex Uno disce Omnes" (By the discovery of one, learn thou of all) applies throughout esoteric or occult teaching to all those diverse but intimately inter-related plans of Nature concerning which so much is written in the popular Theosophical literature of to-day.

3. Law of Sequence, in which is included all activities grouped under the general heading "Cause and Effect." This is the Karmic Law, the basis of Lex Talionis, or Law of Retaliation, which certainly does manifest itself throughout the Universe, despite the frantic endeavors of humanity to evade its operation. Nothing can occur by chance, there must be an efficient precedent for every consequent; nothing stands alone, therefore no act can be rightly looked upon as isolated.

4. Law of Rhythm, through the incessant working of which depends the variety manifested in the Cosmos. Everything is perpetually vibrating. To understand how to regulate vibration is to possess the Key to relatively unlimited power.

5. Law of Balance, by means of which is found the true explanation of equilibrium, or compensations. To understand the working of this Law is to know the secret of Power and Poise.

6. Law of Cyclicity, which causes all things to move in Circles. Teachers of Arcane Science tell us that the wise and strong convert circles into spirals. and therefore instead of moving continually round and round, they rise in spirals, thus accomplishing those wonderful achievements which mark off Adepts or Initiates from the multitude of their contemporaries.

7. Law of Opposites, which is universally expressed in male and female, thesis and antithesis. In the knowledge of this law is to be found the great magical secret of regeneration which is essentially identical with transmutation and transubstantiation. The practical object and boundless result of understanding and applying these Seven Laws (or to speak still more accurately, seven manifestations of One Law) is to enable those who have attained this Knowledge to accomplish Magnum Opus through the joint activity of the will and intellect of the operator. Herein lies the Key to an actual demonstration of those transcendent abilities which are so largely claimed by many modern teachers who, though their theories are sound and excellent, do not as a rule succeed in making any very startling demonstrations of unusual power over environment.

The four following aphorisms are worthy of the deepest consideration:

1. The One Law is.

2. There is naught higher or elder than the One Law.

3. The One Law is Absolute, beyond Time, Space and Change, transcending the Three Principles and Seven Laws.

4. The One Law is the Efficient Reason of All-Things.

To consider these four aphorisms deeply and in detail would necessitate very profound study and the expenditure of much time and mental energy, but any student who will devote time and solitude to such deep and profitable meditation will surely be amply repaid both as regards mental illumination and increased ability to govern circumstances. The doctrine of Determinism taught in Arcane Philosophy is quite at variance with Fatalism, Pessimism and all other abnormal and corrupted systems which have owed their origin to garbled and distorted views concerning the operation of the changeless order of the Universe. No special event is divinely predetermined, foreordained, or predestined, but there is a sequence of causes and effects which no human power can vary. It is our reliance upon this very steadfastness of Nature which renders scientific progress possible, for without reasonable certainty that we shall reap according to our sowing there could be no rational engagement in any branch of enterprise.

Among the strikingly unique expressions employed by teachers of Arcane Philosophy, we find not the familiar Ex Nihilo nihil fit (out of nothing is made nothing) but Ex Nihilo Omnis fit (out of No-Thing all things are formed). This No-Thing of the Alchemists signifies original Cosmic Substance, unparticled, undifferentiated, from which all expressed objects proceed and into which they will at some time and in some way return. Such archaic teachings as these, coming from the wise instructors of our race in times of old, harmonize at every point with all those marvelous and fascinating scientific revelations which characterize the vigorous enterprise of the present (twentieth) century. What, we may well ask, is meant by Matter when modern scientists declare that, to the best of their knowledge, it is but a combination of ions or electrons? What, again, we may enquire has become of the stupid old materialism which was more difficult to grasp than even the wildest theological fantasies, if mind and life are traceable in all discovered substances from protoplasm to the human frame? Substance, Motion, Consciousness, are the three Principles we encounter everywhere. We are living not in a dead but in a living, not in an unconscious but in a conscious universe in which death is only change of expression and birth but assumption of some new garment.

As we are properly far more intensely interested in our human development and in the exercise of dominion over our environment than in any abstruse or abstract dissertations concerning the constitution of the Universe, we only follow the path of wisdom when our studies of the profound Mystery of Universal Law lead us to apply the truths we intellectually grasp to the constant betterment of our actual conditions.

For many centuries in India mighty philosophic concepts have been tacitly admitted by multitudes who have altogether failed to make practical application of the philosophy contained in Upanishats, Bhagavat-Gita, and other holy treatises venerated, often superstitiously, but seldom made use of in the only way which leads to the elevation of a nation. Western "hustle" together with Eastern laissez faire make an excellent combination, but one without the other is so unbalanced that it must inevitably lead to stolid resignation to a supposed inevitable or else to frantic hysterical endeavors to force results without regard to the orderly working of evolutionary development.

CHAPTER XXII

SPIRITUALISM AND THE DEEPENING OF SPIRITUAL LIFE.

This great topic immediaely invites two important questions: First, what are we to understand by Spiritualism? Second, what is meant by the deepening of our spiritual life?

In reply to the first inquiry it seems safe to say that the irreducible minimum of agreement among Spiritualists is the simple declaration that we are here and now spiritual entities, and being such survive the change commonly called death. Though this direct and widely inclusive statement is common to all who call themselves Spiritualists, it by no means covers the entire ground of spiritual philosophy. It is, indeed, little more than an introduction to it, for Spiritualism is so immensely wide in its ever-extending ramifications that there is scarcely a topic engaging human attention which does not come legitimately within the embrace of its implications.

There can be but three systems of philosophy appealing to thinkers: Spiritualism, Materialism, and Agnosticism. Materialism is practically dead in scientific circles; the ground is, therefore, virtually left to Spiritualists and Agnostics, who are now pretty evenly dividing intellectual territory. Of these two philosophical systems, one (Spiritualism) is decidedly affirmative, the other (Agnosticism) avowedly indefinite; and because of the incontrovertible fact that all human knowledge is only relative, there must always remain some place for a confession of ignorance on some questions, together with a most positive enunciation of knowledge concerning other matters. No intelligent man or woman can be exclusively either gnostic or agnostic, but there are many thoughtful persons whose intellectual position is one of wise caution, who do not hesitate to avow their positive conviction that the fundamental propositions of Spiritualism are fully demonstrable.

By reason of the exceeding wideness of the ground which must be traversed, many eminent men of science, including Sir William Crookes, are indisposed to speak as fervently on the side of pronounced Spiritualism as the no less famous Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, a circumstance which may be jointly attributed to varying degrees of first-hand evidence and to difference in natural mental predilection in the case of these equally distinguished scientists. We should always keep before us, in every discussion, the important fact that phenomena appealing strongly in the most favorable manner to one type of mind may prove actually distasteful to another type; this alone suffices to account for those diametrically opposed statements which we constantly encounter over illustrious signatures. To some people the thought of physical manifestations, ranging from "raps" to "materializations," is far from acceptable. They have no hope or desire that such phenomena may genuinely occur, while to many others, equally intelligent, these manifestations carry definite convictions and are sources of considerable comfort and joy. Unless we can approach so great a subject as Spiritualism without prejudice or predilection of any sort, we are apt to be unwittingly unjust at some point in our investigations. Only the thoroughly fair-minded, be they statesmen, scientists, clergymen or conjurors, are really competent to so investigate as to reach conclusions which will prove of genuine importance. Probably for this very reason much controversy is still raging, practically all over the world, concerning the use and value of Spiritualism, granted that its basic claims be reasonably established.

Our present theme necessitates an excursion into moral fields, into distinctively ethical as well as intellectual pasture-ground, for to "deepen spiritual life" must certainly mean vastly more than to convince the intellect of the survival of the human individual beyond physical dissolution. The first momentous question to be raised concerning any philosophy that we are invited to investigate is, What does it teach concerning human nature? As we are all human beings, that is the chief fundamental question of importance. As a candidate for general acceptance among philanthropists, Spiritualism has always this to commend it, that it elevates the idea of human life far beyond the level of materialistic negation, and it also disowns those mistaken views of religion which teach the depravity rather than the nobility of the root-nature common to us all. As "psychical research" continues, it is constantly bringing to light more and more evidence of the amazing greatness of the life we are living now and here, and so great has been the recent addition to the sum of our knowledge of psychology that the "subjective mind," or "sub-self," is responsible for many psychic marvels which before the days of Thomson Jay Hudson and his successors were compactly attributed to the action of our "departed" friends. Such a statement, though possessed of some superficial plausibility, is by no means either radical or rational when sifted to its foundations or carried forward to its ultimates, for instead of added knowledge concerning our own nature in the present world destroying the thought of spiritual communion, every additional discovery in the realm of telepathic and kindred action only goes to prove how spiritual intercourse is actually effected between living entities as at present situated. We are discovering and applying certain hitherto unknown possibilities resident within us. We find we are able to send and receive mental telegrams, cablegrams, and aerograms, seemingly without respect to physical distance, but always in accord with some mysterious law which we as yet but very imperfectly comprehend; all of which goes far to prove that we are functioning as spiritual beings at the present time, and that our external bodies are far less of us than we have generally been disposed to believe.

All this ever-extending knowledge of our interior being is rapidly sweeping away those old-time objections to Spiritualism which were based on extremely limited and almost entirely materialistic views of human nature. But this widening view of our common nature does not only afford us a larger idea of our capabilities, scientifically speaking; it gives us boundless reason for insisting with ever-increasing, confident earnestness upon the goodness of our nature, for this wonderful "sub-consciousness," about which so much is being written and said, is by no means diabolical but rather celestial in its inherent tendencies, when these are rescued from the clutch of excrescent attachments, which often veil, though they cannot destroy, the essential entity or ego. "Subjective," "sub-conscious" and "subliminal" are, as we all know, three words greatly in evidence in contemporary literature, and though they are certainly inadequate to account for all that many of their most frequent users seek to explain by means of them, they can well serve a definite, even though it be a distinctly limited, purpose. The prefix "sub" is so often used in two opposite ways that it is not always clear in what sense it is employed by a particular author unless we are familiar with his distinctive employment of the term.

F. W. H. Myers, in his very valuable treatise on "Human Personality, Its Survival of Bodily Death," compares us to trees whose rots are hidden while their trunks and branches are revealed. If such be a fair analogy, then what lies behind the mortal screen is "subjective" not in the sense of inferior but interior. Hudson, in all his writings, consistently used the phrase "subjective mind" in precisely that connection, though he appears to have frequently obscured some of his meanings by persistently employing a single phrase to cover ground which Mrs. Besant covers by using two definite titles. Among Theosophists in general, "super-consciousness" is the term employed to convey the idea of higher planes of Nature, "sub-consciousness" being reserved to describe what is actually, morally and spiritually speaking, below the level of our present human elevation. Be this as it may, for we have no wish to wrangle over phrases, it is clear that the "Emanuelists" and other useful workers in the ample field of psycho-therapy appeal with great confidence to what they feel to be some inner plane of consciousness which often readily responds to benevolent suggestion, and the whole structure of much mental treatment which is highly useful reposes on a foundation of faith in the willingness as well as ability of our inner selves to respond to healthy suggestions. Spiritualists who cling to an old-fashioned terminology often dispute with students of similar phenomena who speak another language; it is therefore highly desirable that honest inquirers should get together and compare notes diligently with a view to reaching some clear conclusion which may be mutually comprehensible.

We should all spurn the idea as absurd should anyone tell us that, because we have certain powers of our own and do much work individually, therefore we never act in concert with our neighbors; but such a statement, ridiculous as it must appear, is not necessarily less logical than the contention that there is no communion with our friends in spirit who have "crossed the border" because we have demonstrated mental telegraphy and telephony and frequently enjoy inter-communion in psychic ways while still continuing incarnate. Every fact has a value of its own, and the only rational way of dealing with facts is to compare them one with another with a view to arriving at some lucid synthesis. Spiritualism can reasonably be said to include very much more than a simple establishment of the rudimentary doctrine of survival of bodily death, and this the accumulated history of the past, since 1848, abundantly demonstrates. Spiritualism is the pioneer among all modern cults. The Theosophical Society was founded in 1875, and the Christian Science and many other movements, in their present organized form, are even younger.

If Spiritualists resolve to do the great work which they are well capable of performing to-day, as in years gone by, both in their organised and unorganised capacities, they should especially endeavor to unify the many diverging, but not properly contradictory, schools of thought at present striving for supremacy. There can be no true spiritual life where there is dissension and disunion. Unity, but not uniformity, is ever essential to co-operative activity, and only as co-operators can we live a truly spiritual life. Intellectual differences being clearly unavoidable, we must look for a basis of agreement upon a plane deeper than the intellect, and that plane is the seat of truly philanthropic sentiment. Too often in all our researches into the mysteries of the universe we seem to be actuated solely by a desire to get, not give, and it is on account of this selfish tendency that we often obtain so very little of permanent value among the floods of messages which reach us through the gateway of mediumship, even though many communications are received which from the simply evidential standpoint are truly of great significance. There are distinct standpoints from which to judge all alleged communications, viz., the scientific and the ethical. From the scientific viewpoint, as Dr. J. H. Hyslop and other well-known authors and experimenters frequently declare, the more trivial the message (in some respects) the greater its convincingness, while from the ethical side a totally different standard of judgment must be considered. At first we are all naturally curious to know if any psychic phenomena can be proved indubitably genuine; our interest is centred entirely in the fact of simple evidence, but after we have fully established certain rudimentary conclusions, if we are actuated to any appreciable extent by benevolent motives, we desire to do positive good with our Spiritualism, instead of enjoying spirit communion simply as a private luxury or an intellectual entertainment. Wireless telegraphy had to be demonstrated before Marconi's famous system could gain the credence of the commercial world, but now that it is no longer the startling sensation it was some years ago, people are wisely endeavoring to make such real use of it that accidents at sea may be avoided, and in case of danger, relief may be quickly afforded to all in jeopardy. We may well rest satisfied with the thought that on unseen planes of Nature there exist all sorts and conditions of entities with whom we can and do commune far more readily and frequently than we are usually inclined to believe, and it is scarcely going too far to say that no claim is too extravagant to be within the scope of possibility where such communion is concerned.

We are accustomed to speak glibly of "supernal" and "infernal" influences without realizing sufficiently that those entities who are commonly called "angels" on the one hand and "devils" on the other are only ordinary human beings, in the one case higher and in the other instance lower in development than our immediate selves. Masters, adepts, initiates, guardian angels, etc., are only titles given to human spirits further advanced in power and knowledge than we are at present. The fact that we conceive of them and appear to comprehend their attributes is excellent proof that we contain all they express; the only real difference between their condition and ours consisting in the fact that they have actually developed many faculties which are at present dormant in ourselves. These higher intelligences are commonly called "elder brethren" by Theosophists, and that is an excellent expression on account of the clearness with which it suggests their relation to us and ours to them. Nothing can be more self-evident than that we are all substantially well agreed as to what are celestial attributes. No one takes exception to the words attributed to the great Master of Christendom: "I am among you as one that serveth," and "he who would be greatest among you, let him be a minister to all." The law of ministration is always strongly emphasized by spiritually-minded thinkers, and we are actually getting used to the daring statement made by many "New Thought" advocates that "God is servant to man," which is only the other side of a deep, vital truth expressed familiarly in the time-honored phrase, "We are all servants of God." Great propositions must be turned upside down and inside out before we can intelligently estimate their comprehensiveness. It has often occurred that some single aspect of the advantages of spiritual inter-communion has been studied and valued out of all due proportion to others, and that aspect has often been the one which has appealed to the self-seeking rather than to the neighbor-blessing tendencies of our indubitably complex human character. We wish others to serve us, but we are not as a rule so ready to serve as to be served. We are all ready enough to sing with feeling, "Angels ever bright and fair, take, oh, take me to your care," but we are not, as a rule, quite so ready to pray that we may officiate as angels taking others to our care. It is this aspect which must be brought prominently forward if we are truly in earnest concerning the deepening of our spiritual life, or, in other words, developing real practical spirituality.

We know well enough that there are many good definitions of the great word spirit, but the simplest and most obvious of them all, breath, from the Latin spiritus, must by no means be ignored. We are often reminded that we have reduced a Latin word of eight letters to an English word of six, and then have forgotten (apparently) the source whence our abbreviated term has been derived. This error is being rapidly corrected by the vast amount of attention now given to breathing exercises of all descriptions, from the simplest to the most complicated, but here again we are confronted with the same old question: Why are we practising Yoga or anything therewith connected? The breath of life is the original definition of spirit, and to breathe rhythmically is essential, alike to mental and bodily vigor. Health is now happily being re-defined as wholeness, therefore religion and science, long divorced, are now being re-married with excellent prospects for producing living and abiding offspring, who will not prove unmindful of sanitary law as applied to all phases of existence. A book of great value, "Religion and Medicine," the joint product of two distinguished clergymen and a famous physician of Boston, U. S. A., embodies many of the latest and most popular teachings of the Church and the medical profession, when the two combine to wage a war of extirpation upon all phases of disease, physical, mental, moral and spiritual, through the benign agency of well-directed thought, inspired by righteous love, and sustained by reasonable faith in the essential goodness of our common human nature. Rev. Elwood Worcester, D. D., and Rev. Samuel McComb, D. D., are attached as co-rectors to the now famous Emanuel Church in Boston, which gave name to the much discussed Emanuel movement. Dr. Isidor Coriat is a physician of distinct eminence. These three learned gentlemen have produced between them a singularly valuable volume, in which ancient and modern thought and practice are placed side by side in such a manner as powerfully to suggest the vital thought of constant Divine immanence and the permanent certainty of good accomplished, regardless of time and country, if we but place ourselves in receptive attitude toward beneficent spiritual influx: precisely as, on the physical plane, we may enjoy fresh air and brilliant sunshine if we only arrange and open our windows and ventilators in a scientific manner so as to avail ourselves freely of the copious natural blessings which are incessantly at the disposal of rich and poor alike. It is often urged by opponents of the "Emanuel" and similar movements, that the Church of to-day is placing altogether too much stress upon physical healing and mundane affairs in general. A complaint is made, in ecclesiastical and lay journals alike, that our religion is properly a "spiritual" affair, and therefore cannot concern itself in any direct way with either the cure of bodily distempers or making provision for physical necessities; the good clergymen and others who are engaging in much excellent, seemingly secular, work, are roundly berated in many quarters for stepping aside from their proper field of "spiritual" activities and devoting themselves to matters of less moment and far lower interest than the "soul-saving" occupation in which their fanatical critics consider they should be exclusively engaged. Much the same cry is not infrequently raised in Spiritualistic societies by people who believe in a kind of narrow Spiritualism, which deals exclusively with matters pertaining to what is termed conventionally "the future life" and "the other world." Now, our ideal of spirituality, and it certainly accords completely with Greek philosophy and primitive Christian doctrine and practice, is that spirit pervades matter, that the external world is ensouled by spirit which interpenetrates every seemingly solid substance, verily occupying the interstices between the electrons into which the atoms of matter are now scientifically broken up. If the newest scientific theory of matter is entitled to serious attention, then we must soon arrive at something like a revival of the ancient alchemical concept of a single primary substance, and we may well remember that the phrase "one element" is found in the poetry of Tennyson as well as in the magical treatises of mystic philosophers and occult scientists to whose long-dishonored discoveries and declarations the learned world of to-day is beginning to render serious attention.

Where is that "spirit world" about which we hear so much; where are those "seven spheres" or where can we locate any "heaven," "paradise," or "purgatory" about which theologians speak so glibly? Omar Khayyam, in his world-famous "Rubaiyat," has answered these questions in a few vivid sentences of fervid verse more fully than they have been dealt with in many a bulky tome of labored philosophy or scholastic theology. A deep student of Sufism (Dr. Norton Hazeldine, now of Los Angeles, Cal.), after having spent many years in Persia and other Eastern lands, has in a singularly beautiful version of the esoteric aspect of the "Rubaiyat," given us the following translation of a portion of the sixty-seventh quatrain:

"Hear ye then this simple, yet most ancient of the truths, how man can gain knowledge of life beyond the tomb. Control thyself, and with thy senses send thy soul into its elements there to wring out the secret of its Birth and End. The gentle voice of the silence whispers soft and low and bids me write the answer here below: I myself am Heaven, I myself am Hell, I am the Cause Creative, I am the Way, the End."

It must always be remembered that the personal pronoun is used here precisely as Emerson in his famous saying,

> "I am owner of the sphere, > Of the seven stars and the solar year," has employed it; no private ownership, nothing but universal participation in public reality is intended in each instance.

This brings us to our most vital point of all—the possibility of enjoying an inward life of rest and peace regardless of how fiercely the tempest may prevail about us. Natural analogies are always ready to hand to illustrate this greatest and sweetest of all important truths—the complete beneficence of all life's varied experiences when, as Sir Edwin Arnold has phrased it, while treating of the faith of Islam, they are "viewed from Allah's throne above." It seems unthinkable that any reasoning Spiritualist should entertain a pessimistic or even a semi-pessimistic view of the universe, but it certainly appears that many people never allow themselves to carry their own philosophy to its logical final result. Irrespective of our religious, philosophical, or other ideas and opinions, we are all compelled to admit that our external life, regard it as we may, is at least for many of us filled with tragedies. To shut our eyes to manifest phenomena is childish if not absurd, but because we allow that facts occur we are in no way obliged to interpret them pessimistically.

A truly spiritual view of life must ever be one which takes no very great amount of any outward gain or loss when such is contrasted with inward pain and pleasure. In spite of all false utterances to the contrary, the words remain true through all succeeding ages that "a man's life consisteth not in the multitude of the things which he possesseth." It is sometimes irrationally claimed by certain Socialists and others that to fix our thoughts upon a life beyond the present is to encourage the rich in their oppression of the poor, and at the same time to counsel underfed and overworked multitudes to be content with their lot in this world, because everything will be straightened out equitably in some life to come. Needless to say, there is some shallow ground on which such an assertion can be made to stand, but to claim that there is any necessary or logical relation between faith in spiritual realities and encouragement of inequitable social conditions is actually ridiculous. Probably no people in England or elsewhere to-day are exerting themselves more vigorously and tirelessly for the betterment of all social conditions than those whose particular brand of religious conviction is designated New Theology, but the Rev. R. J. Campbell and his associates and sympathizers are in the front rank of those interested in proving the reality of a spiritual life continuous beyond earthly dissolution. What is to many a new point of view must now be taken, and Spiritualists should be among the first to emphasise the hereness and nowness of the spiritual life and its omnipresent activities. Clairvoyance, clairaudience, clairsentience and all other extensions of normal faculty simply suggest, in the most obvious manner, that our universally admitted five senses, regardless of any greater number which we may latently possess, are by no means confinable within any determinable boundaries. We see, hear, taste, touch, smell, but how far do these five words convey ideas to us respectively? Clear sight, hearing and feeling can only mean more than the average; thus for convenience sake we often repudiate the old word supernatural and take refuge in supernormal.

But, again, let us inquire what is meant by normal, seeing that we have no fixable standard by which to determine the limits of normality. At least we all agree that our normal is someone's supernormal and may be someone else's subnormal. In an art gallery, adorned with hundreds of exquisite paintings, we cannot determine for each other any criterion of judgment except to a very limited extent, for sight, as well as artistic appreciativeness, differs so widely among us that we can only speak positively regarding the impression a certain picture makes on us individually. On the walls are noble portraits finely executed, each displaying the features of some distinguished man or woman who has achieved something noteworthy. Turning, then, from portraits of individuals, our gaze rests upon landscapes and seascapes, upon peaceful valleys and populous marts of trade; again we are invited to contemplate some single flower or a cluster of charming blossoms, and now a bird and then an animal is presented to our view. What is the mission of all this art; why are there painters, and why do we prize and exhibit paintings? Surely we must see in all this display of talent and beauty something far beyond the mere gratification of some æsthetic fancy, or our Art Schools and their students are reduced to the most insignificant caterers to an ephemeral taste for the externally attractive. If, however, as Ruskin taught, art is to be cultivated not for its own but for humanity's sake, we can see in the true artist a conscientious worker in the field of spiritual elevation and reform, for as art is always an avenue through which the populace is ready to be reached, the painter and sculptor must take their places among ministers of a sublime and everlasting gospel, bringing the glad tidings of spiritual reality to a world pressed down to the lowest depths ofttimes by a crushing sense of the unreality of all that it has hugged most affectionately to its bosom. Through a picture or a statue a lesson can be quietly, effectively, and permanently conveyed to multitudes as in no other way. When Mrs. Besant visited Chicago in the autumn of 1907, she greatly impressed the citizens of that vast cosmopolis by calling their attention to the fine work done by many painters whose works were conspicuously exhibited, and at the same time making a strenuous plea for a generally higher range of subjects than those ordinarily selected. Here is a broad suggestion for the popularizing of much that is best in Spiritualism. Artists who are inspirational and deeply imbued with a keen sense of the possible sublimity of their vocation, have a practically boundless prairie in which to range when determined to consecrate their gifts of conception and expression to the embodying of high ideals on canvas or in bronze or marble.

We none of us dwell sufficiently on the uses of good objects of art in our homes, schools, and public thoroughfares. The fact that much has been done already, and with excellent results, is only an evidence of how more can yet be accomplished and with still greater righteous consequences if we but embrace our golden opportunities. Music in one sense is even more effectual than the still arts in arousing emotion and lifting thought above external sordidness; but with all its power and charm, the very nature of music being volatile prevents its occupying the special place which the other arts must occupy. In a spiritual temple, be it a spacious palace or a humble attic in a modest dwelling house, the fabric should always be able to do a work by itself silently and suggestively, quite without reference to any stated exercises carried on within its walls. A very good tendency among many Spiritualists to-day is to secure homes for spiritual work, the atmosphere of which can easily be rendered distinctive and uplifting in highly pronounced degree, and to accomplish this excellent end fully we should introduce all possible accessories of a beautiful and useful nature. But there is always one aspect of spiritual philosophy brighter, wider, and more richly consoling than all the rest, and that is the great theme of experiences gainable in sleep and trance; and let us remember that on this point Spiritualists and Theosophists have a wide and comprehensive meeting ground. Only comparatively rarely do we get definite information of the spirit-world or "astral plane" while we are awake; this is because we are so very much engrossed with external interests and business that it is only seldom that we can bestow serious thought on anything outside our immediate secular engagements. But during sleep our condition is entirely reversed, for no sooner do we enter the sleeping condition than we turn our backs upon the outer and our faces toward the inner world. During eight hours out of every twenty-four many people rest completely from all external cares and responsibilities, and thereby obtain not only complete refreshment but spiritual equipment for the varied work which daily lies before them. Just as a well-spent day earns a peaceful night, so does a well-spent night prepare us for a happy, useful day. Education while asleep, or in a state of trance, is one of the most important and fascinating topics in which Spiritualists can become vitally interested, and, as a conclusion to our present essay, we wish to offer a few practical hints for consciously enlarging the beneficial scope of our nocturnal inspiration. After retiring, while yet awake, it is a very good practice to concentrate attention thoroughly upon some subject or place with which, or individual with whom, we would like to be specially related during slumber or entrancement. Before going to sleep it is well to resolve to wake slowly and suggest to yourself, while passing into the sleeping condition, that you will carry across the border with you some well-defined remembrance of how and where you have spent your night. Very often we gain by that process much information of great importance, helpful in a large variety of ways, and most of all do we become increasingly conscious of the blessed fact that night by night we can work and dwell among our "departed" loved ones, as day by day we minister and travel among our still incarnate friends. With pure resolve to gather useful knowledge on the psychic plane and employ it for beneficial ends we can safely practise an exercise which develops, in an orderly manner, a faculty of our inner nature and enables us to answer in a definite affirmative the ever-pressing query, "If we appear to die do we yet continue to live?"

WE ARE HERE AND NOW LIVING IN INFINITY AND ETERNITY.

When this mighty truth is clearly realized there is no longer for us any "this" or "other" world, for we have grown to perceive that boundary lines of space and time relate only to those exterior planes of consciousness which it is ever the distinctive province of spiritual discernment immeasurably to transcend.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE ESOTERIC TEACHINGS OF THE GNOSTICS—THE DIVINE FEMININE.

No more fascinating doctrine than that of Gnosticism can possibly engage our interest, and especially now that the position properly assignable to Woman is one of the burning issues of the times. According to Frances Swiney, who has written a wonderful book treating upon this topic, among true Gnostics, Woman is higher than Man, as Sophia, the Divine Feminine, is the central object of Gnostic adoration. In a perfectly synthesized system of thought and practise, we feel well assured that neither sex will be in the ascendancy over the other, but as we have seen so much of ill resulting from masculine despotism and monopoly, Mrs. Swiney's other-extreme doctrine deserves earnest thought and careful consideration, and though at first it may strike the average reader as preposterous, there are a good many sane arguments to be brought forward in support of the main body of it. Gnostics have seen the feminine aspect of Deity rather than the masculine, so they have apotheosized women and relegated men to an inferior rank. Perfect sexual equality everywhere acknowledged is our own forecast for the coming age and the coming race; but we can hardly expect that so thoroughly ideal a condition can be ushered in until many children have been born into mental as well as physical surroundings very far superior in all respects to those which now almost universally obtain, and it can only be through the direct agency of emancipated and consecrated motherhood that a new and higher race can be brought into existence. There is a veritable "mystery of godliness" in the Gnostic philosophy now being brought before the public gaze, but there is also a very important "open teaching" concerning the relation of the sexes which is never properly concealed, as it is of the utmost importance to race improvement that it be publicly disseminated. With the breaking up of old ideas and institutions, now everywhere proceeding, preparatory to the installation of a new order, it is not surprising to find a vast amount of religious, social, and industrial unrest. This is far from being a discouraging symptom or a sign of racial decay; it is, to all who can read the signs of the present day aright, a convincing proof that we are on the immediate verge of a new era, in which we may reasonably expect to behold a condition of humanity far superior to that now extant.

The early Christians were many of them Gnostics, and there are numerous unmistakable traces of pronounced Gnostic teaching in many of the Epistles attributed to St. Paul. This fact makes it very easy for Mystics to remain within the Catholic Church while they hold views entirely at variance with the common outer doctrine promulgated in parish churches and accepted as the all-in-all of Christianity by the great bulk of priests as well as laity. Dr. Anna Kingsford, author of that very popular treatise, "The Perfect Way, or the Finding of Christ," did not consider her own position in the least degree inconsistent, for she held that there is a "church within a church," which is often referred to in the columns of "The Occult Review" as "The Church of the Holy Grail." St. George Mivart, Father Tyrrell, and many other distinguished scholars of recent date, have stirred up much controversy by their "Modernism," which is not very far removed from Gnosticism in many of its most decided features.

The Gnostic will never be satisfied with literalism, to her, or for him, the inner life or quickening spirit is all that is of real moment. Historical events or episodes sink into insignificance when contrasted with a consideration of the operation of the Divine Spirit within humanity in the living present. Historical discussions are never attractive to the Gnostic or to the Mystic, any further than they may prove useful in showing the perpetual continuity of esoteric doctrine and in illustrating, by famous examples, the place of honor which Gnostic teaching has ever held among the most enlightened and enlightening teachers of the human race. From the Preface to Mrs. Swiney's highly artistic and wonderfully illustrated volume we extract the following: "There have always been minds that have grasped, in some measure, the eternal verities; they have, as it were, caught a transient vision of the whole in all its glory and divinity, and have been surcharged with the Wisdom of the Highest. But the majority of the race have lagged far behind; the general development of the spiritual consciousness in mankind being as gradual as has been the organic evolution. And thus religious beliefs mark the state of consciousness to which human psychology has attained. We now smile at the coats of skin and too solid flesh with which primitive man in his grossness clothed the most sublime ideals of his race. But, even allowing that the transcendent reality was soon submerged under the materialised form through whose medium it was presented to the world, the Divine intuition, like a golden thread of truth, glistens through all the various faiths. Interwoven, in spite of man's incertitude, with the objective manifestations and symbolism was the subjective indivisible entity of everlasting Wisdom. Forms of belief are but the transitory phases of the Soul in its upward path from consciousness to consciousness, from truth to truth, from revelation to revelation, from glory to glory, until it attains the Light of Lights.

"But mankind is loth to recognize the ephemeral character of the distinctive creeds that smother the intrinsic verity under external ceremonial, ritual, dogma, theories, codes, canons, conventions, precedents and definitions, until the outward shell imprisons the living truth in an atrophied contraction. We forget that these evolutionary expositions of faith are but resting-places for the human soul in its sore travail for self-completion, as it emerges from the material depths. Instead of being rock-bound sepulchres, in which we bury our Christs, or marble fanes, crumbling before the onslaught of time, they are only tents that are struck in the dawning, when yet another night of darkness has passed away of the ignorance, fatuity, and misery of humanity.

"We toil during the night, as did the disciples on the Galilean Sea. We behold but the unfathomable blackness of the waters, and the inscrutable vault of the midnight sky. Around us lie obscurity, mystery, and the dreaded Unknown. Yet, when the morn breaks, comes also the sublime revelation. For encircling us are the everlasting hills, and the Christos awaits us on the shore—the shore of a sunlit sea."

Gnosticism and Occultism are very near neighbors and close friends, if they are not identical; therefore we are likely at any time to find these terms used interchangeably. True Occultism is a system which seeks to penetrate below all surfaces and discover what has long been enshrined in seemingly impenetrable mystery. The fixed ceremonies of Ecclesiastic and Masonic bodies can serve a useful purpose by preserving an unbroken tradition. Ceremonies are like letters in words, and words in languages, but letters and words are alike useless and cumbersome unless we employ them wisely for the conveyance of living thought from mind to mind and locality to locality.

According to a Gnostic view of religious tenets, the word tenet is directly associated with tent, a temporary abiding or halting-place, and also a movable dwelling which can be easily folded and carried from place to place, as permanent houses certainly cannot be. There are, however, Gnostic temples as well as tents, but these stand for immovable principles, the same in every clime and age, not for special interpretations placed upon facts at different epochs in human evolution, and by men who though high ecclesiastical dignitaries were often far more carnal than spiritual.

Mead, in his "Fragments of a Faith Forgotten," tells us that during the first century of the present era the Gnostics at Alexandria endeavored to discover a truly universal religion, or to formulate a theosophy which would satisfy all minds; but the new race then springing up was found to be composed of such heterogeneous material that the task was too great for their accomplishment. The Western intellect has never seemed equal to the task of grasping the subtle metaphysics or the abstract reasoning of the Oriental mind, and it has been largely on this account that esoteric verities have been so grossly carnalized in accepted Christian definitions. Much of this carnalizing has proved so repulsive to spiritually-minded people that they have turned away entirely from the church and its sacraments, until they have been shown some inner meaning by some outside teacher who has possessed the necessary insight into the origin and inner meaning of the mysteries, enabling them to disentangle this from the crude materialism in which it has lain long concealed.

In the light of Gnostic interpretation, the characters in the Gospel narratives stand out clearly and instructively as permanent human types, not simply as historical personages who lived once for all at a given time in a certain place. But it is not by any means chiefly on that account that the Gnostic clue to the New Testament is needed, but by reason of the profound verities veiled in the doctrine of the Trinity and other arcane mysteries that we most need this elucidation. In the popular notion of the Divine Trinity, there are three Persons but only one God. This is said to be a mystery too deep for the human intellect to probe; therefore, outside the Athanasian Creed we find no ambitious attempts to define the concept. But we cannot afford to remain silent as to the pernicious influence exerted throughout Christendom by the prevalent idea that the three Divine Persons are exclusively male. Much older, purer, and far more natural ideas of a Trinity are to be found among the records of ancient Egypt, where Osiris, Isis, and Horus were regarded as Father, Mother, and Offspring. Some aspects of Horus are male and others female; showing that the highest and purest religious concepts of the Egyptians gave to the feminine a place of honor equal with the masculine in all things. People cannot entertain an exclusively masculine idea of Deity and at the same time believe that motherhood is as divine as fatherhood. The degradation of woman is always supported most strongly where the belief is pregnant that only males are fit to officiate at sacred altars. Mohammedanism has kept women in much greater servitude than Christianity, because it has never tolerated the idea of a Queen as well as a King of Heaven, an idea which the Church of Rome has always fostered, thereby largely counteracting the baneful effect of suppressing the vision of the Divine Mother standing between the Father and the Child.

Judaism has never tolerated pictorial representations of the Divine One, for to the pious Israelite any attempted picturing of Deity would be regarded as a flagrant violation of the Decalogue; but in many Christian churches, and in illustrated Bibles, we see attempts to portray the Holy Trinity, and always by three figures—one of an elderly man, one of a younger man, and one of a dove. Now the dove hides the face of the Divine Mother, and is her emblem. Were the representation to be restored to its original form, it would be far better than it is now, and when thus restored it could be readily interpreted to mean simply three distinct manifestations of Deity accommodated to human necessity, while, as H. P. Blavatsky suggested after gazing upon Gustave Doré's famous painting, the silence of the formless mystery in the background symbolled the Ineffable One far more than the three limited figures in the foreground.

If we must have representations of human conceptions of Deity, we certainly have the right to urge that they be of the most elevating character possible, and this they never can be if they exclude the mothers from equal rank with the fathers of our race. It is to Art that we must largely look to carry the gospel of the coming age to the utmost regions of the earth, as works of art appeal to multitudes to whom didactic teaching makes no appeal whatever. What is now often called the state of Super-man is called by Gnostics the state of "the woman perfected, who comprises and surmounts man." This is, of course, an extreme view, but in the interests of better race-propagation it is much safer to exalt woman above man than to elevate man above woman, because mothers exert a far greater influence over the unborn, and over little children, than do fathers. The Gnostic doctrine of the Forgiveness of Sins is an important one, and quite at variance with all belief in "vicarious" atonement, for to the Gnostic it is indeed true that Christ within is "the hope of glory." Jacob Boehme went very far toward explaining the Gnostic attitude when he said: "God in man gives that which is sinful away. Nobody can forgive sins except Christ in Man. Whenever Christ lives in Man, there is the absolution." One can very readily detect in the above utterance of a modern German mystic a form of esoteric teaching which does away entirely with all disputations concerning genealogies and other purely external matters against which all Gnostic writers in primitive Christian days continually warned their catechumens. It was not earlier than the fourth century that the dominant exoteric party in the Church gained the upper hand to such an extent that they forcibly repressed all public teaching of Gnosticism and spread the infamous report that Gnostics were shockingly immoral persons, who sought to pervert the Gospel to the ends of licentiousness, a statement which is a flagrant contradiction of well-attested fact. As no persecution or opposition of any sort to esoteric teaching has ever arisen without some superficial show of justification, it is quite probable that some sincere persons in bygone days did actually so far misunderstand the real trend of Gnostic philosophy as to believe that it advocated immorality; but no ripe scholar could at any time have held so utterly erroneous a view unless he had become so warped by prejudice and fanaticism as to have rendered himself altogether incompetent to weigh evidence in that particular, or consider statements in the light of calm judicial reasoning. Gnosticism had long preceded Christianity, and it was no doubt often feared by dominating ecclesiastics that the real original of Christian rites and ceremonies might be discovered by the people at large, if Gnostic "heresies" were tolerated. The great sin of Christendom has been its arrogant attitude toward all religious systems older or other than orthodox Christianity, and though it has so far endorsed ancient Judaism as to declare that it was a Divinely instituted religion, its attitude to modern Judaism has been one of relentless and unending opposition and persecution. It would be a happy day for persecuted Israel in Russia and several other nominally Christian lands were the light of Gnosticism to break through the dense fog of prevailing literalism, for then the Crucifixion of the Christ, being understood esoterically and universally, on no pretext whatever could Jews be execrated as "Christ-killers," a title often applied to them as an excuse for the gross injustice with which they are treated many times by their avowedly Christian neighbors.

Emancipated womanhood in the light of Gnostic teaching represents "Pistis Sophia" liberated from all bondage to carnal lusts, and exalted to the throne of dominion where she rightfully belongs. Goethe, in the second part of his mystic drama, "Faust," finds "Mater Gloriosa," the centre of 183 Spheres of light: this is indeed "the Divine Feminine that ever leads us on." Jealousy on the part of male disciples of a Master who appointed women to instruct them in the mysteries of Anastasis (resurrection and regeneration), must have had much to do with the rigorous exclusion of women from the Christian priesthood, for nothing can well be plainer than the words attributed to the risen Master in the Fourth Gospel, where he tells Mary Magdalene to tell his disciples, and especially Peter (the nominal head of the Roman Church), that he has risen from the sepulchre. Entirely apart from an immense mass of extra-Christian testimony, the accepted Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament furnish abundant evidence that the Master gave many of his deepest instructions to women, thereby initiating them into the "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven," a phrase well understood by Gnostics, who understand it to mean a living realization of truth inwardly apprehended, not outwardly witnessed to on historic grounds, as in the case of all who depend on extraneous testimony and not on interior realization. The transmutation of all energy is the dominant aspiration of the Gnostics, and no one can be a practical, experienced Gnostic who has not learned to so subdue the flesh to the spirit that the "old serpent" becomes transformed from the death-dealer to the life-bringer. Thus will the prophecy be at length completely fulfilled, "They shall take up serpents," and thus also will many equally enigmatical scriptures be fully verified.

CHAPTER XXIV.

HALLEY'S COMET—ITS HISTORY AND PORTENT—VISIBLE IN 1910.

The human mind in all ages seems to have instinctively attached the idea of some mysterious agency to the appearance of comets, those erratic wanderers through fields of space whose movements now seem to be as calculable as the motions of those far less remarkable orbs and constellations which we are accustomed to call Fixed Stars, only because we have much more completely comprehended their behavior. Halley's Comet, which has reappeared this year (1910), after an absence of seventy-five years since its last appearance, has a most eventful history, one which seems in large degree to justify the superstitious awe with which it was regarded during the Middle Ages, when it struck terror into the population of many lands, and, according to Draper's narrative, contained in his well-known "History of the Conflict Between Religion and Science," was at one time solemnly anathematized by the highest ecclesiastical authorities and bidden to depart from the skies, as its presence suggested to their minds some diabolical agency. Though the masses of the people everywhere are supposed to be better educated, and therefore less superstitious, now than formerly, it is by no means uncommon to hear fears expressed today that a comet may work serious disaster. This alarm is very ancient, and, according to Ignatius Donnelly, and some other well-known authors, is traceable to a great cosmic catastrophe which occurred many ages ago, when our planet collided with a comet, and the Age of Fire and Gravel resulted. Whatever foundation there may be for such a tradition, there seems to be nothing in the career of Halley's Comet thus far to justify any morbid apprehensions of physical destruction; but history furnishes us with abounding evidence that truly great events in human history have taken place when this brilliant wanderer has illumined the midnight sky. There seems valid ground for declaring that events move in cycles, that human affairs, like all else in Nature, are subject to a Law of Periodicity, and when this law is more fully understood, we shall be able to read the book of history far more intelligently than most of us are reading it at present.

To the untutored and unscientific mind, the unusual and the unexpected seem always to presage evil, but to the better-informed, change by no means necessarily spells disaster. Granted that great upheavals in the affairs of nations have been persistently contemporary with the appearance of this beautiful celestial traveller, alterations in the map of the world are often unmistakable signs of welcome progress, and far from causing us to believe that when mighty changes impend, disaster is upon us, we may learn to lift up our heads with joy, feeling that deliverance from many curses draweth nigh. The perihelion of our fascinating visitor whose presence in our skies is now attracting immense attention, was calculated by the illustrious astronomer, Edmund Halley, as having occurred August 26, 1531. This same comet reappeared, according to the same authority, October 27, 1607, and then September 15, 1682, at which time Halley himself observed it. Again it made its periodic appearance March 13, 1759, and November 16, 1835, a date within the memory of many witnesses now living. Probably much of the historic interest attaching to its periodic visits is due to the fact that it was in evidence at the time of the Norman Conquest of Great Britain, in 1066, and it has been observed that momentous events have always occurred during periods when it has since been visible. This year of its latest return visit, 1910, has certainly done much to sustain the comet's reputation as an accompanier of startling occurrences, for very early in the year disturbances of every sort became rife in many lands, and, particularly in America, Labor difficulties have proved extremely difficult to handle. It is certainly far from foolishly superstitious to investigate, as far as we are able, striking coincidences which may throw some light on the always interesting problem of the sympathetic relation between our planet and other members of the stellar universe, though it is inexcusable on the part of any who know how injurious is morbid apprehension of coming calamities, to play upon the fears of the weak-minded and credulous by telling them that a comet in the sky is an augury of coming fell disaster.

For convenience of reference, should any of our readers wish to look up the leading events of the subjoined years and months, we append a list of the dates when Halley's Comet has been observed, from 11 B. C., to 1910 of our era. We are indebted to an article in the "Popular Science Monthly" (Jan., 1910) for this precise information. There have been twenty-six observed perihelia of this famous comet, the first of which carries us back to 11 B. C. During the present era the perehelion dates have been: January 26, 66; March 29, 141; April 6, 218; April (date not supplied), 295; November 7, 530 (beg.); July 3, 451; November 7, 530 (beg.); October,684 (date omitted); June 11, 760; March 1, 837 April, 912 (early in month); September 1, 989; April 1, 1066; April 19, 1145; August 22, 1222; October 23, 1301; November 9, 1378; June 8, 1456; August 26, 1531 (all above dates are according to Julian reckoning); October 27, 1607; September 15, 1682; March 13, 1759; November 16, 1835; May 18, 1910. Many and varied have been the conjectural theories advanced concerning comets in general and in particular, but the theory most widely accepted by astronomers today is that they are worlds burning out—worlds which have long since accomplished such active missions as our earth is now accomplishing; for it is surely the purpose of the all-wise Designer of the Universe to appoint to every star its place and mission, and as all outward existences have a beginning, so at some time and in some way they must have an end. Astronomy is unquestionably at once the sublimest and most awe-inspiring of all the sciences, and well may we exclaim with the Hebrew poet of old, "The heavens declare the glory of God; the firmament showeth forth the handiwork of the Eternal One."

It was by scanning the skies that ancient peoples gained all their external ideas of order in the universe; therefore we find that all venerated Scriptures are largely astronomical in their references, and it has even been stated that every Bible story can be traced to an astronomical origin. Whether this be so or not, it is beyond reasonable dispute that a study of the visible heavens was intimately bound up with the duties and occupations of all venerable priesthoods, the members of which, in all renowned ancient countries, were the scientific as well as the religious leaders of the multitude; and now with the revolution of the cycles bringing us again to a point of fresh explorations and revelations, we are reviewing the records of the remote past with ever-increasing interest and fulness, and at the same time witnessing a new cult, or several new cults, springing up among us, seeking to embody the wisdom of the past in consonance with the discoveries of the present. As the new time ripens and the modern spirit matures, we shall certainly grow to appreciate much of the religion and science of our long-departed ancestors, while the brighter light and ampler opportunities for discovery and comparison which will characterize the advancing epoch will enable us to systematize and synthesize the knowledge now available to the end of constructing a synthetic philosophy embracing all the excellences of past systems without their inevitable limitations. At any rate, let such be our fearless aim and quest, then whatever legitimate study or research aids us on our way we shall gladly welcome and embrace it.

PSYCHOPATHIC TREATMENT

SUGGESTIVE THERAPY IN PRACTICAL APPLICATION.

By W. J. Colville.

Having recently made a fourth visit to Kingston-on-Hudson (a charming resort at all seasons, within easy access of New York City, 85 miles distant, reached in two and a quarter hours), by special invitation of Dr. Charles Oliver Sahler, founder and president of the world-famous Sanitarium at that place, I am now in a position to speak from direct personal observation concerning the practicability of employing modern suggestive methods in the conduct of a large and ever-growing institution.

Practically everybody admits to-day that mental treatment is available and useful in certain classes of disorders, technically styled "Nervous ailments," but a widespread impression prevails that what are designated Functional and Organic derangements are not to be conquered by other than distinctly physical methods.

Much good work is now being accomplished all over America and in other lands by distinguished doctors of theology as well as of medicine who incline to this popular restricted view, but such opinions must inevitably hamper the proficiency of the work of all who entertain them.

Dr. C. O. Sahler, a regular physician who graduated from the Medical Department of Columbia University, New York City, in 1878, and practiced in the older ways for many years with great success, made a singularly bold venture in 1893 when he started out as pioneer demonstrator of Suggestive Therapeutics in connection with the work of a newly organized Sanitarium which commenced its career in very modest style, with little to support it beyond the ardent enthusiasm of its founder, who was then intuitively certain that a work of the kind he had so bravely undertaken was not only calculated to supply a great necessity, but also destined to grow and thrive until it should command the respect and interests of thoughtful people everywhere.

At Kingston-on-Hudson a pleasant, roomy house was secured in the quietest section of the town, within easy walking distance of the business center. Twenty rooms were available for the accommodation of students and patients seeking instruction and treatment, and very shortly the demand of visitors far exceeded the supply. By 1899 many important additions and improvements had been made and the number of rooms was raised to 42.

Still the work kept growing and demanding larger and larger accommodations, till in 1906 the present large and beautiful institution was completed, still on the old site, containing 160 rooms. One hundred and twenty patients are often in the various buildings at the same time, and including workers in the various departments the population of the Home (for such it truly is) is seldom under 200. Dr. Sahler is now ably assisted in his enormous work by Dr. C. P. Wescott.

It requires marvelous energy and insight to direct and oversee so great an organization, but apparently without any strainful effort Dr. Sahler regularly accomplishes this mighty task, and so effectively that everything runs on so smoothly that one is led to wonder what magical force is directing the affairs from some unseen sanctuary.

The open secret of the whole business is the powerful individuality of the director, whose whole interest is in the work, which he dearly loves, and which never could be accomplished by any human being, no matter how highly trained and naturally gifted, who did not truly enjoy doing the numerous interesting and important things that must be systematically done continually.

One who has been a great factor in developing and organizing this unique system is the present Superintendent, Miss Charlotte Atkins, who has been with the Sanitarium since 1895.

There do we witness the mighty power of self-discipline in active operation. Theroists abound, but highly successful demonstrators are still but few. It is ever the doctor himself, rather than any particular method which can be concretely formulated, which proves the success-compelling factor, and in Dr. Sahler we witness in pre-eminent degree an embodiment of spiritual ardor exquisitely blended with intellectual vigor and sober common sense.

A distinctly distinguishing feature of the Sanitarium is that it is truly what its name declares, an abode of health. Every equipment suggests cheerfulness, the indwellers are all at home in a beautifully-situated mansion where they enjoy the largest possible amount of reasonable liberty, and where they are treated as healthy intellectual human beings, and, as such, provided with abundant means for instruction and entertainment.

Though there are always a large number of patients at Kingston, quite a considerable percentage of the residents are elderly people who are enjoying the blessings of a cheerful home and who find the genial atmosphere, both mental and physical, particularly conducive to their continued welfare and rejuvenation.

Though Dr. Sahler practices suggestion regularly and systematically in specially adapted apartments where patients, while receiving treatment, are secluded from all disturbing sights and sounds, his system is so widely comprehensive that it embraces all that enters into the entire scheme of a comprehensive Sanitarium and the routine of its management.

Love of the beautiful is everywhere in evidence. Simplicity combined with comfort and elegance confronts the visitor at every turn. All the rooms are beautifully but quietly decorated and furnished. There are no glaring colors, but soft, melodious tints everywhere meet the eye, suggesting rest combined with healthy activity. Nobody is idle, and all forms of healthful exercise are carried on to meet the needs of various temperaments.

A great charm of the institution is its thoroughly liberal and up-to-date equipment in all particulars. Gymnastic exercises are encouraged, under an able and experienced director, Miss Louise Gowan, who is an expert demonstrator of the Delsarte and all other refined and delicate modes of physical culture. All exercises are wisely adapted to the exact requirements and present strength of the participants.

The Turkish and Russian baths form a very valuable and attractive feature, and for their management Dr. Sahler has secured a singularly proficient director in George Barnard.

The Craft and Arts Department occupies a large three-story building consisting of Workshops, Art Rooms, Kitchen and Tea Room, under the able directorate of Miss L. F. Wait.

An unassuming, but none the less a valuable worker, is the handy man, Sam, who has been in the Sanitarium since 1901 attending at all times to everybody's comfort by keeping the furnaces going, carrying trays and ministering in many ways to the creature comforts of all within the house. Dr Sahler regards him as a very important factor in his staff of assistants.

Another very responsible worker is the outside overseer, Ernest Deyo.

Miss Nell Sahler very ably conducts the Department of Domestic Science and Household Economics.

Mrs. Keith-McClintock, Assistant Healer, arrived in 1906 and has proved herself particularly successful with those who require intelligent encouragement and well directed sympathy. Her musical services are also of great value. This highly gifted woman is largely responsible for the many good results which follow upon continued application of theory in practice, her special efforts being always directed toward helping the weak in will and those lacking in necessary self-confidence to comprehend their own interior qualities, which judicial mental treatment always arouses.

While receiving suggestion, either from Dr. Sahler or one of his assistants, the patient reclines on an easy couch in a cozy cabinet, and listens to the comforting assurances of the psychopathist who addresses the sub-consciousness, as well as the outward ear, and explains the method so that teaching is combined with treating.

Considering the highly important work of the Matron of so large an institution, where so many needs have constantly to be met, great praise is due to Miss Rosina Atkins, who is rendering faithful and efficient service in that capacity. Much praise is also due to William Atkins, who admirably fills the post of steward.

Since the opening in 1898 the influential and highly responsible position of Business Manager has been filled by Miss H. M. Terpenning, who is an excellent financier, a true economist in the best meaning of the term, and at the same time one who fully indorses Dr. Sahler's esthetic contention that grace, utility and liberality must always be made manifest in unity.

The tireless housekeeper, Mrs. Isora Lewis, has also been in her position since 1893, and to her continuous watchful care far more that makes for success is rightly attributable than generally meets the eye.

Another very useful worker, and one who contributes greatly to the comfort of all concerned, is Miss Charlotte Muir, who has had full charge of the dining room since 1903. This active, good-natured young woman accomplishes successfully the difficult task of accommodating all the patients and visitors within necessarily prescribed time limits, in such a manner as to cause no friction among the extremely varied inmates of the house. Punctuality in all things is an inflexible rule, and Dr. Sahler is much to be congratulated on the efficient aid he receives from his large corps of assistants in carrying out this most important rule.

Having now sketched the history and the personnel, let us take a brief but comprehensive glance at the main building and its general floors. In the spacious, light, airy and perfectly ventilated basement we find a lecture room provided with 200 chairs, a spacious platform and a fine piano. In this apartment lectures and excellent entertainments are constantly being given, which are largely attended by townspeople and visitors as well as by those who are dwelling under the Sanitarium roof or domiciled in one of its many auxiliary cottages. On this floor also we find the Turkish Baths, Gymnasium, Billiard Rooms, etc.

The kitchens, in a wing by themselves, are splendidly equipped with every modern appliance for health and utility. These important offices are flooded with sunlight, kept scrupulously clean and presided over by a thoroughly efficient and competent staff of assistants.

On the main entrance floor we find business offices fitted with every appliance for doing a maximum of work with a minimum of effort. Spacious reception rooms, beautifully furnished, containing everything requisite to make guests and patients feel as though they were residing at an excellent family hotel, occupy a large portion of this floor, which in its newest portion contains the private apartments of Dr. Sahler and his family.

Mrs. Sahler, though given to artistic pursuits rather than to domestic oversight, is a charming hostess, at whose private board it is a great privilege to sit.

The public dining room equals in size and general appointments a similar refectory in a thoroughly first-class hotel. The cuisine is excellent and liberal, and though some food specialists might pronounce the dietary all too varied, there is much to commend it from the suggestive standpoint, as it suggests nothing of the conventional sanitarium, and everything of a feeding place for healthy people, with normal appetites and good powers of digestion.

Special food is always supplied under Dr. Sahler's supervision to those whose immediate condition renders specific diet necessary.

The second and third floors are devoted to sleeping apartments, bathrooms and sun parlors. As the view over the adjacent hills is wide and exhilarating the sun parlors are a particularly delightful and health-inspiring feature.

The fourth floor is given over to dormitories entirely, and though accommodation is less expensive in the skylight regions than lower down, it is excellent in all respects, and affords the highest view of the surrounding country, which is extremely picturesque.

In addition to all public and semi-public portions of the establishment, there is an inner sanctum—Dr. Sahler's private library and treating rooms. This sheltered nook, to which only the specially invited are admitted, reveals the temperament and character of its presiding genius in singularly marked degree; here are art treasures from nearly all over the earth, many of them gems which might adorn cathedrals. These extremely beautiful objects are for the most part offerings sent by grateful patients who owe their restoration to health and their introduction to new-born liberty to the noble work carried on within the sanctuary which their gratitude impels them to adorn.

Graduates from Kingston are doing good work in many places. Among these should be mentioned Mrs. Mary Seaton, now practising very successfully as a mental therapeutist in Washington.

This lady was completely healed of chronic difficulties by Dr. Sahler's treatment many years ago, and has enjoyed robust health ever since.

We will conclude this sketch of a singularly useful work with a quotation from one of Dr. Sahler's lectures, which gives a good outline of what is exactly his position.

"The words, 'Suggestive Therapeutics,' are so carelessly or loosely used, so misunderstood, that a careful consideration of them is necessary as befitting so important a subject. The combination of these two words does not give a clear meaning or throw a true light on the subject unless they are at first disconnected and analyzed.

First, THERAPEUTICS means that department of medical science that relates to the treatment of disease and action of remedial agents on the human organization. SUGGESTION when spoken of as a remedial agent stands for a truth, although it is not a drug. When one understands or is versed in the use of drugs and their effect upon the human organism, he is known as a THERAPEUTIST or a practitioner of medicine, hence he is called a physician. In truth, a physician is one legally authorized to treat diseases. A true physician is one who is broad-minded, who will treat diseases by any rational method; so the true physician would use SUGGESTION as a curative agent. Here we must study this curative agent. SUGGESTION is not a drug, and to understand first its curative power we ask, What is SUGGESTION?

SUGGESTION is an idea received by an individual consciousness. It may come from any source, by any process, or through any channel. We thus see it is not a material remedy, so we are understandingly directed into the channel of metaphysics. For to use SUGGESTION as a remedial agent we must have an understanding of metaphysics, as he who applies the metaphysical idea of treating is known as a metaphysician, which, in truth, means one versed in the philosophy of the ultimate nature, cause and reason of things. So the ideal physician must of necessity be a metaphysician as well, before he is able to cope with all the ailments or diseases of mankind successfully. Thus we see SUGGESTION and THERAPEUTICS combined really imply a therapeutical practice by a metaphysician or physician who understands the nature, cause and reason of things, and the remedy needed.

Man is a suggestible creature. In fact all animals, as well as man, live, move and have their being by the law of suggestion. The advancement of civilization is due to the larger and better understanding of this law. So it follows, logically, that SUGGESTIVE THERAPEUTICS holds a prominent place.

Practically it is little understood in its real essence as a curative agent by the medical profession, for as members of the profession we have been educated along material lines, treating the body with its intellect as the man, wholly affected by external causes and through external agents, such as drugs, appliances, etc.

We lose sight of the fact that within man, besides his body and intellect, there is a consciousness, and through the latter, according to involuntary law, the body is builded and sustained. It is because of this lack of understanding or knowledge of psychic forces in man, which seems to so shroud this subject with mysticism, that it cannot be explained by the general practitioner.

SUGGESTION as commonly understood is simply persuasion, which may or may not carry much force with it; but from a psychic point of view SUGGESTION becomes a mighty power and so dissimilar to the commonly used word SUGGESTION that when the subject is once understood the former seems to bear no relation to the latter. Unfortunately, it is difficult to explain or express the very truth or life of this subject by an article or a book. One can scarcely form a true idea of its meaning or worth through reading. In fact, the most intelligent or educated patient cannot explain or so understand it as to tell another even after being treated. Still, he has a thorough realization and knowledge in his own consciousness of its influence o rpower. This is an experience expressed by hundreds of our patients. At no time is the patient unconscious in intellect or feeling while taking treatment, still he has the realization that something is far different from the normal state. He also understands that its force depends upon his own attitude in his consciousness and his relationship to the physician or operator."

Speaking for myself, I have only to add that my several lecture courses at Kingston have proved phenomenally successful. I trust I may again be privileged to visit that delightful spot, which is a center from which healing radiations are extending immeasurably further than our knowledge can estimate.

INTRODUCTION.

The following course of Lessons has been prepared in response to the urgent request of many of our students in various parts of the world, who, having read with interest and profit many works on Spiritual and Mental Healing, have expressed a fervent desire for some added statements concerning the most effectual way of making the general theory practical in special instances.

The subject of Correspondences is now attracting great attention in many circles, and as we are thoroughly convinced that it is a very rich mine of wealth for all who are willing to diligently explore it, we have set ourselves the task of attempting to reason out, in as simple and logical a way as possible, some of those obvious correspondences between inward and outward states which only need to be impartially investigated to be rendered plain to the general perception of mankind.

The days of willing ignorance and of blind devotion to ancient renderings and established precedents are happily fast drawing to a close, so that now, instead of submission to accepted limitations, the human family is clearly bent on acquiring mastery over all those conditions which are ignorantly denominated Fate.

Science is proclaiming through its votaries everywhere, the immutability of Order, therefore Scientists of every ilk are growing daily more and more prepared to welcome any system of teaching which is founded upon the rock of unmistakable sequence, while they are properly distrustful of whatever is even partially based on the sand of partiality or favoritism.

The Oriental word Karma has within the past few years become a recognized addition to the English language, and we have occcsionally employed it in our lessons because it conveys such an abundant wealth of meaning in the space occupied by only five letters. The definition herewith given (viz., sequence,) is the only meaning the present author attaches to it. We therefore request the reader before going further to fully master this definition. Karma signifies the unvarying, unalterable relation, perpetually existing between Cause and Effect, consequently our Karma can never be anything other than what we have brought and are bringing upon ourselves through our own action on one or more of the various planes of our existence.

There is no such thing as good and evil Karma. But we must not fail to live up to the essentially sound doctrine that it is just as legitimate that we should pay the penalty of error as that we should reap the blissful results of righteous conduct.

Deliverance from error there is, but escape from penalty there is not; however, the first step has not been taken along the path of genuine spiritual progress until the student of Truth has fully grasped the blissful assurance that every result of every action is the best possible result that could proceed from that particular act.

The system of healing elaborated in the following pages is strictly based upon the axiom whatsoever a man sows that shall he individually reap.

Sympathy with effort is praiseworthy, but to sympathize with distress is unscientific. As ignorance of universal law excuses no one from penalty, sufferers need not be sinners, and as penalties are invariably educational and essential to progress they cannot be remitted because they are necessities.

The aim of this little book is to help people to help themselves and others, not to evade consequences or shirk responsibilities, but to so govern their thinking, speaking and acting, that through the constant sowing of good seed, and naught other, harvests of good and pleasant fruit may be inevitably secured through conscious, intelligent co-operation with universal order.

THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCES APPLIED TO HEALING.

LESSON I.

THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCES.—THE PROBLEM STATED.

The word Correspondence is one which must not be confounded with such a term as allegory, or interchanged with any expression which denotes something arbitrary or fanciful. Correspondences are exact; they are true to nature at every turn, and can be exactly interpreted by a study of the unalterable relations between the seen and the unseen, or the subjective and the objective, which inhere in the changeless constitution of the universe.

No student of the Bible, and no careful reader of any section of Oriental literature, can fail to remark how very frequently natural illustrations are employed by the wisest of teachers in their method of setting forth spiritual truth in human language.

To follow out all the obvious correspondences in a single book in the Bible would be a lengthy task, while the attempt to explain every natural similitude would necessitate years of work and the publication of numerous bulky volumes.

There are four distinct groups of correspondences to which we desire to call especial attention, as we shall need to refer to them frequently in the course of this series of Lessons:

First: The various parts of the human body;

Second: Sun, moon and stars;

Third: Animals, vegetables and minerals;

Fourth: Utensils manufactured by man for his own use.

The first and second of these four groups are universal. The third is less than universal, though wholly natural. The fourth is artificial.

The first and second divisions of correspondences are so closely allied that the ancients were accustomed to class them together, and the tendency to do so still is obvious in the writings of many modern Mystics, Theosophists, and others who speak of the human Zodiac with its twelve manners of people, and who teach Astrology from an Esoteric standpoint. No matter where we live, or to what nation we belong, as members of the human family we are all possessed of human bodies, which are alike in structure the world over.

The unity of the race is nowhere so clearly proved as in structural anatomy and physiology; for when the human shape is once comprehended, its parts known, and their functions described correctly, the student of the human organism has grasped information of universal import and value.

Ascending in thought from a contemplation of the single human person till we take in the idea of the Social Organism, we are never called upon to change our anatomy, physiology or psychology, only to enlarge the field of their application.

When we contemplate the wonders revealed through Astronomy it is the same likewise, the order is threefold in both instances. Spiritual, intellectual and personal in the one case; solar, planetary and lunar in the other. Stars are grouped in galaxies; worlds are constellated into systems. Everywhere there is plan or order, and this is threefold. Wise philosophers, including Ralph Waldo Emerson, have exclaimed, "Man is his own star," and profound students of stellar science, who have favored any astrological theory, have boldly pronounced the thrilling words, "The wise man rules his stars, the foolish man obeys them."

The whole difference between the wise and the foolish on earth is that the former are governors of the world around them, while the latter are governed by it. Self-government is the first step; government of exterior conditions is the second, on the road to abiding victory. A careful analytical study of the human shape reveals the fact that it contains an exact correspondence to everything existent in the ample domain of nature external to a human personality.

Sun, moon and stars are all within as well as without us, and the same is true of all varieties of minerals, vegetables and animals.

The student of Esoteric philosophy, whose desire it is to make practical use of Esoteric verities in Exoteric relations, comes to clearly perceive that there is nothing outside of a man which can affect him, either for weal or woe, except through the outworking of the law of correspondence. There are absolutely no limits to the truth of this statement, but, because of its axiomatic character and far reaching significance, it is repudiated by many, because its very accuracy renders impossible the magical phenomena which many superficial inquirers into Occultism desire instantaneously to produce. So many treatises upon the Occult are written in the hieroglyphical style of Paracelsus and other distinguished alchemists, that the general reader is bewildered rather than enlightened when he endeavors to make practical use of the "jargon of the initiated."

Whatever may have been the reason, in centuries gone by, for purposed concealment and predetermined mystification, or for the employment of a terminology translatable only by members of secret fraternities, the time has now come for rending the veil and putting forward the deepest truths of mystical philosophy in the clearest possible language. But, though clarity of expression is a desideratum, the fact remains immovable as ever, that no one can initiate his neighbor; though anyone who is already in the possession of knowledge can impart it to all who are willing to apply themselves faithfully to the learner's task, which is to appropriate information and demonstrate its usefulness by actual employment thereof.

Once let an individual soul, here embodied for terrestrial expression, grasp the truth that soul is master and flesh is servant, that individual has found the mystic key which can unlock every door in the universe which needs unlocking before the embodied entity can stand forth in that sovereignty of dominion which rightly pertains to divine offspring. The 8th psalm is one of the finest lessons in Divine Science or Universal Theosophy to be encountered anywhere, but even that majestic shout of exultation has been perverted by false theology, and pressed into the service of a contemptible view of human nature. The greatness of humankind is emphatically declared in words which can be correctly rendered. "How great is man that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that Thou visitest him; for Thou hast made him but little lower than Elohim, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou makest him to exercise dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet."

The lower or earthborn man, the result of fleshly generation, contains all the animals, birds, fishes, reptiles and other creatures which are mentioned in this psalm, and only as the higher, spiritual, God-derived nature dominates this inferior sense-creation, can any human being really know what it means to be truly human. We are not animals, but we contain all animals. The human shape is integral, embodying the whole, while all animal and other fractional shapes express less than the unit, albeit, whatever they express is contained within the unit, the fullness of which is expressible only in a human body.

All attempts at fighting fate or struggling against surroundings are worse than useless, for such pugilism only brings a sense of weakness, defeat and disappointment in its train. Bnt some are sure to ask, "Do you mean to tell us that we are to make no efforts to reach the goal or win the prize? You surely cannot mean that victory is gained without conflict! Are there no foes to fight, no enemies to subdue, ere we can reach perfection?

As such questions are very common, and not at all unnatural, we will seek to reply to them in an unmistakable manner.

Victory or triumph is gained by encountering necessary material which is far from being inimical, as it is truly that out of which our highest artistic product is to be fashioned. The potter and the clay, or the sculptor and the marble, will suffice at this point as an adequate illustration.

The statue is made out of marble, and the various vessels which pay tribute to the potters skill are fashioned out of clay. No marble, no bust in the sculptor's studio; no clay, no beautiful vessels in the potter's workshop. Can the marble in the one place, or the clay in the other, be bad, evil, wicked, or anything to be fought against, when those very materials are necessary to the work which the artist is determined to accomplish? "No cross, no crown" is exactly in line with what we are now teaching. The cross may be composed of iron and be hard to carry; the crown is made of gold and is worn as a symbol of victory. The one grows out of the other, therefore the latter could not be if the former had not been.

Viewed from this standpoint there are no crosses which we are justified in rebelling against or calling evil, for the very idea of a cross is the blending of two lines of equal length, one in one direction (perpendicular), the other in another direction (horizontal). There can only be two forms of a cross which are true to nature. The one (anatomical) is the Christian theological cross; the other (astronomical) is common to all arts and to all sciences. The Christian cross is the human cross, and as such, needs to be interpreted entirely apart from those special meanings which have been assigned to it by dogmatic theologians. The human body can be perfectly measured only by a scale of twelve, and the twelve distinct portions of the human anatomy correspond to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, therefore it is quite easy to strip the ancient mysteries of their rigid occultism and talk in plain language of the smaller individual body and the larger Social Organism. The twelve tribes of Israel, twelve apostles of the Lamb, twelve manners of fruit growing on the tree of life, twelve gates to the Holy City,—New Jerusalem, twelve foundations, etc., etc., all refer to the perfect structural organism of humanity, an organization which when perfect is exactly the same on the largest as on the smallest scale.

In further pursuance of the study of anatomy we discover that the height, length and breadth of the human figure are equal, as a perfectly symmetrical human body measures exactly the same from the crown of the head to the ball of a heel, as it measures, when both arms are extended, from the point of the middle finger of the right hand to the extremity of the middle finger of the left hand. The measure of the perfect man, or angel, is the sign of the cross. In hoc signo vinces is therefore susceptible of an expressly anatomical interpretation. Instead of denouncing or deriding the cross as many shallow would-be "liberalists" are accustomed to do, it is highly important that sincere students, imbued with the spirit of scientific scrutiny, should give to the world a truly irrefutable answer to the question, What do you mean when you say the Master bids us take up our cross (i. e., each one his own cross) and follow him?

The Master, or Messiah, is whosoever has taken up perfectly his own cross and is therefore capable of making a perfect demonstration in the eyes of others of the way of doing so. Readers of the Gospel narratives would do well to bear in mind that in many places we are told by the Evangelists that the teacher told his students or disciples that they must take up their cross, before he intimated to them the slightest probability of his literal submission to the Roman mode of punishment meted out to capital offenders, and as no explanation is vouchsafed in any one of the four evangels, it is but reasonable to decide that the writers took it for granted that the expression needed no interpretation, it being self-explanatory.

As a cross can only be perfectly made of two beams of equal length pointing in opposite directions and collectively to the four points of the compass, the symbol of the square is also suggested, and the perfect circle encloses the figure when the diagram is made complete.

As these correspondences are absolutely true to nature, and are absolutely universal also, they rank first in the order of importance, and ought to be carefully studied and well comprehended by any and every student seeking to become proficient in the theory of divine Science, a theory, by the way, which is absolutely practical as it can be perfectly demonstrated to human understanding, and made the all-efficient basis of a system of healing which, as the word implies, is making whole.

The more deeply we study into the beauties of pure anatomy and physiology the more do we see how very helpful it is to have a clear idea of the human structure in health and perfection. The study of disease or the so-called science of pathology is a drawback instead of an advantage to a Metaphysical practitioner, because it tends to corrupt the visionary faculty, and scientific mental healing includes the presentation of mental pictures of the right sort to the sub-self of the patient. Of course it also follows that outward representations of like character greeting the physical eye can be of great service, especially in cases where oral suggestion is found to be a valuable adjunct to silent treatment.

As there are very many garbled notions afloat as to the mental attitude which a healer should sustain to a patient, and further, as denials are often nauseating and tend to spread the very maladies they are intended to destroy, we deem it imperatively necessary to formulate for the widest possible circulation a brief catechism which, though by no means exhaustive or complete in detail, is, we are convinced, not only correct in outline, but highly suggestive of a great deal more than could possibly be condensed into a few paragraphs of ordinary essay writing.

Our catechist is a typical new student who has no very clear idea of the Science of Healing, but wishes to faithfully study the matter, though suffering somewhat from confusion of thought engendered by hearing and reading indistinct and incoherent references to the modus operandi of mental therapeutic practice.

Querist: What is your first object in the study of correspondences as applied to practical healing; how do you discover the disease from which the patient is suffering, then having discovered it, how do you treat it?

Teacher: Pardon me, my friend, for telling you plainly at the outset that you are laboring under a total misapprehension of the theme. Doubtless you will be surprised to hear me say that I never look for a disease and never treat a disease; on the contrary I do my best, quickest, and most enduring work when I am in total ignorance of the malady which is being destroyed through the action of regenerative thought within, as well as upon, the patient.

Querist: What then do you treat if you do not treat maladies, and how can you remove effects unless you know the causes whence they spring?

Teacher: I treat men, women, and children. My aim is to help them to self-knowledge. Those who come to me laden with disorder are ignorant of the true way of life; they need instruction and I seek to give it them. But mark well these words, I seek to discover the special need of whoever seeks my assistance, and to that need I administer to the best of my ability.

Querist: But have I not read in various books on Mental, Spiritual or Divine healing that you must name a disease in the act of denying it away? Suppose now, a person is suffering from Asthma, and you are totally ignorant of his complaint, how can you treat him?

Teacher: I do not presume to deny what you may have read in certain books. All I pretend or undertake to do is to elucidate, as far as I can, the system which I uphold and practice, and which I find to be the best in its results. Were you suffering from any such disorder as the ailment which you have mentioned, I should treat you for perfectly free, easy, copious breathing. While I do not wish to know from what complaint you are suffering, I sit silently with my visitor and quietly affirm that I shall discover his special necessity and intelligently administer to it; and had you told me that you were afflicted with Asthma and requested me to treat you for it, I should quietly have reasoned with you, and asked you to so far change your language as to put the request for treatment into a logical, concise and affirmative sentence. Had you permitted yourself to think the subject out, you would readily have complied with my request and told me that you wished to breathe freely and easily.

I should then have treated you with the intention and expectation of your doing so, and had you responded to the treatment, you would very quickly have begun to breathe more easily.

Querist: What do you think of denying the existence of the body and of the material world in order to detach one's thoughts from sublunar vanities, that they may be fixed on the realities of Spirit?

Teacher: As I teach the exact, orderly and necessary correspondence between the outer and the inner, I could not be guilty of any such folly which amounts to intellectual stultification, and which, instead of forming the basis of rational healing, involves the most bewildering mysticism and the wildest contradiction in terms. To deny disease is plausible because we wish to be rid of it, and we all seek to fight it until we learn a better way of conquering it.

To first deny the existence of the body and then point to an improvement in that body's condition as a result of a denial of its existence is self-evidently absurd.

It is wise and well to affirm the real existence of the spiritual body and then declare that the physical shape correspondes perfectly to this ideal form. My eyes are perfect my ears are perfect, and many sentences of similar import, are legitimate affirmations, because the ideal organ must be pronounced perfect in order that its exterior correspondence may become perfect. Affirmative statements can be made from the standpoint of interior realization, will, and expectation.

The mental picture of a perfect organ, and then the outwardly spoken word declaring such to be a true picture, is an effective mode of healing, and includes useful auto suggestion when it is a self-declaration.

Querist: I begin to comprehend, I think, that your system of healing is something like this: you make a mental picture of health and suggest it to your patient either silently or aloud; or first silently and then aloud, or vice versa; you then expect that in consequence of a decided change in the object of mental contemplation a corresponding change will be naturally induced in the flesh?

Teacher: Precisely so; and we go so far as to apply this mode of practice to vanquishing all obnoxious habits, and even to the regeneration of society at large, on the basis of the ideal being the essential real, the so-called real being merely the correspondence to the ideal. We look upon the relation between outer and inner or subject and object as between form and shape, number and figure, image and likeness. The form, number, and image are spiritual or ideal; the shape, the figure, and the likeness are external or physical. Both are good but one must precede the other in the logical sequence or the evolution of what is involved.

Suggestive methods of healing, no matter how materialistic or agnostic may be the theories of some doctors who practice them, are efficacious in the degree that they consist of reasonable appeals to the individuals treated; and they prove ineffectual to the degree that they are based on some other conception of humanity than that human nature is good at root and core.

The essential cross is the blending of love and wisdom, which are as truly one in real being as light and heat are one in fire. Fire is revealed in light and in heat, so is divinity revealed in affection and in intellect.

To be a genuine healer one must be lovingly wise and wisely loving, justly merciful and mercifully just. Equity, equipoise, and equilibrium are three kindred words, finally expressive of health, harmony, and order. Seek harmony and persist in seeing it as already consummated within; by so doing you will soon learn the law whereby its outpicturing is rendered certain. Healing and harmonizing are one, therefore to the extent that you succeed in producing states of harmony you are a successful healer, but never any further.

LESSON II.

SPECIFIC CORRESPONDENCES.—PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR HEALING.

It is never easy to enter deeply into the subject of this second lesson, except we undertake to trace our theme far back beyond those obvious appearances which—because they are intensely real to mortal sense—are looked upon as genuine realities by multitudes who have not yet grown to peer beyond effects into the deeper realm of causes. The reason for the difficulty mentioned is that so many people are afflicted with ailments for which their personal errors seem to offer no sort of explanation, and we naturally rebel against any interpretation which enthrones injustice, while it dethrones every noble attribute of Deity in our philosophy.

If people suffer, but do not bring sufferings upon themselves by positive sins or palpable faults, to what shall we turn for a solution of this very perplexing problem, if not to the teaching conveyed in the gospel words concerning the man, who though born blind, received sight as a result of the healer's word and touch. We are all born blind, and in our blindness we make mistakes and suffer for every one of them at some time and in some manner. This suffering, though it is penalty is not punishment, for it proceeds not from divine anger or human displeasure as such, but arises of necessity in the course of our scholastic career as an educational chastisement or discipline; words which mean nothing harsher than cleansing and teaching when traced to their origin.

We are, it must be remembered, traveling toward the goal of perfected self-conscious individuality, and on the road thereto we have much to experiment with, and many of our experiments are conducted ignorantly. We must have the experience of the penalty which grows out of all imperfect or mistaken acts, or we should not attain self-conscious growth (in the attainment of which, racial or general, as well as individual, private and particular conditions must be taken fully into account) before we shall have reached a position where we are sufficiently lifted up on the heights of understanding, to be able to look down and over the field occupied by mortal sense so as to account for all that occurs in that lower and less enlightened region.

It is never easy to isolate or separate one person's life wholly from that of others, because we are in family clusters and communal societies, sowing and reaping, jointly and collectively as well as privately and particularly. When people are afflicted with disorders which appear foreign to their own state, they are frequently reflecting in the preciest possible manner, the errors of those about them; people in whom they are greatly interested, whom they intensely love or fear and upon whom they in many ways depend; while in the case of young children and extremely sensitive people of both sexes and all ages, the source of a malady is clearly traceable to the influence, consciously or unconsciously exerted by a parent, teacher, or intimate friend. With many persons who are not palpably sensitive in so pronounced a degree, we are compelled to look further and deeper into occult influences, or we fail entirely to account for what we actually behold.

Among those who are somewhat interested in Astrology or Solar Biology, it is well to point to the obvious fact that the twelve manners of people sometimes classified according to the Zodiac and sometimes according to the Tribes of Israel, are respectively liable (until they have overcome their specific liabilities) to succumb to the disorders which particularly belong to the domains they occupy in the Grand Man. Where we can be strongest, there are we apt to manifest our most pronounced weakness, because the seat of greatest susceptibility is the zone of temptation with every individual.

Aries, which is the head of the Grand Man and the first of the fiery signs, gives to its natives tendencies, which if rightly used evince great strength in the region of the head. Such people are pre-eminently adapted to do what we agree to call "head work," but we all discover that these are the very people who often suffer most with headache, and when they have been intensely excited are liable to brain fever. It is useless to ignore natural differences or seek to treat everyone alike in a blind sort of manner. These heady, headstrong people are often found in a singularly headweak condition, out of which they can only be brought as their qualifications and temperament are recognized and dealt with in an orderly manner.

Brain workers, who are usually highly intellectual people, find everything flying to their heads, so that bad news or any disturbance in their surroundings quickly makes itself felt in head distemper of some sort. We find many of this type of people suffering from dry, hot heads, their eyes wild looking and abnormally protuberant, with every indication of incipient insanity, though the actual annoyance which they have suffered and which serves to bring about so frantic a condition in appearance, may seem to persons of widely different temperament utterly inadequate to produce such direful results.

Such people are generally talkative in the extreme, and though it would be the height of unwisdom to increase fever by still further exciting them by argument, they need to be quietly and patiently reasoned with. They are impatient and acting unreasonably, for that reason we must, if we are to serve as a true healer or even temporary reliever of their distress, go to them and reason with them in an imperturbable spirit of calm. We will make a mistake if we abruptly contradict them or appear to make very light of their afflictions which, though often very light in our eyes, are very great in theirs. We must be prepared in such cases to listen as well as talk, and even should there be a tendency to incoherency or raving, it will not do to try and prevent it by a command; it must be reasoned away in the calm presence and through the firm quiet agency of one whose own state is unruffled, and whose normal pulse and unfevered temples give evidence that peace reigns within on a stable throne.

These head troubles, as they are often called, lead at first to seeming and then to actual insanity—a state which can be brought about by unintentional mental malpractice. All head difficulties are greatly relieved by marked decision coupled with sincere demonstration of interest in a patient's welfare. Whenever there is a belief that any occupation which employs the mental faculties unduly taxes them, it is wise to suggest both orally and silently, that mental employment is the natural work of such an individual, and that in the doing of it, not in its avoidance or relinquishment, may health be expected. This is where the extreme practicality of mental treatment is made manifest; it does literally "take the bull by the horns" and makes the bull a servant; it does "agree with the adversary quickly," and it does follow out the precept "love your enemies," but all this it accomplishes in a manner very far removed from the way suggested by the conventional misapplication of so divine a precept.

The so-called "adversary" or "enemy" is not such in reality, but only appears to be such until its real nature is understood; then when it is seen to be not adverse or inimical but friendly, having agreed with it, it can no longer disagree with the individual to whom it really stands in a friendly, though hitherto misconceived and consequently apparently unfriendly attitude.

Nothing is unfriendly after one has made friends with it. "Blessed are the peacemakers" is a saying far too seldom expounded in the light of its luminous significance. Peace cannot be kept or maintained unbroken save in places where it already exists, but where it is now absent it can become present, it can be induced, created, and so firmly established on the basis of a right understanding of mutual relationships that the elements which formerly yielded chaos, can be henceforward welded into cosmos.

We may readily understand the position taken by the practitioner of Spiritual or Divine Science who, going into the midst of strife, breathes forth the spirit of peace. Well-balanced, intellectual people are needed to reach ill-balanced intellectual people, because harmony needs to reign in the teacher in the special domain where discord prevails in the scholar. To evade a fact through ignorance of its nature and existence, is not to heal; healing being a result of deliberate, enlightened grappling with a trying situation to the end that discord is vanquished because harmony is induced, —we cannot always say restored—because there are many places wherein disorders have prevailed from before the birth of the sufferers we are called upon to relieve.

Hereditary discords can and must be mastered in the same way that such discords as have been acquired after birth are overcome. There is no truer statement than that every limitation can be cast aside, but errors are vanquished only by applying to their destruction the truths to which they are exactly opposed. Here comes in the law of correspondences in the killing out of error. If falsehoods have been told only the tongue can be the fitting instrument of restitution, therefore true words must be spoken to destroy the influence of false; kind words must be spoken to nullify the effect of cruel. The same members must be employed which have been misemployed; for on the plane where wrong has prevailed, there must the contrary right much more prevail.

This doctrine of correspondence is not unfathomable, but it is profound, but though deep it is not obscure; for it teaches us to look for the remedy in the use of what has been perverted and thus diverted from use to misuse.

Conversion or turning around, is re-directing the stream into its proper channel; introducing the river to its native bed from which it has been turned away by some crooked device. We cannot rationally explain wrongs, for they are unreasonable; but the right, which is to destroy wrong is explicable, and we are not concerned as much with the cause of the malady as with the method of release therefrom.

Here comes in one of the most vital points in all truly practical metaphysical teaching! Intelligent practitioners no longer think it necessary to flounder about in the mud or wallow in the mire of sensual causation to apply the only true and lasting antidote to sensuality, which is to strengthen innate love of purity, and it seems scarcely credible that any one should be qualified to do this who has not felt within himself the thrill of an awakening consciousness that a virtuous life is not only possible and right, but much more than this—the only possibly satisfactory and truly enjoyable life.

When we have to deal with high-strung and over-strung natures, we need to be cautious, lest we present truth in a way calculated to antagonize rather than attract. It is this caution which differs widely from nervous carefulness which needs explanation many times, and when it is made clear, difficulties of long standing vanish. Caution is the accompaniment not only of discretion, but of kindly solicitude in place of rash thoughtlessness. A cautious, discriminating temper is never one that coldly calculates when it is warmed with love, though without affection it is indeed pure and cold like ice or marble. We need fire as well as ice, and though the cool hand is very welcome at times, oftener the warm, glowing heart of love must be behind it, or its touch will chill but cannot heal.

There are so many elements which go to make up a perfect character, and we see these varied elements so wondrously combined in the portrait of the manifested Christ, that we can scarcely fail to see why and how it is that Jesus healed all manners of sickness and disorder, and assured his disciples that they should do the same proportionately as they ate and drank of that interior nature which should eventually shine forth in them as it already shone forth in him.

If we look upon the head as the seat of authority and say that those individuals who are in the province of the head are the chief thinkers and intellectual leaders of the world, and that these are more likely than any others to suffer from head troubles, we shall have struck a keynote which will enable us as we follow its suggestions, to reach a conclusion applicable to all other parts of the human anatomy; for no sooner does anyone gain real insight into the nature and working of the law of correspondence at one point, than he finds himself able, by a little study, to apply it at any other point in the entire organism; the rule of application being the same fundamentally in all instances.

Headaches proceed from intellectual difficulties, mental embarrassments and harassments; to conquer these, we see at once that denials as such are useless. Affirmations only are conclusive. Take now, as a sample illustration, the following common case likely to crop up anywhere at any time, and witness the application of the theory of correspondences we are seeking to elucidate.

A patient comes to a healer with the complaint that everything is going wrong in his affairs and he is feeling so bewildered, he knows not which way to turn. Everything is going right with you concerning all your affairs, is a good, concise, comprehensive statement to make by way of rightful suggestion. Such a sentence is a pure affirmation, the suggestive value of which is exceedingly great, because it diverts thought immediately into an entirely new and highly profitable channel; it cannot therefore encourage confusion, but if it works at all it must aid in the evolution of harmony.

If the patient is of a very questioning turn and wishes to clearly apprehend the truth of what you declare in an intellectual manner, you should be prepared to say to him, "I wish you from this moment forward to realize that a decided alteration has taken place in the current of your affairs. From the instant you came to me and requested me to give you a treatment, you put yourself in a receptive attitude toward a new line of mental influence, and this new thought must ultimate itself progressively in a corresponding change in both departments of your affairs—the inner and the outer. Your trouble has been twofold; you have suffered in your own person and also in your business or domestic environment; do not blindly expect the change to begin in things outside your personality; changes begin within and proceed in orderly sequence to without. You are within yourself feeling brighter, better, cheerier, and in consequence of your having absorbed and assimilated the healing thought offered you, which you voluntarily came to seek, you are henceforward in a healthier attitude toward all about you than before."

Of course we have no intention of formulating a series of stereotyped sentences and urging that they should be used verbatim et literatim on every available occasion. We are only seeking to suggest the kind of statement which is generally wise to make when explanations are sought by persons who do not immediately understand what you are saying to them. Remember when you are dealing with that section of humanity which seems to occupy the province of the head, you must be particularly ready with definitions and explanations, for they demand them and will not be put off without them.

The head has its rights as well as the heart, and where doubts and difficulties are pressing and intellectual satisfaction is required, no treatment suffices to heal which fails to supply the needed mental pabulum. We know there is a side to the doctrine of the utility of denials which deserves respectful consideration, but as we proceed to explain this as we understand it, you will clearly see that the chief difference between the two modes of statement is technical rather than intentional, though the distinction is nevertheless important.

Miss Charlotte Hawes of Boston, a well known teacher of music, has given to the world a beautiful song opening with these words:

"Set the world to music,
Haunt it with a song;
Hide this wisdom in it,
Nothing can go wrong."

If everything goes right, nothing goes wrong, but though the latter declaration is legitimate and helpful, is not the former the stronger of the two?

We are simply calling attention to major and minor benefits likely to accrue from differing phraseologies. Let the tired, worried woman, who has been incessantly fretting and fuming over trials and discords, take up her parable in the words of the song and sing during her work "Nothing can go wrong." She has taken a great step forward and she will soon prove the relative wisdom of her course by seeing difficulties vanish and weariness depart, but when she goes still further in the correct use of language and exultingly exclaims, "Everything goes right," she will be a still greater power in her household, as her diction will be confined to the vocabulary of heaven.

Suppose we take these two mottoes, "Nothing can go wrong" and "Everything goes right" and place them on our walls; we must be careful in the one case, lest we let some one sit where he will see the word wrong staring him in the face, but with the other we need exercise no caution, for there is not a word in the sentence which can possibly exert a baneful influence as it appeals to consciousness through eye or ear. Sit where you will in the class-room, let any pillar hide a portion of the text from your vision, and the purely affirmative motto can exercise no pernicious influence; while the other, good though it is as a whole, may inadvertently suggest nothing but wrong, while the former in the same position could suggest nothing but right to those who were so seated that they beheld only the terminal word.

Discretion is indeed the better part of valor, and nowhere do we need to be more discreet than in the presence of sensitive, nervously active, ill-balanced persons, who are among the first to apply for mental treatment; because in their cases more frequently than in any others, regular physicians and everybody else are apt to declare that mental treatment may prove effective.

The orderly work of mental healing carried on in accordance with an understanding and application of the law of correspondence is a beautiful, healthful undertaking—a work in which the most delicately organized maiden can well engage, but when the questionable method of denying disease, after having ferreted it out and called it by name, is introduced, we will not answer for the effect produced by such a course upon highly sensitive and intensely imaginative temperaments. As Paul said, "all things may be lawful, but all things are not expedient," so there may be questionable and unquestionable modes of mental practice, consequently without condemning the former we confine ourselves to positive advocacy of the latter only. Affirmations are useful at all times, in all places, and on behalf of all people, and, as we grow more and more into an understanding of this, we shall see our way to a plain, logical, and effectual settlement of many a mooted question which has come up again and again as a vexed problem in the path of the mental practitioner.

There is a correct answer to every conceivable question, and that answer agrees always with the Golden Rule, which we have no right to twist and travesty until it appears to mean one thing for us and something altogether different for our neighbors. We never really offend people by appealing to their highest and best, but we often give needless offense to others by dwelling in our own thoughts upon their supposed delinquencies. One of the most pitiful blunders ever made is the setting up hideous scarecrows, veritable "men of straw," between ourselves and those about us, and then practicing and advocating an elaborately impertinent system of mental treatment, justified only on the pretext that our effigies are real flesh and blood humanity. We know of so many cases where this error fatally prevails, that we have no hesitancy in pointing out its thoroughly erroneous character for the sake of suggesting the much needed remedy; for we make it our invariable course never to refer to what we see to be a mistake except in connection with a practical plan of remedy. If people would only consider that their views of people and things are not necessarily correct, a great forward step would soon be taken out of the desert of discord into the good land of harmony, which we can all possess if we will but march steadily forward, leaving Egyptian beliefs behind us while on the road from thence to Canaan.

When we come to perceive that the real entity is everywhere the same and that it can always be appealed to, we learn to look with disfavor upon mental treatment "for disease" or "for discord," because we know that the very mention of the name of anything conjures up its reflection before the mental vision, and we cannot afford to be looking constantly upon ugly pictures if we would save ourselves and help to deliver others from the shadows which now entomb them.

There is so much in accepted Christian phraseology that can be pressed into the service of Divine Science, that it is quite unnecessary to coin a novel terminology when working among people who are used to the sound of certain phrases, which are as music in their ears; especially when these very phrases are full of sound, healthful suggestiveness. Uncompromising loyalty to truth does not demand iconoclastic procedure, except where there is a "golden calf" or other molten image to be broken up; and while we hope to be ever ready to demolish idols, it is our sincere desire to preserve and glorify whatever is of help and service to humanity. Take for illustration the words of a beautiful hymn:

> "O, eyes that are weary and hearts that are sore, > Look off unto Jesus and sorrow no more."

The conception is beautifully ideal. Eyes are wearied and sight is wasted with gazing upon what is hideous and repellant. Deliverance from the manifold afflictions brought upon us by our gazing upon what is unlovely, is to be accomplished only as we obey the wise injunction: "Whatsoever things are excellent and of good repute, think on these things."

Any attempt to divert attention from the nauseous and fear-inspiring must be abortive, unless there be placed before the gaze of the sufferer a new and better subject for contemplation. A very interesting little anecdote was found not long ago in more than one newspaper. It ran as follows: A little boy had somewhat disturbed his mother, who slept in a room next to his chamber, by counting aloud the pattern of the wall paper incessantly morning after morning. The tedious repetition could do the child no good, and it was tiresome to the ears of the mother, who, being a wise woman, found no fault, but supplied a remedy in the form of a pleasing picture which she hung on the wall exactly opposite her son's bed. The little fellow was so delighted with this mural decoration that he quite relinquished his former tedious habit and soon developed a real taste for fine engravings and paintings of worth. The action of that sensible woman contains a practical lesson for all who would wisely practice suggestive therapeutics or any form of mental healing.

Divert attention from the undesirable by presenting the desirable, and just as this is readily done outwardly when we have the handling of material things, it must be done equally and in precisely the same manner on the psychic or subjective plane when we are handling spiritual things. The law of correspondence works inversely. As it is above and within, so is it below and without. There are no two orders in the universe; there can be but one order. A word to the wise is sufficient, but the unwise may require many utterances before they are deeply influenced to forsake error for truth, and be it remembered that no one can reasonably be expected to share your mental attitude until he understands it and sees it to be reasonable. Be not impatient and be not officious. Seek to propagate the truth, but though a propagandist, be not a proselyter, for proselytes blow hot and cold, and are only the creatures of temporary sensationalism.

It is only by the steady, persistent holding of right thought that error can be displaced, and if you are not at once very successful in your work so far as appearances go, remember faith may develop as a grain of mustard seed unfolds. Do not say or allow yourself to believe that you can do nothing because as yet you can do but little. Small faith is living faith and holds within itself the seed of gigantic faith—faith so great and so potential that it can remove obstacles comparable to great mountains.

Forget not the injunction "Heal thyself," which means immeasurably more in its interior spirit than in its apparent letter. To heal yourself so as to prepare yourself to be God's instrument for healing others, is not at once to lay finally aside the last vestiges of some lingering physical appearance; it is to purge the thought-realm of those interior disorders which are the real diseases, the outward effects of which are all that is perceptible on the most external plane of observation.

There must be the right thought concerning others in your own consciousness, before you are ready to step forward and proclaim yourself a healer. Failures and disappointments will continue to ensue just as long as you inwardly maintain the belief that you are right in holding on to a carnal estimate of your neighbor. Our Swedenborgian friends who make more of the doctrine of correspondences than do any other company of people, are quite right when they say, do not fight evils, but let the Lord overcome them in you.

We must open ourselves to divine influx; we must welcome goodness into our affections and truth into our understanding, and as we keep our spiritual gaze riveted upon the heights, we shall obtain light and our countenances will shine so that those who are in the depths will see the light, which is God's universal radiance reflected through us to those of our brethern who stand in such relation to us that it is orderly that we should be unto them torchbearers and light dispensers.

Finally, everyone must accomplish his own regeneration through inward acceptance and assimilation of truth, each for himself. We are not wells or fountains to our neighbors, but we are guides to the fountains, to the wells and to the rivers of salvation. Let us be faithful guides and our good work will prove itself in harvests of benediction, to be shared equally by us and our companions. The clear air of neighborly affection is beneficial to all who breathe it, while the fetid atmosphere of exclusive interest in self is stifling to all who inhale it. It follows, therefore, that the very states of mind which enable us to bless our brethren are largely conducive to our individual well-being.

LESSON III.

THE TWELVE MANNERS OF PEOPLE.—THEIR PECULIARITIES AND LIABILITIES.

In the second lesson of this course, we touched upon the topic of this third discourse, and by making special mention of the Head, we suggested a line of thought which we now propose to follow out in greater detail. It is well to keep in mind the caution that no such theory as that outlined in our book entitled "Our Places in the Universal Zodiac" can be properly taken in an arbitrary way and persistently enforced in an almanac manner, so as to insist that all persons born at the same season of the year are so much alike that what befalls one must overtake all the rest. Astrology has its roots in the Science of Human Expression, and, when rightly understood, helps very many people to a clearer understanding of themselves and others; but as the topic of Astrology is beset with many dangers, it is well to clear away rubbish by positively affirming certain fundamental propositions in the clearest possible manner.

First, let it be admitted that Equality is the cardinal watchword of Divine Science. We are equal in that we are all offspring of Deity. If one is a child of God, so are all the rest; therefore, all souls are alike unto the Eternal, who is no respecter of persons.

Second, we must note that Variety is a prime characteristic of expression, and it is through differences (not disagreements or discords) that essential equality is to be revealed.

Third, Inequality is surely noticeable in the external world, and this pertains neither to the essential nature of humankind nor to the specific nature of a particular soul, but only to the degree of development reached at present by some and not by others. The family example is always in place. We are sons and daughters of the same parents, but some are elder and some are younger children.

In social position we are equals by birth, but in measure of attainment we are unequal. Elder brothers and sisters can teach the younger, and so do we come to learn that in some mysterious way we are related in the great human family as we are related in the smaller groups which constitute our private households. Brotherliness and sisterliness must be ever the keynote to enduring harmony, but fraternity does not displace schools and teachers, for it does not blindly assert that all are at present equal in any other than the primal sense—that all are members of one great family and God is the parent of us all.

When we get back of all phenomena and seek to consider ourselves as divine offspring only, we are confronted with so glorious a vision of our inward perfectness that we can but exclaim with Emerson, "I, the imperfect, adore my own perfect." But in that immortal sentence have we not a distinctive acknowledgement of the two—the perfect which is eternal, and the imperfect which is temporal; it is the latter, not the former, which needs teaching, guiding, healing.

Ourselves appear as Adam and then as Enos, later on as Noah, and after some great transition in our experience (which may be likened to a flood) as Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph successively—till at length we reach the Messianic height and know ourselves as we truly are. This involves a long process in evolution, and as we journey along this continuous way we can all help each other, and we must be equally willing to help and to be helped if we would progress truly.

The twelve sons of Jacob, titled Israel, as they are enumerated in the 49th chapter of Genesis are clearly of the earth earthy. They are there described as tribes of Israel, but their father is not God, but Jacob, and they partake of mortal qualities. They have great destinies to fulfill—twelve distinct kinds of destiny within one all-including divinely appointed destiny. Strength and weakness, innate qualities of power and liabilities to weakness are all enumerated by the patriarch as he addresses his twelve assembled sons before bidding them a final farewell as to the state in which they then beheld him. Let us see how he addresses them, what message he has for each, and then turn later on to the twelve tribes as we find them enumerated in the 7th chapter of Revelations, where we shall discover them in regenerated order. In Genesis we are introduced to Jacob's offspring in their unregenerate, or first Adam condition; in the Apocalypse we are shown these same twelve types of humanity regenerated into the likeness of the second Adam, who is the octave note, the eighth tone, the first in the new ascending scale of ever upward and onward progress.

In our first estate before we are born anew, we are liable to all sorts of disorders which come to us in different ways according to our diverse temperaments, but having conquered the flesh, by subduing its appetites, having gained full mastery over the passions which formerly rode rampant in us, we have come first into the sight and then into the very heart of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Regeneration must follow generation as an orderly process; we must be born a second time into a new and higher consciousness than came with our earlier birth. A first birth need not be sinful; it may indeed without being miraculous, be immaculate, but even if it be so, it is to be followed by a higher, nobler, fuller realization of life; therefore, the Christ is ever saying, "I am come that they might have more abundant life." Take this advent of the Christ into your consciousness in any sense you will, it is always the inrushing of a wider view, a sense of more glorious possibilities, a realization of a measure of freedom and degree of power hitherto undreamed of. It is a new revelation made possible by all that went before it, the crown placed upon the head which was without a diadem until it had evolved for itself an aureole.

Jacob and his twelve sons are in our midst to-day. Such characters are not mythical but actual, and they are far more than historical, for they are living among us; they are us and we are they. Reuben, the first born, is a remarkable type, and he is shown forth in all the excellency of physical strength and dignity; but he is as yet only conscious of the exterior aspect of his power, therefore though possessed of might, he is unstable in the exercise of it. Jacob is a prophet, so he points out to his sons what shall come to them in their "last days," which means that through the exercise of the faculty of seership one is able to confidently predict what will be the certain outcome of any course of thought and corresponding action steadily pursued. We make mysteries of prophecy; we cast discredit on the seer and vaunt ourselves that we are scientific because we are agnostic, (a scholarly synonym for ignorant), but when we have drank a little more deeply from the well of knowledge, we no longer sneer at the well of Jacob, for we become Jacobs and then others may sneer at us, for we are in our turn among the prophets.

Verily there is a continual evolution of that which is involved in every one of us; let us, therefore, be ever on our guard against suppositious finalities, for there are no finalities but axioms of truth, and these can be increased in number, though never altered in reality. Jacob sees the future of Reuben as a gardener sees the future of the seeds he has sown and the slips he has planted. All growth is one growth; there is but one order of growth, therefore, as plants grow so men grow. It is from the standpoint of this knowledge that we can interpret the law of prognosis in addition to diagnosis; for he who prognosticates or foretells the future must be acquainted with the present and the past, and with the law of sequence that has brought a present from a past and will surely bring a future from a present.

Jacob is clairvoyant, psychometric, intuitive; he understands the underlying principles of astrology and palmistry as well as of phrenology and physiognomy. Twelve young men stand before him and he can read their heads, faces, hands, and more—he can penetrate below their surfaces and detect what is going on within them. Jacob is on a deathbed, he is dying to an old state and rising to a new condition. He is not declining or perishing, he is enlarging, expanding, and as he is taking his departure to the next rung of the ladder of conscious existence he is melting into his successor; he will be a Joseph when in the future we re-encounter him. Shall we recognize him, or will he be unknown to us then unless he re-enter in appearance his former lower state? That depends upon how far our spiritual eyes are open, or how nearly we are blind.

On a deathbed people are wont to be honest, and their words are apt to be treasured through succeeding generations. Dying people are going away and they have nothing to fear, to gain, or to lose by outspokenness, and because of this they are apt to be unusually lucid in their delineations of the characters of those about them. Honesty impels foresight and insight, and the two are inseparable; without the one, the other cannot be. Strong points and weak points are seen together, and both must be mentioned, that the weak be strengthened and the strong rendered stronger still.

We can hardly read the whole of the frank utterance of Reuben's father to his firstborn without being appalled at the glaring contrast it presents; but Reuben is with us to-day, and we must face the modern situation, however little we know of the ancient history. Reuben may come to you any moment for advice and treatment; can you give him a clairvoyant examination, or what is better, an intuitive diagnosis of his case? This proud, dignified man occupies a high position in society; he is much looked up to and respected, and he deserves much praise for some of his conduct, for it is excellent; but there has lain hidden somewhere a grievous wrong—an injustice—a breach of honor, some disloyalty to a trust, and that disloyalty has been the secret worm which has gnawed at Reuben's vitals. How surprised his companions would be if they only suspected what they need never know, for the offense may be of a private nature and should not be mentioned beyond the confines of his home.

It is well to tell the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well that she has had five husbands and is now living in adultery, but it must be told in a private interview, and so told that she will be led to ennoble her own life and bring others to the feet of truth because of the telling of it.

Verily Jacob's couch and Jacob's well are telltale institutions, and you must beware how you approach them if you do not wish your secrets to be made known. Seership holds no terrors for the virtuous, only the vicious are afraid of extended perceptions. Thought reading is terrible to him or to her whose thoughts are evil, while to the man or woman whose thoughts are pure the thought reader is as a savior. If during the next century thoughts are read well nigh universally, the premium so long placed on deception will be removed. Let us pray and work that Jacob's well may become universal, and then we shall be ready to die to it by passing beyond it to a nobler well which is within us. Deathbeds are seats of judgment! When we are dying to old conditions and passing on to new, we judge our own past and we help others to greater self-knowledge. We must not be afraid of a revelation, for as long as we shut our eyes to causes, we cannot effectually bid effects to cease.

Simeon and Levi are brethern, instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. Here we have mentioned a second and a third type of humanity, two types closely allied; no better and no worse than the first, but different altogether from it. Reuben sins in secret and his vices find him out openly; while two of his brothers sin in public and they suffer in silence in consequence of open transgressions. How fierce are the denunciations of the father upon the iniquities of the children, and yet he eventually pronounces his blessing over all. He does not say cursed be they, but, "cursed be their anger for it was cruel."

Warriors are not an accursed race; among them are to be found noble patriots and faithful champions of right, but warfare is itself cursed. Swords are to be melted into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks; garments are to be sold that spiritual weapons may be provided, but he who lifts his hand to slay his brother with a carnal weapon shall himself be slain. Weapons of warfare are still in your habitations, Oh, ye of the tribes of Simeon and Levi, but they need not be such weapons as guns and pistols! they may be warlike thoughts which "dig down the wall." You have undermined your constitution by thinking angrily of others; you have warred against your brethern with your tongues though not with your fists, and worst of all, you have wished to undermine them. You have strength but you have misused it; acknowledge your strength as a blessing, and use it henceforward for the good of all, but no more abuse it, is the counsel given you by a faithful instructor.

Concerning Judah it seems that no words of praise can be too extravagant, and yet this fourth type of humanity is not faultless, though it is indeed beautiful. Judah may become intemperate, and when his "eyes become red with wine" he may be guilty of manifold indiscretions. Judah people are very kind hearted, very handsome and very capable, but for all that they may bring trouble upon themselves through excesses, and while they are among the natural rulers of the world, and they rule through inward greatness, they must be shown wherein they have misdirected power when the time comes that they too must suffer affliction.

Zebulun, the fifth type, is given to travel across deep waters; he is of maritime disposition and loves to dwell by the seaside. Such people are liberal, broad, prosperous, enterprising and progressive; they rejoice in wide outlooks, but as it is by the water that they dwell, their danger is from the water. Zebulun may be "a haven for ships"; he is kind, considerate, liberal minded, but he may get beyond his depth, and when he is found sinking, it is beneath the very waves which are his proper delight and the means of his promotion.

Issachar, a sixth type of humanity, is a burden bearer, and when he is at the height of power, he is like unto "a strong ass couching between two burdens." Here we have a suggestion of those who are naturally servants; they love to do those things which others would consider burdensome if not degrading. Just as it is in the animal world where some animals display characteristics which other types do not manifest, so is it in our human economy—we are so adapted to differing pursuits, that situations which would prove extremely depressing to some, are the natural habitat of others. Becoming "a servant unto tribute" does not sound attractive in an age which boasts of liberty, and in a land which shouts the praises of freedom; and possibly at this very point we shall discover that while haughtiness and egotism are causes of some disorders, undue servility will be found the wellspring of equal though widely differing troubles in another type of person. As the flightiness of some people needs toning down, so does the humility of others need toning up. How wise indeed does a counselor of many need to be; how versatile in understanding should be he or she who attempts to reach helpfully great varieties of temperaments.

Reuben may call at your office at ten in the morning, and at three in the afternoon of the same day you may be called upon to prescribe for Issachar. Reuben may be the proud millionaire who comes in his carriage attended with his men servants, or he may summon you to his palatial home; while Issachar will very likely be one of the underlings in Reuben's kitchen, or the old, tired, oppressed man who runs the elevator in Reuben's magnificent place of business. When you treat them both you must remember they are spiritually and also physically from the same source. If the same Lord is the father of their souls, the same "Jacob" is the father of their bodies; and there is but one Lord and there is but one Jacob, in the broadest sense. When you remember this, you are not likely to be puffed up because Reuben sent for you, nor are you disposed to treat Issachar as though he were but a beast of burden. If you reach both so as to be a help to both, you must induce Reuben to be less haughty and Issachar to be less servile. The ailment of the former is probably head trouble—the difficulty with the latter is doubtless a wasting disease and general lack of vitality.

Dan, who is numbered seven, in this classification, is the most troublesome to deal with of all the sons of Jacob, for though he shall judge his people he is, while unregenerate, like a serpent in the way and an adder in the path; he biteth the horses heels and causeth the rider to stumble and fall backward. Clearly Dan is the Scorpion of the Zodiac; his promptings are sensual, for in him sex power and its lusts will reach their maximum. You must be very uncompromising with him; you must be unto him as Elisha was to Naaman—a stern prophet who orders seven bathings in Jordan, and will not tolerate continual indulgences in sensuality, nor hold out to him any hope of recovery so long as former courses are not abandoned. Dan is very prominent everywhere, and a word to the wise is sufficient to suggest how he must be dealt with. The whole problem of sexual regeneration,—of conquest over the oldest of serpents who ever tempted mankind, is here suggested; and this is a case which needs firm though temperate handling. Dan, as we have formerly known him, will be no more seen or heard about when we read the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, clothed in white raiment, standing before the throne of Divinity, unabashed in presence of the spotless Lamb.

Gad, the eighth type, is one of those who have much to overcome; but though at first he appear vanquished, he shall be the conquerer at last. Gad is sore pressed oftentimes; he has fits of the blues and days of despondency; circumstances about him appear untoward in the extreme, and he believes he must succumb to his adverse fate and submit to the cruel blows of universal misfortune. The troubles of Gad are not one, but many; he is tormented with a legion of tormentors, and when you question him, or look into his affairs, you will soon discover that the whole head seems sick and the entire heart faint. You cannot enumerate troubles of Gad,—he is a veritable Job in his afflictions; all you can do if you are to help him, is to assure him of final victory. Read the book of Job in the ears of Gad, and if you can interpret some of it in the light of your own experience, so much the better. Gad has met the Accuser; Satan has buffeted him and a host of perplexities are overwhelming him. You will know him when you see him; we need not describe him further, and when he comes to you, or you are summoned to his presence, let your word be one of assurance that light shall spring out of darkness and out of apparent evil shall actual good proceed. Don't tantalize the poor fellow whatever you do; don't twit him with what you imagine to be his shortcomings; don't tell him he endures no anguish and feels no pain. You must be very sympathetic with Gad, but your sympathy must not be the mawkish sentimentality which pays atrocious "visits of condolence;" it must be stalwart, fearless, faithful and prophetic; it must point to certain victory. You must not dismiss Gad till you have made him feel convinced that though a host of difficulties have encompassed him, and he has seemingly been conquered by them, he shall overcome at the last. Your fate is in your own hands, Gad, you shall conquer your manifold oppressors and out of your trials you shall come forth as gold purified by fire.

Asher, a ninth type, finds the world for the most part going smoothly with him; he has delicacies to spare and, perhaps, money to burn, but in spite of his general well-offness, he may be sorely afflicted at times through a surfeit of delicacies; for dainties often clog and banquets have been known to destroy the fleshly tabernacles of emperors. Asher may also be surfeited with the goods of the intellect, and though he yields "royal dainties," he does not always know how best to make use of them.

A tenth type is Napthali, the orator; the eloquent speaker whose words are goodly; he is a fine preacher, a brilliant conversationalist, but he is like "a hind let loose" and sometimes he is thrown down and wounded by his impetuosity. Napthali may lack caution; he may be too exuberant and get into trouble through that very tongue which is his glory. Indiscretions in speech often cause sorrow; so the tongue must be guarded, controlled, but not silenced.

Words fail to describe Joseph, he who is the eleventh brother, for he greatly excelleth all the rest. Jacob has given to Joseph a long-sleeved coat of many colors, and it has aroused the ire of his brethern. Joseph is the brightest, the finest, the most intelligent of all the family; you cannot readily mistake him; he is so gifted a person, so much of a genius that his very greatness attracts to him the envy and malice of those who have not risen anywhere near to his altitude. Joseph writes great books, paints glorious pictures, sings heavenly songs, speaks with silver tongued eloquence golden words of wisdom. He is a seer, a prophet, and his father knows it and looks up to him with reverence. Poor old Jacob! his gray hairs had been brought down with sorrow nigh unto the grave, because of the maltreatment his beloved Joseph had received at the hand of the other lads!

We all love Joseph if we know him; he is so wise and so handsome, but he excites, more than any brother of his, the cupidity and hatred of lesser persons, who think their smallness is due to others' greatness. Disregard for the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet anything that is thy neighbor's," may lie at the root of a thousand and one maladies which we foolishly, blindly, and often blasphemously attribute to widely different causes. Joseph is truly great and he knows it! he has a vision and does not disguise the fact; messages come to him from heaven for his parents and his brethern, and he is insolent enough to tell of his dreams and not keep silent concerning his visions. Greatness is irrepressible; worth must show itself; you are but a poor hypocrite if you try to appear small when you know you are great; but greatness saves no one from persecution, therefore you need not envy Joseph, for his heart is often sore, for he has a very loving nature, and his brothers smite him in his most vulnerable spot.

It cannot be hidden from Joseph that, though not the first born after the flesh, he is the highest born after the spirit. The earthly man-made law of primogeniture cannot be permitted to prevail. Estates cannot be everlastingly entailed! worth, not age, merit in place of legal claim unbacked by excellence, must and will assert itself in final triumph. Joseph may appeal to you for help and succor; he may be sometimes found in a pit or sold to Ishmaelites. Say unto Joseph that his blessings are most abundant even in that which has brought him bitterest suffering, viz., his separation from his brethern. Joseph as a child is often in tears; Joseph as a young man is often stung with insults, but in the heart of genius lies the seed and certain promise of completest victory, and of this, Joseph in his youth needs to be assured; in his age he will not need to be told it, for then he will have abundantly proved it.

The twelfth type, Benjamin is dismissed with short comment; all that is said of him is that he resembles a wolf; he is not a character that stands out very prominently alone; wolves hunt in packs, not singly; so they are symbolical of strongly social natures which dislike solitudes and are strongly convivial, though not always amiable in disposition.

The twelve types stand thus in Genesis: First, Reuben; second, Simeon; third, Levi; fourth, Judah; fifth, Zebulun; sixth, Issachar; seventh, Dan; eighth, Gad; ninth, Asher; tenth, Napthali; eleventh, Joseph; twelfth, Benjamin.

These are the twelve tribes of the scattered Israel, which is both Jew and Gentile, and is to be found dispersed over all the world to-day. What are the meanings of these twelve names? We require to understand these various peoples, for understanding is the only cure for misunderstanding and mismating and all the other mistakes which are our diseases, the remedy for which is to be found only in understanding aright.

Reuben signifies a son who is an evidence of God's mercy; an answer to a father's earnest petition. Simeon is one who is heard or who makes a noise in the world. Levi is the crowned one. Judah's name declares that he shall receive praise. The name of Zebulun denotes one who provides for himself and for others a habitation. Issachar signifies one given to laughter. Dan is a judge. Gad a fortunate person. Asher a happy disposition. Napthali one given to contest. Joseph he who will ever make additions. Benjamin a son of the right hand, or an executive person, not an originator.

In the 48th chapter of Ezekiel, the twelve tribes are classified on four sides of the city of Israel, the capital of the great projected commonwealth. Reuben, Judah and Levi are at the North; Joseph, Benjamin and Dan are at the East; Simeon,Issachar and Zebulun are at the South; Gad, Asher and Napthali are at the West. Here is evidently intended far more than a literal plan of a literal city.

The twelve tribes of Israel are clearly twelve manners of people; we are included among them, and happy are we if we succeed in so finding ourselves and others that through the blessed ministry of divine healing (harmonizing), science, philosophy, religion and art may, like four sides of a square, exemplify on earth a state of perfect harmony, patterned after the celestial model which can be nothing short of the arrangement of angels in the upper heavens, whose celestial order will yet be made manifest on earth in an ideal social state, completely actualized, significantly foretold as the new and universal City of God, the abode of peace—Jerusalem.

LESSON IV.

HEALING OF THE NATIONS AND REDEMPTION OF THE TRIBES.

Having considered the twelve tribes of Israel as they have been introduced to us in Genesis XLIX and Ezekiel XLVIII, we now turn to the 7th chapter of the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelations, and see how differently they appear in their new order from the manner in which they were presented before our gaze in their earliest arrangement. Twelve tribes of Israel, be it remembered, signify all the distinct varieties of a "chosen people."

We need to inquire into what is meant by an "elect nation," a "holy seed," and other expressions frequently encountered in Holy Scripture and elsewhere,—sayings which, though they contain a great wealth of instruction for the intelligent reader, are very frequently so misread that they become stumbling blocks and rocks of offence.

Partiality is not a divine attribute; special privileges arbitrarily conferred on some and withheld from others, regardless of merit or demerit, can only awaken sentiments the very reverse of grateful and reverential. We dismiss, therefore, as utterly unworthy of regard, all theories of election which teach a partial God and a universal order opposed to our highest and ever-expanding ideals of equity, which is righteousness. God's ways are higher, not lower, than our ways, and when we are asked to tell how we can judge as to what is high and what is low in moral order, our reply invariably is that in the course of moral awakenment, we all grow further and further away from favoritism, and nearer and nearer to a demand for rigid impartiality in all disbursements. When Whittier was challenged to defend some of his grandest utterances concerning the universality of divine goodness, the gist and essence of his stalwart reply to every critic is to be found in the following lines:

> "Nothing can be good in Him
> Which evil is in me."

God's will is mirrored in our human sense of righteousness, and as our mirrors grow clearer and clearer, we come to see more and more of divine order. It speaks well for President McKinley that his favorite hymn contains the words:

> "But we make His love too narrow by false limits of our own,
> And we magnify His strictness with a zeal He will not own."

It is noteworthy that those words came from the Roman Catholic priest, Faber, at a time when the harsher views of religion put forth by lesser lights, were in the ascendant, and the milder doctrines of the greater fathers of the church were being overclouded.

"Many are called but few are chosen" is a stumbling block, unless we open our eyes to its obviously practical meaning; then it becomes luminous. Joseph receives a long-sleeved coat of many colors from his father, Jacob, who has received the title of Israel. Joseph's brethern are much incensed against him and also against their father, because of this act of seeming partiality displayed by their common father toward one of the lads. Envy, jealousy and all such hideous emotions make life wretched—destroy physical tissue and are behind more diseases than perhaps all other base emotions put together.

Envy and such abominable feelings as jealous dislike of our neighbors, are all products of senseless ignorance. They all spring from a false estimate of what constitutes and what makes for success. So long as we are dark enough to believe that one's downfall promotes another's rise, such emotions will stir in our bosoms as have from time immemorial disturbed the peace of the various sons of Jacob, who were enraged against Joseph because he was more highly endowed than they.

In the regenerated state of humanity depicted in prophecy as a condition to be reached, a goal yet to be won, we find twelve tribes sealed and twelve thousand sealed out of every tribe, so no tribe yields more nor less than any other. Here is equality, and here also is variety, but inequality has vanished. Still Israel, for a time, is distinct from all the rest of humanity; but eventually the multitude, innumerable by human calculation or mortal arithmetic, shares Israel's position, and stands a larger Israel including the smaller before the "throne" and before the "lamb." These wonderful correspondences open to us measureless continents of spiritual territory, inviting us to explore and explore and explore, till we have at last discovered enough to afford us a plan, a perfect model, for the upbuilding of a terrestrial city in harmony with a superterrestrial design.

Pain, sickness, sorrow and death are to be finally abolished. We are not told that they came into the world on any particular day in any calendar, but simply that they came in consequence of certain inharmonious relations between members of the human family, and that they must disappear whenever the causes which gave them birth are no longer operating. "The day and the hour knoweth no man." Chronological and geographical definitions are never interpretations, but becloudings of a sacred text. Zion is wherever holiness prevails; Jerusalem is wherever peace is regnant. These two cities are to be married; they are divinely appointed bride and bridegroom, and when their nuptials have been celebrated within our human consciousness, the result of this interior wedding will appear without in all that pertains to individual and communal welfare.

People speak of divine science, and spiritual science, and spiritual philosophy, as though it were all a matter of abstruse theory and bewildering technicality, when the very core of it all applies immediately to everyday needs and hourly necessities. Metaphysical hobby riders achieve few and poor results because they do not expand their ideas till they take in the universe. As we must synthesize before we can correctly analyze, so we must take a broad, deep, high, comprehensive view of life ere we can intelligently apply a theory in any branch of special local practice.

If you would be a skillful oculist or aurist you must first be a general anatomist and physiologist, for you cannot understand the mechanism of eye or ear or any other organ, save as that organ is related to other organs in the organism

we call the body. Leave out the brain and of what use is the eye? omit the heart and how is the ear to be supplied with blood? Local treatment is usually farcical, because based on fundamental ignorance. Take skin for example; what causes soft, healthy, beautiful skin but good, pure, wholesome blood? Absurd, then, is it not to seek to make perfect the outside of the personality except you are determined to do so as a result of first purifying the within. There is war within before there is war without; so there must be peace within ere there can be peace without, and by peace we do not mean compromise, but harmony. No truer or nobler words can well be spoken than those attributed to a truly valiant hero, "We will have peace at any honorable price." Where there is no honor there is no peace, though there is often found its crafty substitute.

The sword precedes the advent of the Prince of Peace, and when he comes, whose right it is to reign over all the nations of the earth, the new order of peace is established for the first time in the history of the planet. It is so with the individual also, for human experience in general is nothing other than an extension or enlargement of human experience in particular. Peacemakers are to be known as children of God, and to as many as receive truth into their affections and thence manifest it in external conduct, is the beatitude applicable, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

It is the nature of light to shine and of salt to circulate, therefore are the words true, "Ye are the light of the world," and "Ye are the salt of the earth." Mark well the language, for in both instances the phraseology is precise and cannot be altered without defacing the original conception or changing the root idea. It is a small thing comparatively to carry a light about with you, as it were, a kindled lamp that might at any time be extinguished by a gust of wind; it is also but a small thing to carry a bag of salt with you which may soon become empty or be knocked out of your hand. To be light and to be salt is intensely significant, for that which you have may be taken from you, but that which you are is yours by right of such possession as results solely from well-earned development.

As a cycle approaches its close (one is closing even now at the end of this present century) those who are the light and the salt are drawn mysteriously together; they are attracted to each other through the subtle agency of some compelling power, or better, some impelling force, which brings into the same assembly those who are especially fitted for each other's companionship. The many apartments in the one Father's house are revealed as distinct, but not as separated societies of souls. Distinctiveness is beautiful, but separation is the cause of all the jealousies, hatreds, and murders which have ever been committed or ever can be known.

Separateness is death. Distinctiveness is revelation of that marvelous fullness or copiousness of life which inheres in the great I AM and is manifested through all the entities, which are but expressions of the infinite eternal EGO.

We have, each one of us, all the twelve tribes in us. Yea, we even contain the number thirteen, and the still greater dual number twenty-six. There are twelve tribes, but there are twenty-four elders, for male and female must be equally expressed by every individual before the Golden Era stands disclosed. Though we have all the tribes, male and female, (twenty-four) within us, and also the Master, who is both male and female (two) making the mystical twenty-six within our own economy, each one of us will be found in a perfected social and industrial state, in a specific place, engaged in a specific work. Therefore, there will be eleven tribes dormant and one active in each one of us at any time when any of us shall be found in the Israel state, which is the enlightened condition for all humanity.

All sorts of experiments will be tried, all sorts of nostrums will be administered through the quackery of so-called sociology and political economy; all sorts of plans and projects will be discussed and started, and people will rush hither and thither to find a small supposed Christ in a wilderness, on a hill-top, or in a secret chamber; but all these attempted constructions of an Ideal Commonwealth or Republic of Heaven will be vain in the sense that they will fail to accomplish what they set out to fulfill. But they will not be useless, because by means of them many people will gain a needed measure of experience required by them as they journey forward to a higher and far nobler realization of their hopeful dreams.

Everybody who is seeking to establish a republic of harmony on earth, will do some good and get some good, but the final ultimation of harmony will not take place till palliative measures are abandoned for radical reform. "Ye must be born anew," or you cannot be healed, though in your old state you may be cured. There is a vast difference between these two—curing and healing, a difference sadly overlooked by the majority of practitioners, regardless of whether they are dealing with the body politic or only the corporeal frame of a solitary individual who applies for a mental treatment.

Though astrology, palmistry and such branches of occultism as sail under those names are not necessary to highly intuitive natures, we always advocate their intelligent consideration at the hands of the general public; because there are two distinct ways in which they can be made helpful in rendering individuals and communities healthier and happier than they now are.

First, let us consider that indications may reveal destiny without in any way suggesting fate; for, as Mrs. Gestefeld and other able teachers affirm, fate can be conquered as destiny is made known. Destiny is to be unfolded from within through the agency of faith and hope alone; but fate is to be conquered by the unfolding of destiny. The term "fate" properly covers everything circumstantial or incidental which would thwart the fulfillment of our destiny, but which, when rightly dealt with, is understood to constitute a portion of that which we are to employ in the building of the fabric of our personality.

The twelve tribes of Israel in the Apocalypse are as distinct, one from the others, as when they first appeared in Genesis, even though they have become regenerate. They are now like unto precious gems, cut and polished and freed from all alloy. Sapphires do not lose their blue, nor rubies their red light by polishing. Emeralds are still green after the lapidary has expended his best skill upon them; so it is with the redemption of the tribes and all that this expression signifies.

In the Temple which is humanity, there are all manners of precious stones and they are enumerated to signify distinctiveness in individual work. If your light shines and you are like unto a sapphire, you will not shine with the particular glow which would be yours had you resembled an amethyst; but you are all equally precious in the sight of the wise, though the foolish will esteem some of you highly and treat others of you with disdain.

People who pose as teachers before the world to-day, say that there is no science of healing of the nations, or of healing of individuals, because they have not as yet discovered the science of health. Honest you may be and yet ignorant of science, as you may be a good man and yet not know how to solve a simple mathematical problem; and furthermore, there may be some problems which you can solve now and others which you cannot solve yet, but all are soluble, and not only are they soluble per se, but by yourself individually, as you grow into a knowledge of how to solve them.

Division of work is orderly, therefore ideal society is divided into groups, but not into factions. There ought to be only one church and only one political party; but there will surely be a number of churches and of parties which must continue until wisdom is sufficiently revealed to unite the sundered, heal breaches and abolish dissentions of every kind.

Extraneous authority belongs to an earlier stage of human growth—as paternalism antedates fraternalism in the evolution of govermental order. So long as only a few are enlightened, it is but right that the enlightened few should rule and (kick against it as you may) it will be so in spite of all your protests, for rulers rule from the same cause that cream rises to the top of the milkpail.

Hereditary rulership is a farce. Put a weak man on the throne and a strong woman will be the ruler and he the figure-head. Place a weak woman in the place of authority and a strong man will hold the reins of government behind her, and though the people see her figure, they feel his hand of iron. Let a strong man and woman occupy a place of influence together and, as in the case of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, a joint exercise of authority is felt for the good of the whole community. Weakness always betrays itself in fault finding, while strength is ever self-reliant.

Strong people need capable assistants and they get them, for they have the organizing power which first attracts, and then firmly holds what it has attracted. Great individuals know their own place and keep it; they are consequently never fussy, intrusive or meddlesome. They have neither time nor inclination for gossip, nor are they cast down nor rendered unhappy by the misery and sin around them. They are above sin; they overcome sorrow; being lights they shine into darkness and darkness exists no more; being salt they enter into tainted places and preserve the social fabric from decay. Far too active are they in the accomplishment of good work to spend much time or many tears in bemoaning iniquities. Jesus weeps before the resurrection but never after it.

Ascension and glorification represent states beyond tears, for tears there cannot be save in those conditions of humiliation where the soul is for a while perplexed and bewildered and has not yet finished its victory over all that is meant by Golgotha and Calvary. There are tears on Olivet, but there are none on Tabor. Transfiguration is too bright to allow of sadness, thus when a life is seen transfigured, its glory is so dazzling that those who have not yet come to know the meaning of transfiguration are smitten down with wonder, so amazed are they at beholding not only another's glory, but a forecast of their own.

The twelve tribes in the Apocalypse have come up out of great tribulation (a word derived from the latin tribula, a thistle), or as the passage is otherwise translatable, out of continual friction, a process of long time irritation. How strangely are we reminded everywhere of the career of Job; we meet that ancient worthy at every turn and we find that he is us and we are he. Where are you in the book of Job? (you are going through it and you are somewhere in it) is a very pertinent enquiry.

Divine Science and spiritual philosophy are popular expressions; what do they mean? Divine Science is knowledge of how to live! it is biology, anthropology, psychology and theology and all the other ologies rolled into one. The theologian would study God outside of Man, and he needs a Henry Ward Beecher to tell him that his creed probably begins at the wrong end; he must be an anthropologist or anthropologian, he must know Man before he can know Deity. Some physiologists ignore the physical body, and some psychologists ignore soul. Small fractionists, every one of them! Good meaning people, doubtless, and by no means altogether useless, provided some larger fractionist (lacking integrality) can select the pieces of the various cults and weave them into a beautiful mosaic.

The Pentateuch is still a mosaic, even though the "higher critics" should declare that no man named Moses ever wrote any portion of it. In their unillumined state, the twelve sons of Jacob are envious and contentious, and in their unregenerate degree the twelve specially chosen disciples of Jesus are rivalrous. There is a strife among them as to which shall be considered greatest, but so idiotic is the strifeful temper that the mother of the two sons of Zebedee positively requested (though she would have been horrified had she understood the import of her own words) that one of her sons should be numbered among the goats on the left, and the other among the sheep on the right hand of the King of the universe and Judge of all mankind. It is only ignorance that asks favors in such a way as to implore that one son should sit on the right side and the other son on the left side of a monarch; for the two sides of an earthly monarch are unequal—the right hand ranking higher than the left.

In the celestial state, there are no better and no poorer positions. The heavenly state is a condition of harmony, wherein all are fellow-workers; and as but one spirit breathes through all, though there are diversities of gifts, all good gifts are equal. Health and harmony are everywhere inseparable. You are a healer exactly in so far as you are a harmonizer, and not a fraction of an inch further, and you are a harmonizer exactly to the extent that you are a comprehensionist and not the least step further.

You must then, if you would heal, study individual peculiarities and eccentricities, not to blame them or eradicate them, but to point to the highest use of all of them. Let there be no shadow of a mistake here; vices are not peculiarities, diseases are not eccentricities, therefore they may not be included in the list of normal differentiations. The cabbage differs from the cauliflower, but the worm in either is a blight. There must be no mildew on any character, no canker eating into any type of servant or service, and just as you are strong to perceive differences, you will be bold to rebuke iniquities.

All types are redeemable and in the regeneration the ass remains the ass, but it has become white, and the horse remaining a horse has become white also. There are four horses mentioned in the book of Revelations, but only the white horse is worthy to afford a seat for the Son of God. In the order of evolution the ass is redeemed first and the horse later, but both are finally regenerated. We can accomplish larger works and subdue stronger appetites only after we have done lesser things and controlled feebler appetites.

In the external or manifest order of the universe, there must be an ingathering of tribes, one by one, till at length all are gathered; for some are elder and some are younger brethren, but no brother is a brother's superior, all are equal. The enumeration of the twelve tribes in the 7th chapter of Revelations is as follows: 1, Judah; 2, Reuben; 3, Gad; 4, Asher; 5, Nepthalim; 6, Manasses; 7, Simeon; 8, Levi; 9, Issachar; 10, Zebulun; 11, Joseph; 12, Benjamin. Mannasses is the new name for the twelfth tribe now that Dan has departed. There is a great secret in all this, and that secret is the secret of regeneration, even the redemption of the serpent and the restoration of Satan to the state of Lucifer.

Man falls through sensuality, but through transmuted sensuality he rises. Millions of addresses will be given and thousands of books will be written during the next few years on this very question. It cannot be balked or dodged, for the heart of health is in it, and the understanding thereof is the restoration of the "lost word" of the Master, which will heal universally when it is spoken with faith and understanding of its mighty import.

Regeneration must be complete even to the transformation of Dan into Mannasses, of Judas Iscariot into Matthias, and of Satan into Lucifer. Verily there is no evil in reality, but so long as discord exists evil will be present with us in appearance. Redemption is a new thing; the plan of it is to us a novelty. The scheme of salvation is a geometrical design; the plan of redemption is as a sum in mathematics. The example is set by the examplar, but each individual soul must work out its own self-contained salvation. Dispute no longer over the mystery of atonement, for it is now being clearly revealed to all who have eyes to behold and ears to harken to the unveiling of an age-long mystery.

There must be demonstrative teaching of truth and there must be also dissemination of good through the agency of living influence. "How is it that ye do not understand" are words yet addressible to multitudes who claim to be teachers—not merely disciples in the school of truth. No intelligent observer can fail to see that, though there are myriads of smaller ways, there are but two really great methods through which humanity can be brought to a knowledge of the Law of Life. One of these methods appeals to understanding and the other to affection. One without the other will not work, because we are dual and our needs are correspondingly dual. We act through our intellects, but from our wills, consequently the love of right precedes right action, but the latter invariably follows close upon the former.

The mistake made by too many practitioners of something they elect to call divine, spiritual or mental healing is, that they look for the correspondences of disease instead of for the correspondences of health; and how can it be possible to find the cause of health in the dustbin of disease. It is as reasonable to analyze foul sputum swarming with bacilli, expecting to discover therein the remedy for tuberculosis or any other affliction of the lungs or chest, as to hunt amid the symptoms of disorder for the antidote to disease. Because we have transferred a false method from the objective or physical, to the subjective or psychical plane of action, does not render the search any less barren of desired result.

As so many people are more familiar with the astrological than with the Israelitish terminology, we will mention as we close this lesson the twelve kinds of people according to the Zodiacal classification in consecutive order as they are usually given:

First—Aries, the head. Special aptitude for headwork—liability to disease being found always in the region where sensitiveness and susceptibility are greatest, therefore head trouble is brought on in this type of person whenever undue excitement is permitted or disturbance of any mental variety occurs.

Second—Taurus, the neck. Executive ability, or "playing second fiddle," is the general aptitude of this sign. Throat more easily affected than rest of body.

Third—Gemini, shoulders, arms and hands. Chief characteristics manual dexterity and versatility. Parts of the body indicated by the sign weakest or strongest, according to use or abuse of the same.

Fourth—Cancer, the breast. Inclined to secret, silent, motherly occupation; conservative in temperament and apt to slowness in motion. Region of the breast most sensitive section of the organism.

Fifth—Leo, the heart. Strong love nature; emotional, adapted to reach the many or the few through geniality and sympathy. The literal heart in persons possessing such a temperament acts very quickly and is more easily thrown out of gear by excitement than any other organ.

Sixth—Virgo, the solar plexus. A synthetic and rational type of mind given to delight in the things of the understanding more than in the sentiments of the heart. Such natures have intellectual perplexities and for them rational mind cure is the only cure.

Seventh—Libra, the hips. Chief disposition in the direction of analyzing, weighing and measuring all things. When such people have become disturbed, equilibrium is most readily restored by looking at both sides of a subject presenting contrasts and showing unity where there cannot be uniformity.

Eighth—Scorpio, the reproductive system. Highly nervous and active temperament, given to passing judgment and standing more in need of caution than any other variety of mankind.

Ninth—Sagittarius, the thighs. Directness of aim and general decisiveness is the strength of this division of humanity; its weakness consists in liability to push ahead one's self regardless of the rights of others.

Tenth—Capricorn, the knees. Persevering, climbing; of ambitious nature, needing to transmute personal ambition into universal aspiration. Such people easily bend, but never break; they are natural burden bearers; their chief weakness is a too materialistic tendency.

Eleventh—Aquarius, the ankles. Capable of affording support to others; not so originative as disseminative; inclined to teach and to water the sown seed; chief liability to disorder through sense of cheerlessness and lack of appreciation of their own and others' efforts.

Twelfth—Pisces, the feet. Adapted by nature for the seemingly lowest services of life and capable of glorifying little things and doing final things well. Chief tendency to disorder arises through fussiness and careful anxiety concerning petty details. Such people need to see through their actual work (which is often small) to the ideal which it is serving to externalize in an often humdrum, monotonous, and enigmatical manner.

You will find all these varieties of people among your patients. Remember they are all good, useful, necessary, yes equally so, but they need special words adapted to their particular functionings. The work of the wise teacher is always to discriminate and adapt the word of universal truth when dealing with an individual, to the specific needs of that individual.

LESSON V.

ENIGMAS CONFRONTED IN HEALING.

Though we can often very clearly trace the connection between an outward condition and its inward producing cause, there are many cases frequently presented to our notice where it seems incredible that any correspondence whatever can exist between the phase of disorder afflicting a chronic invalid and the mental disposition of the afflicted person. A frequent example is that supplied in cases of gout, rheumatism, stiff joints, etc., which are commonly attributed by correspondentialists to stubbornness and selfishness. "They are a stiff-necked and rebellious people" is a very old complaint made concerning Israel by Israel's greatest seers and prophets. Doubtless the originating cause of such ailments as these just enumerated, and many others of similar nature, is rightly defined as stubborn obstinacy and undue self-seeking in thought, if not in action; still there are many occasions to-day when we are beset with apparent contradictions of this general rule—contradictions so flagrant that we feel almost tempted to quote the old fallacy, "Exceptions prove the rule," and offer it in explanation of what is seemingly otherwise inexplicable.

Such a subterfuge, however, is thoroughly unscientific; for we know there are no exceptions to the rule in mathematics, and unless our metaphysics are in strict accord with mathematical reasoning, we are in a sorry plight; it will not therefore do to plead exception to the rule, for the true rule is undeviating. Another explanation offers itself which is far more worthy of sober consideration, viz., hereditary tendency; and still another yet worthier of our regard, viz., present susceptibility to surrounding influences.

Mrs. Gestefeld in her admirable book, "How We Master Our Fate," has a chapter on "The Power and the Powerlessness of Heredity," in which it is clearly shown, that on the sense plane of our existence, heredity holds us till we have overcome hereditary tendencies. The word tendency is a correct one, for there are no hereditary virtues, vices or diseases, but only tendency or bias toward a particular expression of strength or weakness in a given direction can be inherited. This inheritance is vanquishable; nothing being invincible except the divinity within us which is sure to assert itself triumphantly at some time and somewhere. Hereditary dispositions are seemingly unconquerable in many instances, because no effort is put forth to conquer them; it seems indeed that inherited weaknesses are tacitly admitted to hold sway, and the plea is made for them that they are inheritances, therefore we must give in to them, no matter how we may detest them or how earnestly we may long to be delivered from the burden of them.

Mistakes of the most radical and wide reaching character are made in connection with heredity, which is only "original sin" in a pseudo-scientific instead of would-be religious dress. Inheritances can be thrown away! Because you have inherited property does not mean that you cannot get rid of it. If property has been left to you you are responsible for what you do with it, but you need not allow it to do anything with you. Here we come to revoking the inheritance,—cutting off the entail,—attaining to the commencement of the regenerate state,—breaking with our past and letting the dead past bury its dead.

Do not deny the fact of moral heredity when conversing with patients who are suffering through bondage to it, but explain to them the way of escape. It bewilders people most unnecessarily to deny the existence of what is, to them, self-evident, but no conversation is so helpful as an encouraging talk which shows a way out of the mire on to solid rock. When a special weakness oppresses the unselfish child of a selfish parent, remember that the son need not continue to bear affliction in consequence of the father's iniquity. Show as clearly as you possibly can how conditions are subjectively perpetuated and objectively revealed; and then at once proceed to apply your statements to the case immediately in hand.

Reason somewhat thus: your mother may have been obstinate and unyielding to conviction, a very trying person in more ways than one, but you have seen from early childhood the error of that way, so that instead of walking in her footsteps, so far as they were erroneous, you have resolved to be gentle, patient, considerate of others and generally unselfish. Your affliction springs from not having broken loose from the subjective family bondage in which you are held. You have never freed yourself; you have not yet severed the cord which still binds you to your unhappy ancestry. You must free yourself, but the healer can help you to do it.

Here comes in the most vital gist and application of the law of healing science; and there is a healing science, not merely an art of healing, though in their ignorance of the law whereby healing is rendered scientific, many practitioners stop short with a half demonstrable theory.

In conquering hereditary tendencies it is absolutely necessary to affirm your own power over that which would continue to exercise sway in your organism did you not rise above it. Hereditary tendencies work secretly in many places where we least think of them as residing, and because of their deeply veiled character they render manifest conditions enigmatical, but not therefore insuperable. Our present access to the boundless reservoir of divine strength must be confidently and persistently affirmed till the limitations of ancestry drop away one by one, till at length they have all departed. But always remember they are not going to depart because you tell them to go; on the contrary, the more you think of them the more vigorous they are likely to become. Denials of the common sort resemble the shaving off of hair, which certainly is not its eradication, for everybody knows that the more frequently a beard or mustache is shaved off, the stronger the roots appear to become; therefore, shaving is often recommended for increasing the vigor of the hair.

As nature's law is the same on all planes and in all varieties of expression, disagreeable tendencies are aggravated and intensified in consequence of the attention called to them by mistaken formulas for treatment. "Whatsoever things are excellent and of good repute, think on these things," is indeed a wise counsel, and we need not longer wonder at the seemingly miraculous cures effected by Paul and his brother apostles in the first Christian century, as compared with the meagre results attending the practice of so many practitioners of a later day, when we consider the great insight into law displayed by the few really great healers of olden days, an insight which stands forth in glowing conspicuousness in such magnificent sentences as the one just quoted.

There is nothing excellent and nothing of good repute in asthma, catarrh and a host of other abominable ailments, with which no one would ever be afflicted if we did but learn and practice a correct system of breathing.

A wise healer might reason as follows: "I do not pronounce you free from bronchitis or any other malady when I give you a scientific treatment, for I never allow myself to dwell on a word which expresses an idea of which I desire to rid you. I know enough of the law of correspondences to turn the tables on the enemy by employing suggestion or suggestive therapeutics in such a way as to suggest to you that you can and do breathe freely and perfectly. I declare to you that your entire vocal anatomy is perfect." Exactly at this point comes in the necessity for enforcing the often neglected fact, that when one who is treating another suggests to that other that he should breathe correctly, the two must breathe together who formerly breathed widely apart.

Whenever a company of musicians breathe together, they play far more correctly than when they fail thus to harmonize in breath. The patient does not inhale the healer's breath, nor does the healer inhale the patient's breath, which would be far worse; but the healer suggests to the patient that they two shall breathe together, and as the healer is already breathing in a far more wholesome and scientific manner than is the patient, it begins to come to pass that the invalid breathes away his invalided condition through commencing to inhale and exhale scientifically, i. e., in harmony with universal order.

Some cases are harder to deal with and take longer time to cure than others, not because the type of disease is any more serious in those cases than in others, but because of the leech like tenacity with which many people clutch beliefs which they have inherited and of which they are personally unconscious. Unconsciousness of this sort is simply thoughtlessness.

It is surprising how much we take for granted, or as a matter of course, which we should never think of accepting as reasonable or true were it proposed to us as a new suggestion. New suggestions which are destined to take the place of old fallacious mental substrata must appeal directly to reason in the clearest and most convincing manner. New thoughts compel attention! new ideas command either respect or opposition; they never pass unchallenged. No preacher, lecturer, or author ever gives a new idea to the world but he challenges attention which is friendly or unfriendly according to the nature of the idea presented, and the temper of the people to whom it is presented. Chronic invalids and all people suffering from hereditary distemper are sorely in need of new thoughts; and even if they are shocked and enraged at first, we should never be alarmed or disturbed, because excitement follows a stirring appeal to dormant consciousness.

Hereditary leanings show forth in the most trifling as well as in the more important groups of habits, and it is often difficult at first to trace any connection between so simple a habit as the obvious one of concession to prevailing customs and the deep seated weakness which is holding a victim in chains who might otherwise be free from all fetters. Some people have inherited a belief that they can eat only certain kinds of food; that they must rise at a certain hour, say seven o'clock every morning, and that they must be in bed at ten or eleven, or some other definitely prescribed hour, otherwise they will lose their "beauty sleep" or something else vainly imagined by people who are in total ignorance of the law of thought expression. Now these errors would be hardly worth challenging and refuting were it not for the fact that they cause untold misery to many honorable persons who, because they entertain them, are bound by them.

A night clerk at a hotel, or a printer, reporter, night editor or some other person who is obliged to be up all night and must therefore sleep during the day, need not be ill or any less well than his neighbor who works by day and sleeps by night. But many people will naturally enough inquire, are there not fit times for active exercise and legitimate periods for repose? Certainly there are; but different people engaged in varying occupations can be equally healthy provided they conform their thoughts to the activities in which they are engaged; and further do we contend that if one kind of work and place is really better suited to some special individual than another, there is force or potency enough in well sustained silent affirmation to bring about the identical change in outward circumstances, which will render such most desirable from the standpoint of that particular individual.

Heredity is greatly overestimated and it is really a sign of the highest culture of the present age to largely discountenance any belief in it and turn toward the more liberal and wiser philosophy now happily increasing in vogue—of maintaining the right of the individual to choose his own career regardless of the position supplied by forefathers. Such hereditary names as Baker, Miller, Taylor and many others, prove that we have well-nigh outgrown that servility to heredity which formerly reigned almost supreme in every part of Europe and which still prevails in some sections of the East. We are introduced to a Mr. Brewer and then to a Mr. Butcher and we find that one is a clergyman and the other a district attorney, and we express no astonishment at the incongruity; but had we lived two hundred or three hundred years ago, we should have met with no Bakers except their occupation justified their title, and we should have taken it almost as a matter of course, that the son should follow commercially, as well as otherwise, in the footsteps of his father.

If there were really such a thing as a law of heredity like unto that in which many people affect to believe, we should certainly see its operation exactly where we do not find it. Strongly individualized children are very apt to grow up so extremely unlike their parents and all their near relatives, that it is difficult to believe that they do indeed belong to the family into which they were born.

No theosophical tenet of reincarnation, or of the effects of Karma accumulated in a previous existence, is anything like so dumbfounding as the conventional belief in heredity, which voices itself in the stale platitude, "Like father, like son." A much wiser proverb reads, "The boy is father of the man"; this latter may be accepted and acted upon, as it affords a spur to exertion in youth under conviction that manhood will reveal the good results of noble preparation for maturity.

What passes for heredity in many cases is only the outcome of multiplied suggestions which take very great hold upon sensitive dispositions, though less susceptible natures are often but little affected by them. Here comes in a good word for "unruly" children, many of whom are only protesting instinctively against the unwisdom of blinded parents who are too bigoted, ignorant or domineering to respect the right of a child to individual expression. The most rebellious child in many a family is by far the healthiest and grows up the finest, most useful and successful man or woman, and why is this the case? We do not place a premium on rebelliousness, but we do maintain that when a system of training is anti-educational,—its effect being to repress instead of to unfold,—healthy children are neither naughty or lacking in natural affection, because they honor their native instinct of self-protection and try to show their elders the mistake they are making in trying to force children into unnatural grooves.

Selfishness frequently revenges itself upon the unselfish, provided these latter are weak and unresisting; and here comes in a much needed solution of many of our hardest problems. Selfish people exact services from the unselfish, which the unselfish have no right to render, and in the rendering of which equity is outraged, and no one can outrage equity without having to pay the penalty, even to the uttermost farthing. Society is benefited, the progress of the human race is assisted by justice and benevolence, therefore the universal law or order which ever makes steadily for righteousness necessarily opposes all weak truckling to error, and instead of rewarding the knock-kneed sycophant who bows to tyranny and practices extreme self-abnegation, this uncompromising law deals its heaviest blows on the poor, weak, trembling creatures who are ever ready to immolate themselves upon the altar of unrighteous concession to injustice.

Now we have a clue to the location of the selfishness expressed in unselfish Aunt Jemima's rheumatism, and self-sacrificing Sister Lucretia's stiff neck and unbendable finger joints. You dear, misguided women, you are reaping what you have encouraged others to sow, and though your intentions were excellent, your judgment was lamentably at fault. You must remember in future that the selfishness you are catering to in your brother Tom or your niece Jane is quite as detrimental to the welfare of the social fabric as though you practiced it yourself. Remember, we implore you, that whoever assists another to develop any trait or encourage any tendency, is held responsible therefor, even as though he were himself the active, actual culprit.

Correspondences are not so difficult to trace when this torch light blazes the path of their discovery. In examining into any case that may come under your immediate notice and demand attention from you, it is always essential that you should carefully discriminate between embodied and reflected conditions. Because so little of this needed discrimination is commonly employed, much confusion obtains concerning the slow development of the process of healing in one case and the almost instantaneous relief effected in another, even when two cases are apparently of equal long standing and gravity, and equally faithful treatment is given in both instances.

Swedenborg has wisely told all who will listen to him that thought gives presence, but only love brings conjunction. Were people to discriminate closely between these two important words, presence and conjunction, they would see daylight where darkness now reigns. The presence of a disorder as to its symptoms is often due exclusively to one's participation in the thought of another, and we all know how many people in these nervous times are intensely susceptible to each other's mental states, to say nothing of physical conditions also. Epidemics spread through the contagion of sympathy even where there is no conscious fear and where there is no other predisposition to attack, save the very prevalent one of yielding to the thoughts and beliefs and adopting the practices of one's neighbors unreasonably.

If people are conjoined with a state of discord, i. e., if they are in the affection of an inharmony, they cannot possibly be substantially benefited unless or until they are emancipated from the clutch of that misguided affection. Positive, moral, educational work needs to be done in such an instance, while in the other group of cases referred to, where only reflected conditions are present, an emancipating word is all that needs to be spoken, and provided it is spoken it matters very little, if at all, how it is spoken, whether silently or aloud, or first aloud and then silently, or vice versa.

We should think that any reader of the foregoing pages who is disposed to give careful thought and earnest attention to the work of healing, will quickly be able to make use of the hints already given, but to emphasize the leading points as forcibly as possible, we shall throw the remainder of this lesson into the form of a brief catechism which will be found extremely convenient for ready reference.

The following questions are in substance such as are most frequently put to us by earnest students when inquiring along this particular line of study. The answers are in substance replies which have given much help to many questioners who have found themselves able to practically apply the suggestions therein contained.

(Q.) Do you teach that each separate phase of disorder, such as gout, rheumatism, sore throat, etc., etc., proceeds from some definite state of mental confusion or inharmony, and that there is a specific formula (if we only knew it) for the eradication of each distinct variety of disorder?

(A.) Such a conclusion is warranted by research and observation, but only as far as the first cause or origin of such distempers is concerned. It is often the case that the first cause of the disorder is far back of the person now suffering from it; therefore, though you are always right in giving affirmative treatments declaring the reality of the exact opposite of the manifest distemper, you are not just to your patient if you universally insist that the one who is now afflicted in a special manner, has brought that particular affliction upon himself by indulgence in the error of which the disease is a phenomenal outpicturing.

(Q.) But if what you have just declared be true, how do you account for the presence of a disorder in a person who has not begotten it from his own thought? how did he contract it,—from others?

(A.) Yes, and through weak susceptibility to their erroneous states of thought and action. The question becomes quite pathetic at this point, and still more so as we follow it to its logical conclusion; for having to face facts we are compelled to admit that persons who abhor sensuality are often victimized by what they detest, and persons whose own dispositions are toward temperance in all things are victimized by their grief in consequence of others' inebriety.

(Q.) But are not many cases, according to this view, hopeless? how, for instance, can a wife, husband, child, or parent fail to be deeply concerned over the wrong doing of so near and well beloved a relative? Do you advocate callous indifference to those around us? is unconcern for others the only way of salvation?

(A.) We do not advocate callousness or indifferentism, but we do insist that there is a far higher way of dealing with people who are engulfed in error than the method usually adopted, which is to try to deal with the error, while our practice is to deal with the individual whom the error has temporarily overcome, in order that he may rise to a sense of his own innate nobility and voluntarily arise out of subserviency to lower desires to mastery over every lust or appetite which wars against the soul. You must heal yourself in so far as this, that you are no longer afflicted as you once were by the degradation of those about you, for not until you can truthfully say, "None of these things move me," will you be able to help others to move the things out of their path which are now moving them in wrong directions. Master and servant to the same thing at the same time you cannot be. It stands to reason that if you are being mastered by the errors with which you are surrounded, you are one of the victims of those errors. While you remain a victim, you cannot effectually pose as a conqueror, however brave the words may be which fall from your tongue, for they do not express the feelings of your inner nature.

(Q.) But what are people to do when they are forced by circumstances to live in an atmosphere of perpetual discord, and are even bound to associate in the most intimate manner with persons whose lives are impure?

(A.) It is necessary to teach that the only inevitable circumstance which surrounds anybody is his own occult atmosphere or aura, and when this affords protection, he is safe no matter where he may be. The entire question of susceptibility and non-susceptibility is wrapped up in this single doctrine of theosophy. The neophyte who becomes a hierophant, becomes such exactly in proportion as he learns how to gain control over his personal emanations. A MASTER is one who has built for himself a wall of protection around his personality which shuts out all intruders. Whilst you are building your wall, you are of course less capable of resistance to adverse conditions than after you have fully constructed it, but if anyone sets to work in real earnest to build this psychic parapet, he is sure to eventually succeed, and though success is always gradually obtained, it is promoted by taking note of even the smallest victories and refusing to dwell upon even the largest defeats. Victories are real. Defeats are simply negative expressions, showing that triumphs though winable are not yet won. To give in to the thought that you must submit to anything, hinders progress and hampers growth, while to determinately affirm that the mastery is in your own power, and that you can and will rise superior to every limitation, is the sure road to final victory.

(Q.) But granting all you say concerning our own protection, how are we on such terms to help our brethren on to higher levels of attainment? Are we to selfishly protect ourselves and leave those nearest and dearest to us to suffer the direful consequences of their transgressions?

(A.) There are two ways only whereby we can truly help others; one is by silent influence, the other by good example, and in both of these ways shall we prove inestimably useful to those around us, so soon as we have conquered our weakness which cannot uplift others and certainly does depress us. When you are strong in your own might, you are a tower of strength to those about you, for virtue goes forth from you, and as people who are easily led astray are highly susceptible, your quiet, persuasive influence in their vicinity causes them to feel a leading or prompting in a new and higher direction. Just as temptations to wrong doing are silent and insidious in many instances,—and the silent foe entraps the victim unawares by stealth,—so are temptations to righteousness stealthy and insidious also. As evil thoughts are insinuated, so are good thoughts insinuated through the medium of a common communicating atmosphere. Remember that the tremulous ether all about us is the unseen medium by means of which all conceivable varieties of mental impressions are conveyed from place to place, and it depends upon what you give the breezes to carry, as to what freight they will carry for you.

Then as to oral suggestion, outward example, and all that pertains to the objective theatre of existence, no good ever comes from raging or weeping, or as people say, "carrying on" and showing that you are "feeling badly." Strength, not weakness, imperviousness, not a state that succumbs, furnishes healing pabulum; therefore the words "heal thyself" and "when thou art converted strengthen thy brethern" call for much wider and wiser commentary than they usually receive. It is weakness and weakness only, in nine cases out of every ten, that is the cause of seemingly unmerited suffering; therefore the "sinful" theory of the origin of disease needs modification, or at least explanation, for though it is true at root, it is very often pitiably misapplied and a misapplication may do a cruel wrong to a tender sensitive nature. Discrimination sees the distinction between grieving over another's sin and thereby getting some of the effect of it yourself through dwelling upon it, and indulging in your own mind the error you condemn in another; also between living a selfish life for purposes of personal gratification, and a protest against weak yielding to the exactions of others and allowing yourself to become particeps criminis in their offence.

(Q.) But does it not seem hard and unfair that we should be punished for the sins of others, especially when we are self-denying enough to forego our own pleasure for others' happiness?

(A.) Just at that point the world makes the greatest of all its mistakes and falls into the most grievous of all its errors. The truth concerning this matter, hard though it may sound to unaccustomed ears, is that we richly deserve to pay in our own persons part of the penalty which inevitably falls upon those who are partners in guilt; for we cannot be guiltless when we encourage wrong in those about us. Truly we are not their judges, but we are our own; therefore, though we have no right to condemn them for doing what they may not see to be wrong, we are culpable the very instant we participate in and minister to their blunders. The idle girl who wastes her time in the parlor while her mother is slaving in the kitchen ought not to be encouraged in such shameful indolence, and it is fully as much, if not more, the fault of the silly parent than of the stupid girl that the latter is in such an immoral condition of dependence upon the toil of another. Those who encourage wrongs are themselves wrongdoers, and though you are not called upon to condemn your neighbors because their standards of morality differ from your own, you cannot be other than negligent and crime-fostering if you yield to unrighteous demands upon your own time and energy. Fearlessness is absolutely essential to health.

LESSON VI.

OUR BODIES, WHAT ARE THEY AND HOW SHALL WE DEAL WITH THEM?

The general impression among those who are just beginning to look into any phase of mental healing, is that the physical body is sometimes in need of special treatment, and that in order to remove ailments which are manifested by means of it we must do something to the body in the way of directly treating it.

Such a position is utterly unsound and illogical from any metaphysical point of view, because it introduces into mental practice methods which rightly belong only in the field of physical medicine. We do not discountenance the honest efforts of the medical profession, because doctors of materia medica administer potions and powders in a physical manner which is consistent with their avowed claim that it is the physical structure which needs to be dealt with, because, according to their theory, the disease which needs overcoming is lodged there.

Mental healers, to be consistent, must take the opposite stand and declare that men and women, themselves, not their physical shapes, need treatment, consequently I give you a treatment or you give me a treatment, but I do not treat your physical body nor do you treat mine if we are truly and intelligently engaged in the work of mental treatment.

A great deal of the opposition to mental suggestion with healing intent, which has long prevailed, and (though to a lesser degree than formerly) still prevails in the popular mind, is due to the fact that mental therapeutists themselves have not made sufficiently clear statements as to the nature of the work they are seeking to perform.

When some demurrer rises to object to my treating his physical body with my thought, what can I say to him? I answer that I should never attempt to do anything of the sort, but that were he to apply to me for a mental treatment and I saw fit to respond to his request and give him one to the best of my ability, I should treat him to a lesson in the exercise of self control over his own body.

Self-ownership is very imperfectly admitted and very poorly comprehended, most people seeming to think that all power is delegated to somebody or something other than themselves, and that they get all the benefits they receive through the action of external agencies, therefore if they are to recover or improve some outside agent must do the work on their behalf. This undevoleped theory of substitution is an error from the start and needs the most complete refutation ere we can reasonably hope to see rising up around us a new and healthier race of humanity. My body is my property, and your body is yours, therefore you have no right to run my organism for me nor have I any right to run yours for you.

When any one is suffering from physical decrepitude this is an evidence that his psychic force does not sufficiently permeate his physical frame. The sleeping soul needs awakening out of sleep. The call must be made to the dormant energy of the sleeper. Longfellow must have keenly realized this when he wrote those memorable words:

> "For the soul is dead that slumbers,
> And things are not what they seem."

This sleeping psyche is in a deathlike trance and needs to be awakened out of sleep. "The soul that sinneth it shall die," is to many readers and commentators one of the most difficult passages in the entire Bible, but it is not difficult at all when we take the hint from Columbia's representative bard and meditate upon the philosophy embodied in his "Psalm of Life."

The poet far oftener than the scholastic theologian throws light on dark sayings and mysterious parables, for the poet is apt to be a seer and seers are prophets, and prophets have the gift of interior discernment, and discernment is insight, and insight peers below the veil of the temporary letter and discloses the immortal spirit of all true teaching. The sleeping psyche is a "dead" or "lost" soul, but death and loss are only appearances; there are no real losses and no genuine deaths in the universe. Read thoughtfully Whittier's poem on "A Lost Soul" and remember Edna Lyall's definition of lost—not yet found.

When we realize that all disorders which are mapped out in the physical body are simply registrations of inward states, we shall see that to arouse is to heal, and that there can be no healing where there is no arousing of dormant consciousness to intelligent activity. To vivify and to revive will stand correctly as descriptive of the two distinct portions of the work needed to be done. My physical organism has no power to say or do anything. I who own it must operate it, and if I am too ignorant or thoughtless to operate it aright I need lessons in the proper management of the machinery I hold in charge.

Healers who are not teachers are very shallow benefactors if benefactors they be, for they do but stave off a crisis which is sure to come sooner or later. As to those intellectually lazy people who want to get well and yet remain utterly ignorant of the science of health, can we be conscientious or sincere if we cater to their false wants, and go on encouraging them in their pet delusion that they are in no wise to blame for their sicknesses, while they go on believing that their ailments are all due to some force over which they can exercise no control but which controls them most effectually?

We must face the issue boldly and meet the adversary of false belief in hand to hand encounter wherever we discover it, but let no one say that this course of action means resistance to error by the employment of another kind of error. Such a doctrine is pernicious in the extreme and cannot be made to harmonize with any correct view of healing ministries. Truth and falsehood are contradictories; the one extinguishes the other, for they connot possibly occupy the same ground together, their very natures being diametrically opposed, the one being the child of light, the other a creature of darkness. Let in the light and darkness is no more. There never was any such entity as darkness, as there never was any such entity as weakness or poverty or any other negation which is but a name given to a nonentity.

Now it ought not to be difficult for any rational child to understand the basic principle of mental healing, for it is quite as simple as A B C and its very simplicity makes it peculiarly acceptable to the unsophisticated child-consciousness from which there is no mass of established false belief or strongly intrenched error to be removed.

A child may complain of weakness which only means lack of strength, and directly a child does thus complain he is ready to receive not only a mental treatment but a practical lesson in self-healing which is only self-training, self-enlargement, self-improvement, self-elevation or whatever else of that sort you choose to call it. Weakness is manifested in the physical organism, but weaknes is an evident lack of conscious spiritual strength, and how shall we seek to arouse this weakling to a sense of power if not by an orderly course of suggestive treatment? Suggestions even though they are sometimes called hypnotic are by no means neccessarily connected either with natural or artificial sleep, therefore the word hypnotism (from the Greek hypnos, sleep) is not always a well-advised word. It is, however, very often used by people who are satisfied with simple suggestive treatment, but do not insist that sleep should be induced during treatment, though it must be confessed that natural sleep is not only a great aid to recovery of temporarily lost energy, but

s a gateway through which much knowledge can flow subjectively for subsequent objective externalization.

Sleep of the physical organism is often wakefulness of the soul, while sleep of the soul is contemporary with intense bodily wakefulness. There are two sides to every one of us, an outside and an inside, and we have all two kinds of sight, outsight and insight, but very rarely do we find a seer like unto Swedenborg who can see and hear subjectively and objectively at the same time. Our physical organisms are two-sided, and we all know from experience that internal disorders express themselves outwardly in course of evolutionary processes, unless they are overcome before they have progressed so far as to become visible on the surface of the physical structure.

The theatre of all vital activities is within, therefore internal remedies are admittedly superior to merely external applications. Not what you rub onto the skin but what you take into the stomach is of chief importance from the dietary standpoint, and all the benefit that can ever be derived from outward applications is this, that what is outwardly applied may soak in and eventually reach the vitals. Disorder being only the contradictory of order, proceeds into manifestation—just as its opposite order proceeds. Health is first an inward possession realized by the individual as his inherent birthright, then the entire external responds gradually to this indwelling force, and at length to the very surface of the skin is health made manifest. Disease also commences behind the physical scenes, on the other side of the screen we call the body, and eventually the body succumbs to the undermining process which is kept up in secret till at length the secret is out and the body tells the tale of woe in its every lineament.

To many people there seems a breath of falsehood in the statement, "I can see even though I appear blind" or "I can hear even though I appear deaf," and many kindred sayings, but no deep reasoner can object to such affirmations when he realizes that there must first take place on the unseen plane that which is to be ultimately manifested on the physical or visible plane of operation. No one objects when he is told that roots of teeth must grow unseen before projecting molars pierce the gums, and no one denies that roots of hair must develop below the scalp before the head can be covered with hirsute adornment. If, then, the order of nature's working be thus far admitted, why not go still farther along the same line and allow that we must realize inwardly that which, later on, we shall express outwardly.

We limit nature's operations by our impertinent interferences with her beneficent activities. Every word of hope is an assistant, every iota of expectation on the right side of a question is a help. We can at least refrain from making discouraging statements, and even though some of us may be prepared to grant less than others on the score of a complete remodeling of a wasted physique by mental methods, we can all at least afford to consider the advantages which must certainly accrue from mental treatment, even though the exterior results be not immediately forthcoming.

How would you treat a person suffering from blindness when expert oculists have declared there is no chance of his ever regaining sight? is a question often put to mental practitioners. Our answer is at least twofold. Our first concern would be to affirm spiritual sight, (clairvoyance if you like to call it so,) and adhere strongly to the declaration that sight is a spiritual power. The psychical side of the faculty of sight which does not depend on material orbs of vision is then instantly appealed to, and there is no opposition manifested on the part of the average patient to a statement which transcends all such phenomena to which oculists and opticians are accustomed to refer.

We need not disguise our real sentiments, and we are less than honest if we seek to evade issues we are in honor bound to face. One of these telling issues is the question of how far we are justified in insisting that material sight will necessarily be gained or restored, as the case may be, through mental treatment. We have known of cases where there was every reason to believe that the optic nerve was entirely destroyed, giving evidence of such remarkable clairvoyance that they could safely go about alone in the most crowded parts of busy cities, as this "second sight," as it is sometimes called, entirely made up for total absence of external vision. The very best conditions for recovering physical sight are afforded when the mind is at rest, the patient having ceased to feel anxiety, or to indulge in worry over exterior benefits or the lack of them. That wonderful force in nature, Vis Medicatrix Naturæ, which is always working in the direction of healing is a something we can never wholly define, but we know we are giving it the freest opportunity to operate when we have ceased to interfere with its beneficent activities.

If personalities can only be led to discontinue all thought about their "poor eyes," "poor ears," "poor lungs," "poor stomachs," those poor members will soon grow richer. Though we cannot intellectually coincide with so absurd a statement as "you have no body," "you have no eyes," or any other unscientific jargon, which must appear ludicrous to the majority of moderately intelligent people, we can readily conceive that out of the experiences of a beneficial sort accruing (at least in seeming) from such strange denials, may be evolved a rational philosophy of at least a single department of healing practice. The physical body does not need the amount of treatment it ordinarily receives; it is indeed far better off when let alone and "left to nature," than when perpetually irritated by some one's excited mental action brought continually to bear upon it.

Some people are so peculiar in their mental make-up that they are only reached at first by extravagant statements which, later on, they come to regard as unscientific and absurd, and as a vast number of people who are capable of doing rudimentary work in the field of mental therapeutics are feelers rather than knowers, sentimentalists rather than rationalists, they are in no way deterred by incongruous expressions; on the contrary they revel in them, regarding them as the language of a noble cult altogether superior to the commonplaceness of accepted terminologies. Deliverance from fear concerning the physical organism is the object sought, and in order to gain this end recourse is sometimes had to mirth-provoking language, a circumstance we are inclined to deprecate because it occasions needless confusion and arouses in the popular mind much preventable hostility.

To be redeemed from all fear of physical distemper it is necessary to take the thoughts off those organs which have heretofore been the affected parts; therefore, if one shall simply affirm "I am spiritual, my real body is spiritual," such a statement is of great help, and it certainly does not imply the absurdity contained in the denial of the existence of the physical body or of any part of it. We have specially remarked upon these aspects of the question, because not only the medical profession, which is now taking quite kindly to "hypnotic" treatment, but many outside the ranks of medicine are interesting themselves in showing up the fallacies and inconsistencies of a form of diction which some people actually think is an integral part of mental treatment, while it is only a vanishing idiosyncrasy.

Deafness is a very persistent malady and is almost inevitable in an age and in a community when and where stubborness is fostered and aggressive self-will is extolled. Deafness proceeds mentally from obstinacy and also from severe mental strain. The great musical composer Beethoven with all his excellencies was, according to his most friendly biographers, of a very stubborn disposition even from earliest childhood, and though he suffered from various other ailments in addition to deafness, it was his hardness of hearing which caused him his chief distress as it hampered most his career as a musician. To say that he rose to sublime heights, despite this painful limitation, is not saying that the limitation itself was no defect, and when we look still closer into this great man's career and further analyze his character, we find that another of his grave defects was indiscrimination, as evidenced in his foolish spoiling of his youthful nephew upon whom he showered every advantage, and who turned out just as badly as over-indulged children are apt to do. It may seem to some of Beethoven's enthusiastic admirers, little short of sacrilege to thus daringly allude to weaknesses in the nature of so truly exemplary a man, but his innate nobleness of temper caused him to urge upon his dearest friend, that should his biography be written his weakness, as well as his strong points, should be exhibited. We ought not to censure or to harshly criticise the petty weaknesses, which cast small shadows across the great and noble lives of the world's illustrious heroes, at the same time we are guilty of no ingratitude or irreverence when we seek to learn needed lessons even from the frailties of those we most admire and love.

As conspicuous virtues are examples and inspirations, so are the limitations of others warnings to us that we may avoid what is unhandsome in our own behavior. Two rules should always be observed by those who seek to heal: one is that no error may ever be condoned, the other is that no weakness may ever be held up to ridicule or shame, so as to depress the very people we are most earnestly seeking to deliver out of darkness. Speak your word bravely on the side of the particular aspect or phase of strength which any manifest weakness opposes, but on no account allow the weakness to form the subject of the treatment. We need to be very rigid in the use of words, remembering that the following noble texts contain no idle threats and no empty promises when they read: "For every idle word that men shall speak they must render an account in the day of judgment," and, "By thy words thou shalt be justified and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

Nothing can be further from salutary than the mistaken theory that diseases are to be treated, yet we frequently hear persons of good average intelligence inquire, "How do you treat catarrh, asthma," or some other malady, as though it were neccessary, or even permissible, (which it is not) to treat a malady at all? Correct expressions are such as these: "I am treating Harry for perfect hearing, George for perfect sight, Charles for perfect digestion, James for perfect breathing," and so on through the entire list of legitimate and desirable special treatments, while beyond all specializations and specifications there is a general treatment applicable to everybody, which can be mentioned in such phrase as: "I am treating Hannah for perfect health."

Now the two sets of phrases above mentioned are both correct, but the latter is greater because more inclusive and universally appropriate than the former. Perfect health and its enjoyment must include sight, hearing, breathing and all else that goes to make up a satisfactory and harmonious condition, and we always dwell particularly upon this greater, fuller mode of treatment, not only because of its wide inclusiveness, but because it is often very difficult to determine what particular good thought needs sending out to a special patient. Specific treatments are, of course, lawful, where the felt or manifest need is for the cultivation or enlargement of some special excellence, such as patience, gentleness, firmness or any other quality which may be insufficiently expressed.

Irritability of temper produces skin eruptions and gives a general burning, itching sensation on the surface of the body.

Moles, warts, corns, bunions and all sorts of annoying little disfigurements, which are sometimes painful as well as unsightly, show plainly the effects of worry over material trifles, which do not always, however, appear trifles by any means to the worrier, who has so exaggerated the importance of petty details that molehills have become mountains in his esteem. "Don't worry" is an excellent motto, but so fine a piece of advice is difficult to follow, because it is couched in negative language. The very words "don't worry" suggest worrying, for you are using the name of the very fault you are seeking to help yourselves and others to avoid when you organize a "Don't Worry" Club, useful as such an organization, in some respects, undoubtedly is, until the public grows to the employment of better language.

So long has the world been pestered with "don't" that it seems almost impossible at first to confine one's self to a scientific, which is an exclusively affirmative, vocabulary. "This is the way, walk ye in it." "This do and thou shalt live." "Wash seven times in Jordan," and all such commands (not prohibitions) are healing formulas because they point out the right road and do not suggest the wrong, though they clearly reveal error to be error by proving truth to be truth. No one ever recites the Multiplication Table correctly without refuting every false statement that can be imagined in connection with multiplication, therefore the Multiplication Table is a universal healing formula and can be successfully introduced everywhere.

We are interested in the formation of Metaphysical Societies, the members of which recite the Multiplication Table with definite intentions. Very great good can accrue from so doing, because we find therein a common ground of agreement between Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, Spiritualists and Materialists, and all denominations besides. When there is a way open to us for proving the power of benevolent thought we ought not to refuse to take advantage of it, and when it comes to the recitation of the Multiplication Table with a common intention and expectation combined, we can none of us object provided we are in sympathy with the end for which it is recited. Both public and private recitations are beneficial, and to test their efficiency it is only necessary to fix upon a laudable object and repeat the tables with the intention and expectation that good will result, not from a monotonous, parrot like repetition of words, but in consequence of united desire and expectation. With most people some tangible aid to concentration seems desirable, if not positively necessary, and as you may ransack the archives of the whole world's literature and fail to find any philosophical or religious sentences which everybody will agree upon, we have fallen back on mathematical certitudes.

As we are positively centered in our conviction that there is a science of health and a purely scientific mode of mental healing, we are especially glad to introduce into our own work and recommend to others a set of statements belonging to what is universally acknowledged as exact science. We are not seeking to enforce a restricted method of working upon any of our readers; we only testify to what we have proved in our experience, and we have certainly noticed how remarkable are the benefits flowing from a purely concordant act. Disease is nothing but discord, no matter, therefore, where it may appear most prominently, it is but a molecular discord evidencing a prior mental discord. All discords are to be vanquished by the installation of harmony, and they can be vanquished in no other manner.

As the law of correspondence does work universally, and the outer must sooner or later come to fully correspond with the inner, it cannot be difficult to see that necessary diagnosis is not diagnosis of disease but of necessity. What do you stand most in need of? should be the query raised. Having decided that some particular phase of good is not being sufficiently expressed at a given point, you must set to work to acknowledge its potency and begin to declare that it will assuredly show forth where it has not yet shown forth.

As the subject matter of this lesson is susceptible of limitless expansion, and more words on our part would not necessarily add anything to the real value of the teaching, we here and now dismiss this particular branch of instruction, not because we have said any final word concerning correspondences, but because we think we have called attention to those necessary keynotes which intelligent readers will take up for themselves and expand into voluminous harmonies. The essential points to be kept in view are principally these:

First, always affirm the reality of your best and highest hope.

Second, seek the thing you most desire and summon it to you through the agency of persistent affirmation.

Third, seek to diagnose in your own case and in the case of others, needs and how to supply them.

When these considerations and meditations are taken into daily life, and constitute a substratum for daily conduct, it will soon appear that discords, troubles and vexations of every sort are growing less and less continually, even unto final total disappearance. Errors and discords cannot remain where truth is boldly and constantly affirmed, though they can continue to multiply (and often do increase rapidly) in defiance of all attempts to put them down by naming them and then decrying their existence.

We need to keep in closest touch with the realm of high ideals and spiritually embodied entities of the noblest types in order that we, by virtue of such fellowship, may correspond with celestial influences and continually speak and receive answers back in the course of heavenly conversation.

LESSON VII.

THE SPIRITUAL MAN—HIS POWERS AND PRIVILEGES.

In speaking of the Spiritual Man we do not wish to convey the idea of a human entity apart from the man or woman with whom we are accustomed to deal. Our object in using the term Spiritual Man being to call attention to that higher view of human nature in general which raises the thought of human kind above the plane, not only of mere sense but also of rational intellect. As the larger can and does always contain the lesser, while it is utterly impossible for the smaller to enfold the larger, it stands to reason that an exalted view of human powers and privileges can, and assuredly will, embrace all minor conceptions.

The theory of evolution can only be logically explained in the light of the previous involution of that which is subsequently evolved. The process of evolution marks degrees in expression culminating at length in perfect manifestation of all that the primal unit contains. Humanity standing at the apex of the pyramid of progressive existence contains all that has ever been expressed previous to the advent of the human race on earth. When we speak of the human race we are mentioning not one species or genus, as though we were describing some special type of bird or beast, but we are confronting the sum of all lower manifestations of life on this planet plus that mysterions something, which the world has agreed to call the human soul, which in contra-distinction from mere animal consciousness of existence, which may be but mortal, is pre-eminently regarded as immortal.

The word soul is clearly derived from Sol, the Sun, which is the ruler of all the planets and satellites found in the system of which it it the parent, master and central luminary. No astronomer of ancient or modern time has been able, so far as we know, to discover a single element in the composition of any planet, moon, asteroid, meteor or aerolite which is not included in the constitution of the Sun.

We can imagine a time when the sun reigned alone in this vast field of space, which is now peopled with solar progeny, but we cannot conceive of any one of the several planets, which now revolve around the solar disk, having an existence before its birth from the parental orb.

In like manner we can conceive philosophically of the central germ of human life pre-existing ere yet it had begun to manifest through the agency of offspring. The Spiritual Man is the real abiding entity; all existent to this entity results therefrom and is dependent thereon. The ancient astrologers, who were also the most learned astronomers of their day anticipated Ralph Waldo Emerson in his immortal saying:

> "I am the owner of the sphere,
> The seven stars and the solar year," for they taught that the truly wise man, instead of being under the stars rules within himself all the influences which the various planets and the moon are said by astrologers to exert over the average human being.

What is it, let us ask, to be a wise man in the sense in which Solomon among the Hebrews and Solon among the Greeks were considered wise? The answer is not far to seek. We are all unwise before we have grown wise; we must be children before we can be mature men and women in understanding. Children must be uneducated and inexperienced before they have embodied the lessons which they are called upon to learn in the many and varied schools of life's experience. We do not send children to school because we think them depraved or consider them naughty, but for the distinct purpose of training them in the exercise of dormant faculties.

We can readily imagine a sublime future period called poetically and prophetically a Golden Age, when there will be no sin, sickness, strife or any phase of discord upon earth, but even in those halcyon days we can picture to ourselves delightful school-houses, highly cultured and amiable teachers, and lovely children flocking gladly to the temples of learning which must certainly constitute some of the most charming palaces of those days. We have all read many times in the New Testament that the Holy Child increased in knowledge as he grew in age and stature. This statement has always been accepted as an authentic portion of the Gospel narrative by Christian thinkers of all denominations, proving that even the theological doctrine of a divine incarnation has in no way militated against the reasonable admission that a perfect human life develops through successive stages from infancy to maturity on all planes of expression. Realizing that growth signifies development or expansion, but not radical alteration in nature, we may truly say that in the highest sense we do unfold, but we do not alter, by which we mean that though we enlarge as to our outward expression of life we undergo no alteration in the region of primal cause.

It is self-evidently absurd to endeavor to educate a child beyond his latent capacity or to force upon him work of any kind for the performance of which he is organically unfitted; but though this conclusion appears self-evident we have no right to assume that an individual is unfitted by nature for the fulfillment of any task congenial to his tastes. We have positively no right to call anybody incorrigible or to pronounce any condition absolutely incurable, for our knowledge of the latent ability and most interior disposition of those about us is often so superficial that it is the height of presumption on our part to judge finally from surface seemings. We are all so much greater within than we appear without, we can all perform so much more in imagination than we actually manufacture that every one of us, the moment he begins to reflect, becomes conscious of an ideal higher self. This higher self is the real man or woman, the abiding ego, that which persists in declaring to us our own immortality. Not infrequently do we hear learned professors discuss the pros and cons of life immortal. These wiseacres when they are at their best are ever ready to account for man's persistent declaration that he is immortal on the ground of the voice of that which is immortal speaking within us.

At a Summer School of Philosophy, a few seasons ago, the writer was privileged to hear some very thoughtful remarks on this ever important question from a popular Professor of Ethics, who had in a previous lecture told the many fashionable ladies in his audience that their very conspicuous style of dress was due to the fact that they desired to enlarge their personalities. In much soberer vein, when descanting on immortality the same lecturer dealt with the problem of our belief in our continuous spiritual individuality, as we think very wisely calling attention to the underlying cause for that faithless doubt and miserable uncertainty which so frequently shrouds in almost impenetrable gloom the prospects of future individual being. "We are," said he, "both mortal and immortal; on our material side we die, but on our spiritual side we live forever. When we confine our thoughts to that personality of ours, which is just as perishable as the raiment which covers it, we can catch no glimpses of a life beyond the confines of the tomb; but when we are engaged in meditation upon our higher side, we discover the truth that that plane of our consciousness can, does, and must endure forever."

When so good an illustration or so wise a reflection is thoughtfully analyzed, it will soon appear that the so-called higher side of humanity is the whole of humanity strictly speaking, for whatever is below or external to this can be but an offshoot from it, a mere instrument formed by the soul for its temporary use, endowed for a brief span of fleeting time with delegated life, a life which must sooner or later be indrawn and re-absorbed in the source whence it proceeded, unless the instrument be so perpetually remodeled that it can be transformed and eventually transfigured without palpable dissolution. This conjecture we shall consider later.

It can never be either wise or reasonable to estimate anything below its highest conceivable possibilities, but while we invariably do well to gaze steadfastly upon our loftiest ideals, we must guard against impatience when we discover that though they can be gradually, they cannot be instantaneously, actualized in all their fulness. Back of all plurals lies the one unalterable singular. Our powers are but variant expressions of our power; our privileges are but manifold varieties of our essential unitary prerogative as children of the Highest. Whatever one human being has already done, that every other human being who truly desires to do likewise can certainly accomplish. Our desires proceed from within us, the aspirations which burst forth and well up from the inmost of our being are just so many partial revelations of what we virtually contain, our full containment always exceeding its fullest expression.

It is a very great step forward for the race and for the individual to accept the truism that "out of nothing nothing comes," therefore there must be a something within us which is fully adequate to account for all that issues from us in the shape of prayer, determination, resolution, ambition, etc., etc. Having used the word ambition we desire to contrast it with the much higher term aspiration, by which it is completely supplanted as moral evolution proceeds. The ambitious person is usually very egotistical, having not yet grown to appreciate the gospel of mutualism, but the aspirational hero has become elevated to the rank of a philanthropist who, interested in the welfare of all humankind, rises consciously as one among many brethern, knowing and rejoicing in the knowledge that as he climbs and soars he becomes an increasing channel of inspiration and illumination to myriads of fellow travelers.

It has long been a tenet of Oriental philosophy, and also a doctrine of Esoteric Christianity, that all private personal ambition must be merged in active, efficient search after the common good. No one whose horizon is so limited that he considers self only, can do other than work injury to the very self he seeks exclusively to benefit, for so intimate are our mutual relations and so inter-dependent are we at all times and in all ways, that the quality of thought we entertain concerning others is unconsciously absorbed by them and reflected back upon ourselves. A thoughtful consideration of all that is implied in this proposition will, and necessarily must, open the way for a completely scientific, as well as purely philosophic and broadly religious, explanation of the working of the law whereby all things which come to us, come through the operation of the omnipresent force of attraction.

Nothing can be fairer than the affirmation that all people and all things should be sampled at their best, for it is only the finest and fullest expression which in any adequate way proves the real nature of that which is manifest. The interest attaching not only to horse shows, dog shows, and flower shows, but also to public exhibitions of beautiful human infants, proves that the popular mind is always delighted to witness a display of more than ordinary excellence in any department of life or industry. This beautiful, normal, and altogether reasonable preference for beauty over deformity, intelligence over ignorance, and perfect health in place of any symptom of disease, clearly evinces the innate appreciation of symmetry and deep seated desire for perfection which underlies the entire fabric of human emotion. There is indeed a morbid curiosity which delights to inspect the pathological, but let us hope there is within this morbid tendency a real desire on the part of the multitude to find a lasting remedy for those mysterious and perplexing ailments, the exhibition of which, for the time being, seems to gratify a perverted taste. No one is ever heard to express that delight at viewing imperfection which spontaneously results from beholding the sublime, the majestic, or the exquisite. The esthetic faculty, which has sometimes been ridiculed because curiously manifested in some persons, is nothing less than a bursting forth of a native impulse toward the love of righteousness.

When Matthew Arnold wrote so much of "sweet reasonableness," of "sweetness and light," and often very powerfully concerning the eternal force which ever makes for righteousness, the high moral influence which his essays exerted over a large company of more or less sceptical readers, was due to the primal fact that in all the literary productions of that very scholarly man there ran a deep vein of true optimism, despite the seeming pessimism of some of his conclusions.

We cannot make progress in any direction until we are firmly grounded in the faith that such progress is completely possible as well as intensely desirable; the importance, therefore, of a radically optimistic theory of human nature cannot be overestimated.

That there are difficulties in the way of immediately and completely justifying the grandest conceivable view of human life we frankly and willingly admit, but these difficulties vanish as we pursue our mental journey from the surface of the ocean of human expression by continually diving deeper and deeper into the calm waters beneath, to which the stormy surface offers no resemblance. Such frequent expressions as "good at heart" and many of like import are general tributes paid to the deeper, higher, and holier self of those very individuals whose outer personalities are at present extremely disagreeable and whose actual conduct is often disgraceful in the extreme.

The very fact that you can appeal to a person's sense of honor, thereby making him ashamed of his own fault, proves that there is within him something which rebukes his own wrongdoing, and no rebuke can ever be successfully administered except by that which points a nobler way. We are essentially and potentially exactly as strong, as wise, as beautiful, as pure, and as gifted as we ever wish to be even in our most exalted hours of felt communion with the absolutely divine. There is no adequate explanation for human ideals and aspirations save that which is contained within that sublime theory of human nature, which pronounces human nature one with divine nature. The highest of which we can conceive is already ours, seeing that we have apprehended it, our apprehension affording proof of our ability to embody. When Thomas a'Kempis wrote his masterly work "On the Imitation of Christ" he gave to the world in a priceless gem of literature a connecting link between the doctrinal theology of the early Christian church, and the so-called new metaphysical opinions, which are at present greatly agitating modern Christendom.

There is not so much difference as we have been sometimes falsely led to suppose between Alexandrian philosophy, Hebrew ideas of righteousness, and Oriental mysticism, even though the Hebrew, the Hindoo, and the Greek, do not always seem to assimilate easily. It is really absurd to call the metaphysical thought of Europe and America to-day "new" when it is a re-vivification on a greatly extending scale of the highest philosophical conceptions united with the purest moral teachings of all the greatest seers and sages whose presence in the world has most greatly blessed humanity. Though the foregoing conclusion seems inevitable it is but just, and at the same time highly encouraging, to trace the ever widening circuit in which these noble thoughts are moving.

We can scarcely compare, except by way of contrast, our present social state with that of Egypt, Greece, Rome, India, or Palestine in the long ago. Brilliant gems of thought of priceless worth have come down to us through milleniums of time, but these choice spiritual jewels are to be attributed not to the average condition of the people in those lands, at those times, but only to the exceptional genius of the prophets of those countries and periods. To-day we are universalizing, we are daily becoming increasingly cosmopolitan both in theory and practice, and, thanks to the widespread influence of common education, what one person really knows is easily communicated to all others who are willing to share the knowledge. Though our present civilization has many drawbacks,—among which the extremely artificial mode of living adopted by a large percentage of those who make up society with a big S is perhaps the most lamentable feature,—it is not wise, nor is it just to dwell too largely upon the evils of this artifical condition, for the seeds of its own death are in it, while the growing intelligence of the hour is ever leading even the most slavish devotees of fashion in constantly growing numbers to abandon a position, which when tried to its uttermost proves itself entirely unsatisfactory. It is only fair to the great multitude of the unchurched in these days to regard disaffection toward ecclesiastical institutions as a not altogether unhealthy reaction from the blind religious formalism which went before and led up to the present departure from time-honored standards of orthodoxy.

The words of an agnostic orator may be often harsh, repellant, and at times ridiculous, but had it not been for the utterly spurious view of human nature promulgated from Christian pulpits in the ears of generation after generation, representing man as too vile to live, and God as an implacable tyrant, these very assailants upon Christianity would never have gained a hearing, and we very much doubt whether they would have wished to say anything at all resembling what they are now saying.

However much we may cherish a noble conception of Supreme Benevolence, and however tenaciously we may cling to a consoling and exhilarating view of our own spiritual immortality, we cannot pretend that we are sorry when we preceive that many talented people are engaged in the work of demolishing the clouds and screens, which have long concealed the essential verities, for which true religion vouches. Therefore while the method of the reconstructionist differs entirely from that of the iconoclast, the idol-breaker, — should he succeed in destroying every image he assails,—could not logically disturb the position of those who rest their confidence neither in man-made creeds nor in pretentious institutions, but solely in the realm where intuitive preception of truth does away with the necessity for external authority.

It is deeply encouraging to note that the lowest views of human nature, not the highest, are those which are being most ruthlessly assailed. Modern literature abounds with diatribe levelled at shams, frauds, hypocrisies, and all else that is mean, contemptible, and unworthy, while the popular mind takes kindly to all the praise that is heartily bestowed upon genuine merit and real nobility. The great newspapers of to-day are sadly prone to give disproportionate publicity to the evils which afflict our times, but the proprietors, editors, and reporters connected with these journals all disclaim any admiration for the iniquities they describe and declare that their chief object (aside from making money) in exposing iniquities is to create popular sentiment in exactly the opposite direction. It is also very pleasing to observe that however fiercely a really good book may be attacked by spiteful critics, no criticism however malignant can permanently prevent the author of such a work from wearing the well-earned laurels of popular esteem and affection.

Concerning great paintings, noble plays, and all else that appeals to the multitude, real worth does actually—and in these days not very slowly—make its way to very general recognition. The occupants of the upper gallery in a low class theatre are the very readiest of all people in the community to vociferously applaud heroism and decry villainy whenever depicted on their favorite melo-dramatic stage. This is, in itself, a convincing proof that the evangelists have told the unvarnished truth when they have informed us that the common people heard Jesus gladly, though the scheming ecclesiastical and civil politicians located in the Roman Empire many centuries ago determined to extirpate, if possible, all teachers and all teaching which militated against their own corrupt interests.

No great philanthropist has ever been rejected by popular vote, unless that vote has been unfairly obtained by the misrepresentations of unscrupulous demagogues. The uneducated populace may be misled by falsehood and cunning, but the great popular heart is never wrong even when its head is most demented. The love of righteousness rests in so secure a depth of human feeling that it is absolutely impossible to overthrow it, and there it is that we find abiding ground for confidence in the ultimate resurrection and glorification of the entire body of our great human family. Ineffectual may prove the most carefully devised and earnestly propagated "reforms," for not one of them can prove ultimately successful in accomplishing intended good, until all the measures adopted shall agree with the underlying motives of the enterprise. To take it for granted that there is awakenable good in every human being, and then proceed to devise means for its awakenment is wise, logical and kindly, and, in the long run, sure to succeed.

The true scientist has ever at hand the only sure remedy for public as well as for private ills. The next great step taken by practitioners of divine healing, will be to apply the teaching so loudly praised as a healer of sick bodies, to the great body politic which sorely needs healing at present.

BLOSSOMS OF UNIVERSAL TRUTH;

Or, Divine Thoughts for Every Day in the Year.

By Hannah More Kohaus, author of "Between the Lines," etc. Price, 50c.

It is only through aspiration that the soul attains to Self-consciousness.

There are many who recognize the power of the spoken word of Truth, but they do not know what word to speak. There are many who have earnest aspiration and desire to "take words and turn to the Lord," but they do not know in what words to clothe their aspirations. There are many who feel that it is well for a number of people to be holding the same word each day, for in union there is strength.

It is to answer all of these needs that Blossoms of Universal Truth has been prepared.

This little book contains a statement for each day in the year, and has been prepared with much time and careful study.

Nothing like it has ever been given out. It is thoroughly unique, as you can see by the contents, which are as follows:

January: Declaration—That which Is.
February: Negations—What I am Not.
March: Affirmations—What I Am.
April: Contemplations—What I Think May: Dedication—What I Will.
June: Supplication—What I Have.
July: Restoration—What I Restore.
August: Aspiration—What I Desire.
September: Acceptation—What I Believe.
October: Consecration—What I Consecrate.
November: Adoration—Praise and Thanksgiving.
December: Benediction—Blessing and Promise.

This little book is good food for the soul. It is pleasant to the eye, with its pretty, white cover, upon which is a spray of blossoms from the tree of life. This is just the book that you will want to put under your pillow at night, so that you can get your word for the day with your first waking moment.

HEILBROUN...

OR...DROPS FROM THE FOUNTAIN OF HEALTH

By Fanny M. Harley

Leatheret, 50 cents

This is a book that will be appreciated by all who are interested in soul unfolding. It will open up avenues of thought in the direction toward Truth. It is plain and simple, and exceedingly practical and helpful. It teaches especially of self-healing for both soul and body. It takes for its keynote the words of the German mystic, Jacob Boehme: "By the activity of the word the sleeping germs of everything are awakened into life."

A lady wrote, on reading "Heilbroun": "The mentality behind this book is wholesome and vigorous, and one cannot read it without gaining strength and understanding. Like all Mrs. Harley's books, it shows much thoughtful dwelling upon matters pertaining to the higher life."

PRACTICAL METAPHYSICS

FOR HEALING AND SELF CULTURE

By Anna W. Mills

Cloth, $2.00, postpaid

This is a book explaining in the most direct manner the Principle upon which mental or spiritual healing is founded, with the most simple methods of putting it into practice. Too much cannot be said of the value of this true and practical teaching, whose whole aim and purpose is to make life worth living.

This book teaches us how to find the "higher self," and to become conscious of the power which we each possess to cast out disease and unhappy conditions. It shows us the royal road to health of body through the intelligent and only process of permanent healing — viz, that of healing the mentality by cleansing it of uneasy imaginings, sense delusions, and false thinking concerning God, man, and things.

One lady who was an invalid for eighteen years writes that she was made perfectly well through reading this book and applying its teachings.

SERMONETTES FROM MOTHER GOOSE FOR BIG FOLKS

By Fanny M. Harley

Cloth, $1.00; Paper, 50 cents

This is an unique book that will never outlive its usefulness. It consists of logically discussed, keenly analyzed sermons of Truth founded upon the simple rhymes of Mother Goose, showing how Truth may come to us in disguise, and be transformed into new and fairer light.

One critic wrote: "We have already had awakened souls who have found lessons in flowers, instruction in running brooks, sermons in stones; but now here is an enlightened soul who has found veritable sermons containing life, light, love, wisdom, truth, health, and all the good things of God, hidden in Mother Goose's nursery rhymes."

Another says, "It is questionable if Mother Goose herself could better interpret her wise sayings."

Another: "Your 'Sermonettes from Mother Goose' is just what everybody needs. It is simple and practical. It came last Monday morning, and I could not be willing to close the covers until I had read every line. How happy you must be to be able to do so much good to your fellow men!"

SOUL FRAGRANCE (POETRY)

By Hannah More Kohaus

Illuminated Cover, $1.25

Every poem, and every verse of each poem, contains a spiritual thought-seed that will enrich the soul-garden of anyone who will plant it there.

These poems are the direct speech of a soul which has attained the point where it may express itself most simply because its consciousness has become well rounded and individualized by a richly fruitful experience. Any earnest-hearted toiler along the path of progress will find in this group of poems convincing comfort, true reason for hope, cheering encouragement to renewed effort, as well as a quality of beauty so intense as to thrill with triumphant gladness the soul that reads. The deepest of philosophies, the keenest of scientific accuracies, the highest of spiritual truths minister to the production of Mrs. Kohaus' lines, and she seems so to penetrate to the heart of all things, that one reads with soul-felt delight.

BETWEEN THE LINES....

By Hannah More Kohaus.
Cloth $1.00; Paper 50 cents postpaid

Is a condensed treatise on life and health as the truth of man's being. There is food for reflection in every word, as well as full and direct instruction how to obtain the best and most enduring results from the application of divine Truth. Read the following few extracts from the many letters we have received:

"I want to tell you how much I appreciate 'Between the Lines.' This book seems to answer questions that I have been half unconsciously asking ever since the Truth was first told me. As I read the book there comes to me some thought I have heard or read, or some Bible verse, all shining with a new light, which takes its place in the whole Truth as different stars shine out in a constellation."

"'Between the Lines' is so clear and simple, a little child can understand. I hope the author may continue to write. Our ideas of God, and our relation to Him, have been greatly cleared of the mist or fog that surrounded them, by reading her explanations."

"I have read 'Between the Lines' through once, and am reading it carefully. I am delighted with the book, and find it very helpful. The chapters on Application and The Word are just beautiful, and so clear! They alone are worth more than the price of the book, many times. After all that has been taught of this wonderful Science, the application is the principal thing."

"'Between the Lines' came, and I was delighted with it. It is simply grand; every word in it helped me."

...By HELEN AUGUSTA FUSSELL...

Illustrated by HELEN LUTHARDT.

This is one of the best books for children that have ever come to our notice. It is unique, beautiful, healthful, and instructive. It contains both stories and poems of the highest order, and its illustrations will please every child's heart. It is the book of all children's books to put into the hands of little "shut-ins." It is so exceedingly spicy and entertaining that while hearing it read all the little pains and aches will surely be forgotten, for it teaches so beautifully of the outdoor life of country children, and of children who are taught to be happy under all circumstances and in every environment.

Miss Fussell uncovers the child nature, shows its little temptations, its desires, its aspirations, and its hopes, and in each story makes the good come off the victor over all error suggestions and temptations.

SHORT LESSONS IN THEOSOPHY.

Ques. — What is true Theosophy?

Ans. — Theosophy is the master-key of eternity to the understanding of God and man. True Theosophy is a question of spiritual development, of soul revelation, of finding the Christ within, listening to the Divine Logos — the Word. When we can find God within, where both Jesus and Buddha say God resides, we realize our divine nature. Genuine Theosophy is the Christ of this truth rising out of the tomb of error, it is the doctrine of self-control, the crucifixion of the senses, the liberation of the spirit from passion, the resurrection of all that is divine within us. Theosophy is a spiritual science, it is a knowledge of the eternal true science, to know the Christ, the living Word which speaks from the Infinite Divine Being. The spirit is resurrected, there is henceforth no more death. The true Theosophist drinks his inspiration from the spiritual air, and knowledge of the universe becomes to him an open book. We outgrow sacerdotalism, we become true priests, our daily sacrifice the daily surrender of the lower to the higher nature.

Ques. — What is the Theosophical doctrine as a religion?

Ans. — The doctrine of Theosophy is Love, Wisdom, and Truth, the absolute purity and perfection of the divine nature. Theosophical truth is universal truth and universal religion — a demonstrated science; it holds the key to all the sciences and religions of the world. In Theosophy we approach the unity of all religions, for Theosophy studies all religions, but teaches none. What does religion really mean? Religio — to bind together — implies a condition of bondage; it is a bondage in which the lower nature is held by the higher, it is the at-one-ment, the reconciliation, the harmonization of all the elements in human nature, for it is not a belief in immortality, or in God, that saves any one, a mere intellectual assent given to a certain dogma. One can believe in religion and be a devil. The devils also believe and tremble. We can be intellectually unfolded enough to believe in God, but what does the resurrection mean to our individual lives? It must result in the death of the lower nature that the higher may triumph. Nothing dies in reality, only in seeming. The seed is not quickened unless there is the appearance of death, and there is no quickening of the spirit unless there is the appearance of the death of the lower nature, until from the supulchre the rock is rolled away, in symbol of the birth of Truth. Theosophy is the science of right living rather than a sacerdotal system. A hidden wisdom is the world's religion.

Ques. — What is the Theosophical idea of Deity?

Ans. — The Divine Being is simply beyond the comprehension of the soul in man. If I am not equal to God, or to an angel, there is a mystery about God or the angel as far as I am concerned. That which is on my level of belief I may explain, whatever is beyond that level remains an unsolved problem. It takes God to understand God, as well as a man to comprehend man, or a bird to understand the life of a bird. If Deity is above us, then Deity is beyond our definition. We find the soundest metaphysicians never undertake to limit Deity. Agnosticism is merely the confession of honest men that intellect alone is unable to solve the problem of Deity. We have no conflict with Huxley or Spencer. All divine things are unknowable by the senses, but there is a spiritual sense which we call intuition, by which we discover a knowledge of the Spirit, to whose researches there is no end. Intellectually we find, not God, but Energy, Power, Force. The word God means the All-Good, the Good One, nothing more, nothing less. Plato, in his immortal assertion, "God geometrizes," does not imply anything more than a mathematical Mind, not a kind, loving God. The infinite power might be a cruel, capricious one. It may seem a singular thing to say, and yet many people know nothing about God because they believe in God; as soon as they give up believing in Him, they find Him. Belief implies that some one is the custodian of direct intelligence regarding the Deity, whose testimony is accepted as final authority. A Testament is something one leaves behind him when he is gone; while the testator liveth, the word is of no effect, therefore those people who know nothing about God save from the Bible (of which we would say nothing disrespectful, we speak only regarding its false rendering) believe in a dead God who has left His Testament. Practically it is so. All Christians believe in a God who, as far as this world is concerned, is dead. There was a time when God spoke to the world, but he does so no longer. God on earth has finished His book. How utterly incongruous with the teachings of Jesus: "He has been with you and shall be in you. It is expedient that I go away, for then the Comforter will come nearer than ever before, and lead you into all truth." They were not to receive it through revelation, but through the ever-living presence of the Holy Spirit within themselves, which places every individual on the great rock on which pure Theosophy is built. We must build our Theosophical temple on divine justice, and we can never find it until we discover it in ourselves; it is a matter of spiritual unfoldment. God is Love and Wisdom, as well as Justice. If we act divinely we shall have a revelation of divine wisdom in our own lives as our wisdom proceeds from divine love, for only when we act from a divinely human love can our acts be those of wisdom. If love does not direct the impulse, it cannot be wise. How many of us act from the pure love of humanity, and for the welfare of the human race? The supremest conception of Deity is Love. Love is the highest goal and is inseparable from charity, for charity is love in motion. Love is the principle, charity the expression. Henry James declared that in studying the problem of Life, he came to see more and more distinctly the only possible cause of creation. God being Love could not love Himself, He must have an object to love, and we see in humanity the result of the Divine Love seeking object and expression. Remember by humanity we do not mean the inhabitants of this little planet, earth; the earth is not the universe, it is not even the solar system, we mean all the intelligent inhabitants of all worlds which constitute the form of the Divine Man, that constitute the children of God, without beginning and without end.

Ques. — What text-books are the repositories of this hidden wisdom?

Ans. — The hidden wisdom is wrapped up in our inner selves, not in books, or scrolls, but in God's living Word. Man is the highest expression of nature; God's divine Word is in its highest and noblest expression in human nature. The hidden wisdom which will well up from our own souls must come through development of our inner nature, and in no other way. Theosophical truth does not depend on legend, or historic personality, or the truth contained in sacred books, but on its intrinsic value and appeal to our moral nature. If Buddha and Jesus had never lived, Theosophical teaching would be none the less valuable to man. The precious stone has a value, here and now. All teachings are demonstrated in the holy influence they exert on human life. Judge the tree by its fruits. Bring it to the touch-stone of expediency. If we find the teachings of the Vedas, when lived out, cause war and hatred to be swept from the earth, we know the source from whence this stream sprang is the water of life that slakest the thirst of mankind; and there is nothing in the Vedas that is not found in the New Testament. The teachings are identical, some of the precepts of the Vedas are as good, many more deeply veiled. In Theosophy we can well dispense with controversy if we drink from inspiration. Whether it were Buddha, the historic avatar of India, or Jesus, the historic light of Palestine, or Osiris of Egypt, remember that neither Osiris, Christ, nor Buddha are dead and buried. In spirit Jesus worketh now, the truth Buddha and Osiris brought is now working in the world. Why seek ye the living among the dead? Why go to the sepulchre when you can meet the living spirit on the highways of life? When opened in our spiritual intuition the sun within sheds its bright beams, and appreciable light, heat, and electricity stream from it. Those who bathe in the sunlight appropriate to-day its rays. It is not those who have analyzed the water, or tested the depth of the well, but those who drink the water that receive its benefits; it is not our historic knowledge of the Truth, but our assimilation of the same which profits us much.

Ye must eat and drink and appropriate the sweet spirit of Truth now in the universe. The past is translated into the future. We live to-day, not in the days of Palestine. It is our present at-one-ment with the living Christ of the Spirit that necessarily brings us into the knowledge of the Truth. The truths of the soul are not apprehended by the intellect. Be guided entirely by your own intuition; be honest and earnest in your search after Truth.

QUES. — Is there not a brother-hood who sacredly guard these occult truths?

ANS. — The race of Mahatmas have spent ages in ferreting out the truths of the universe. Their existence is not widely known even by Buddhists themselves, only by those who are in a condition to know them. There is no reluctance on the part of the Mahatmas to reveal themselves, but they cannot create eyes in our heads to see them when they visit us. When Edwin Arnold re-visited India, he went to see the Buddhists of the Isle of Ceylon, receiving from them a complimentary address representing him as a great interpreter of their Sanscrit philosophy, a work they remembered with affection. Conversing with them of the Mahatmas he was told that they knew nothing of the existence of such people, who could not be found, while they were so famous. At the same time they affirmed that there were teachings in the Sanscrit which, if followed out, would develop the chela into the state of Mahatma. They think Arnold's faithful and magnificent portrayal of Buddha did more than anything else could to call the attention of the Indian Empire to a knowledge of the beauties that lay enshrined in their religion, and made a powerful incentive to live up to them. We hear a great deal of Indian thralldom, and of woman's degraded condition. It cannot be doubted that there are women in India in gross degradation, but this state exists in spite of the teachings of their philosophy (which should lead to the purest elevation of mankind), not in consequence of their religion. All the vices of Christendom are rebuked in Scripture, and yet tolerated in a Christian community. There is no charge that can be brought against the Buddhist religion for the vices of Asia that cannot be brought against any other on earth, but the religion of India as interpreted in its sacred books is a religion of greatest purity and noble intelligence. No one who compares the religions of the world can fail to find in Buddhism the most humanitarian system, in Brahmanism the most metaphysical. Buddha taught that nothing and no one can come between us and God. We are our own high priests, mediators, and intercessors, free to discover truth for ourselves, following the path marked out by our own intuition which gives, "Thus saith the Spirit," as final authority. Many people are not content without some lord or master to obey, they want some one else to do their thinking for them instead of going directly to the God within their own hearts, receiving Truth from the source of all Truth. It is only to awaken thought that we study Theosophy, not to render allegiance to some hierarchy of India.

QUES. — Will you kindly explain the difference between Buddhism and Brahmanism?

ANS. — The great difference between them is this, that Brahmanism deals with abstract metaphysics, Buddhism with practical philanthropy. The Brahminical system as taught is the oldest in the East, and profoundly metaphysical. When Mrs. Eddy makes her statement, "All is mind, there is no matter," she uses a trite phrase in harmony with a spiritual understanding of the universe, but it did not originate with her, nor with the Greek philosophers of two thousand years ago, but sprang from the oldest system on earth — ancient Brahmanism, which recognized spirit as the incorporeal Brahm, the only Real, the all-in-all of Being; matter, Maya, as nothing, an illusion, a reflection of the All. The material world had no existence but as a reflection of the spiritual world which is the only real world, as spirit is the only reality. This doctrine of the reality of spirit and the illusive character of matter can be traced back thousands of years to the Vedas, the profoundest system of thought in the East. But this system of abstract and unapplied metaphysics addresses itself to the intellect alone, not to the affections, and frequently develops personal spiritual pride and self-righteousness, a system of caste, of ceremonial and priesthood. Any attempt to convert the world to absolute Brahmanism to-day would be futile. Those people who love to revel in abstract ideas are not as a rule benevolent. Buddhism is an entirely different kind of religion, is ethical more than creedal, and delights in benevolence. While Brahmanism looks to the salvation of one's own soul, Buddhism holds the higher thought, "What can I do to save others?" The usual question of the individual in the world, to-day, is, "What can I do to advance my own prospects, how rise to some higher condition in this world, or another?" This selfish consideration destroys all that is noblest and best in human nature. Buddha renounced everything, became a mendicant friar, and gave to the world a religion so near like Christ's that you cannot contrast them, for there is no contrast between them; you can only compare and harmonize them. Buddha did not invent his teachings, he found them in the sacred Vedas and Puranas. Buddha was simply a Brahminical reformer as Jesus was a reformer of the Jews. Jesus never protested against the law or the prophets, but against the aristocratic element that had crept into Judaism and destroyed the teachings of the Talmud. One taught, five and a half centuries after the other, the same truth, that all religion must be made practical. Buddha disputed some articles of the Brahman creed, and devoted himself so entirely to a life of loving kindness, that he exalted moral perfection above intellectual accuracy, reduced the purely metaphysical to practice, and founded a theory of pure ethics, of pure religion, carrying into effect some of the grandest teachings in the world. Buddha had attained in his earliest youth, when eight years of age, to the understanding of all philosophy, and all through his life he understood in his heart the religion of the East, but not until he reduced it to daily, hourly practice did he attain to the state of essential blessedness. Under the sacred tree he saw all his past embodiments, reviewed every link in the chain of existence as it had been forged, and found in this moment of divine revelation that everything which had prepared him for Nirvana was the good he had done, not the intellectual position he had attained. An intellectual comprehension of Theosophy is not a road to salvation, but it is the practical exemplification of our idea of it in our own existence. Our progress along the road is not to be judged by intellectual accomplishment, but by our spiritual growth. We cannot estimate real progress by the mere amount of knowledge stored up in the mind. We do not always find saints in professors' chairs, or sinners clothed in rags. Spiritual good is always our essential good.

QUES. — Is the world ready to receive esoteric truths?

ANS. — Every one is not prepared for the interior teaching in its most intricate form. Jesus condensed in his teachings the wisdom of the age: they were both sublime and simple. The veil is rent in ourselves that hitherto hid the inner meaning of truth from the world, the veil of mystery is torn to shreds, the spiritual mysteries of all religions revealed, although the materiality of the present day tends to dwarf the spirit of those who enter into the consciousness of Being. When man really knows himself he knows God. He who cannot find divinity in himself has only developed his fourth principle, life being to him a certain round of eating and drinking. We see many people who are animated shells and nothing more, they have their better moments, but their souls have not yet shone through to any great extent; and there are those that have no consciousness of a spiritual existence, who are often actuated by a pure benevolence that puts to shame professed sanctity. They have a spirituality which they are as yet unable to express through their lower principle. Many people are not prepared for occult study, or theosophical investigation, which does really comprise religion, philosophy, and science. Theosophy is not intended for children but for men and women in understanding, the only people really qualified to deal with those great problems Theosophy presents to the world, which call for earnest and persistent study. We should not give that which is holy to dogs, and we ought not to enforce advanced ideas upon unprepared minds. Whatever we learn in a Theosophical school we never have to unlearn; all true teaching is progress. You must impart these esoteric truths to the public by degrees, but teach in accordance with the foundation principles. They must be pure in order to be good. Give milk and water if people are not ready for undiluted truth, but never prevaricate if you withhold, nor adulterate if you omit. The needs of human nature are so varied; each mind requires that phase of truth adapted to its understanding. A Theosophist should be all things to all men to save all. Bring the student from scales and exercises to the works of the great masters. If we apply our divine wisdom as it was given on the day of Pentecost when all spoke in divers tongues, we should divide the Word to the comprehension and edification of all hearers. If we continue in this age the gift of tongues we will have one gospel as we have one arithmetic, or one chemistry, but provide different degrees of these sciences as pupils are prepared to receive them; so this one law and one gospel can be adapted to all. Many speak of the unintelligibility of Theosophical literature, the language is so condensed, the thought so concrete, the ideas and forms of expression so unusual that the idle reader cannot understand it; but, if everything difficult were laid aside, these timid pupils might never learn anything in their lives. The study of Theosophy is the study of a new science of which they know nothing, an art with which they are unfamiliar. We come to the expression of thought in a new language. The thoughts are exceedingly ancient yet new to the thought of to-day. The nomenclature may seem new and startling, but Kama loca is only purgatory, Devachan the spirit world or paradise, Nirvana, heaven; Buddha is nothing more than Christ if so much, and there is nothing in Buddhism that there is not in Christianity. The value of Theosophy is that it shows the absolute unity of all divine philosophy. The general tendency of modern thought is toward the rise of the individual, that of Theosophy toward the rise of the race, in forgetfulness of self which kills out all signs of separateness. We must feel that we are living the one true life, and that is the life of the race, the only life with which we should concern ourselves. Self-forgetfulness is not antithetical to self-preservation. There are laws and Law, there are no end of lower earthly laws included in the one universal Law of Spirit.

QUES. — Is there not a rapidly growing desire on the part of humanity for higher spiritual revelation?

ANS. — Everywhere to-day there is a great and increasing interest in all that savors of occultism, which only means a secret science. Theosophy means divine wisdom, and do we not have to look or search for divine wisdom as for a secret or hidden treasure? Without wisdom we cannot understand life in the past or the future. Theosophy unlocks the mysteries of Being. It does not deal with the individual as separate from mankind, but with all mankind everywhere, since the Eternal Being is Father and Mother of us all. The demonstration of Theosophical truth to the individual depends on the mental calibre of the individual and the effort made to solve the problem. All sciences are the various manifestations of this one true science; there are various departments of knowledge but knowledge itself is One. All religious systems are the endeavor on the part of humanity to express its highest idea in sign and symbol. Theosophy has a unitizing and not a separative influence on those who study it, its adherents becoming friends who were hitherto strangers. Theosophy does not endeavor to overturn all creeds, but on the contrary, without taking any form of religion, symbol, or book, it interprets all symbols, creeds, and books esoterically, not exoterically, recognizing that the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life ; therefore the true Theosophist is the universal religionist.

QUES. — What is the Theosophical idea of death?

ANS. — Death in Theosophy means death to old conditions, death to the animal nature, a resurrection for the spiritual, which like a glorious Phœnix bursts its bonds, therefore this death is always personified by the butterfly emerging from the chrysalis, or by the emblem of the Easter egg, the casting off of the shell, the deliverance from all the trammels of the cage, through the dominant life-principle working its way upward, the triumph of spirit over the thraldom of sense. There is a great deal of us that has to die. On the human plane of existence we die and never rise again; our lower clothing is cast aside, we, the real selves, go higher. Death when understood, in all allegories, means spiritual elevation, not physical dissolution. The Apostle rightly exclaims, " O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? " meaning that death is only the casting aside of the shell, as the imprisoned bird breaks from its environment and rejoices in deliverance from it. There would be no fear of death if a person did not depend on the body for love and happiness. We should be willing to wear it and use it, but ready to lose it, with no doubt that the spirit world is a better state than this. Make it a matter of perfect indifference whether you remain here, or go hence. You are always at work in the spiritual universe. There is no difference in birth or death, we deny that you ever were born or ever can die; simply realize that you always forever were. Feel that you have nothing to do with death and you will overcome it in all belief. Those who live in Truth will pass into the spiritual state without any preparation, gradually dismissing physical environment, until the ultimate condition will be a passing through the beautiful gateway of transition as did those great adepts, Enoch and Elijah. Is it necessary that the house should tumble down because we are going to move out of it, or should the body we are to vacate first become foul and loathsome? The entire philosophy of Being is expressed in Longfellow's "Dust thou art to dust returneth was not spoken of the soul." It had a prior existence and returns to God who gave it. The experience of a spirit on this earth is like that of a child who goes out to boarding school, or a youth put out as an apprentice. He remembers his home with love and enjoys it on his return, as he never would have done if he had not left it. The brother of the Prodigal Son, though *un*fallen was not superior, he had not the true lowly spirit of him who had fallen and risen, who had fought the battle and won the prize. (Man can develop from manhood into angelhood as a child develops into maturity.) The freedom of the angel is nothing to that of the archangel, and yet the archangel was once a man, the man was once an infant. All spiritual studies that will lead us into intelligent recognition of pure Theosophy will bring us to a point of larger knowledge and teach us the relation of spirit to body.

Ques. — You regard the body as the necessary tool of the spiritual workman?

Ans. — Our bodies are created or evolved for a definite purpose, they are our tools to work with, our dress to wear, our primer to learn our lessons from. They are brought into existence for a necessity. The spirit makes its body as the workman his tool. If the question arises: "Why do we not then all have the bodies we would like," remember we cannot always externalize our thought to suit us in making a dress, bonnet, or coat. You have not the perfect power over the material with the pattern before you. People are often dissatisfied with their own efforts and prefer the workmanship of others. The ideal always comes before the actual, the perfection of the ideal is reserved for that condition in this world, or some other, when we have gained the ascendency over the material, when we shall be clothed upon with other bodies, — a glorious spiritual form. There is no such thing as creation of substance, only creation of form. Forms come and go, substance does not. When we are formed, nothing comes into being, and when we die nothing goes out of being: there is only a change in the appearance. Therefore creation is only organization, expression; seeming death is simply dematerialization, a disappearance from the realm of moral perception. From the standpoint of the Eternal there can be no change. There is no change of divine law but change in our conception of it; there is no change in truth, but in our ideas of truth. So all outward things change, as outward things are the manifestation of our idea; all intelligence is incessant and ever-varying activity. How is it the worlds differ, advancing from infancy to old age, and passing to their decay? The change from first to last is in the condition of the mind working upon them. An organ is in the same condition during all the year you study music, but you are capable of playing at the end more intricate harmonies upon it than you could at the beginning, yet the capacity of the organ has not changed; the musician changes, the organ does not, it has never been educated. The world and our bodies, as we behold them outwardly, are being acted upon by intellectual elements that are always advancing. The legend of Pygmalion and Galatea, where the statue comes to life and is made to speak, is illustrative of the truth concerning spiritual evolution. Man produces a marble form through his mind and affections, he breathes his life into the work of his own hands. It never was himself, still the statue breathed, so our outward form can have no life in itself but it is the animated statue of the soul, the will and the affections manifested in the form. We might even fancy this soul's statue to have a wavering, wandering will of its own which knew better than it did. Everything you call objective form in mineral or vegetable organism is nothing more than the expression of an eternal impress, the embodiment of your breath but not of you who breathe. The human life, doubtless, lived for ages before expressing itself in human forms, it has been the creator of everything below it. It is more possible that the action of your mind made a monkey than that you ever were a monkey. Man as a spiritual entity was always in the spirit world. If we have passed through the animal and vegetable kingdoms it is because they have proceeded from the mind of man as the act of his thought previous to his building a form, in which his own conscious thought could express itself. We can understand involution in the light of evolution. We never are embodied; we ourselves live now and ever in the spirit world, but the soul gives forth an impulse, produces a form, and endows it with more or less perfection. If we can conceive of ourselves as we really are, we have never been on earth at all, our real selves have created human forms and endowed those human forms with life as the sculptor created the statue. Then the question arises, "do we really know each other in spirit? Have we admired the outward form and that only, or do we judge man by his soul-life, and not by that manifest to sense?" Do we really know ourselves, does the lower know the higher nature? The majority live in the lower nature and do not know themselves. The fall of man is the losing sight of our own spiritual nature in the busy scenes of external life. The lower-you has to find the higher-you. Consequently in the higher sense you never had a mother and never were born. Your spiritual being did not commence in mortal birth, your spirit entity was the cause of the conception, it made your mother a mother, without it she never could have given birth to a child. We believe in a super-personal Deity and a super-personal man. Man must come to understand himself and the principle of spiritual truth before finding his own soul, before he can walk in the light of the Spirit within him.

QUES. — How can we unfold our spiritual powers?

ANS. — Our powers, whatever they may be, are capable of stimulation in every direction. To feel that we have a certain endowment to begin with, that we are born gifted, does not imply we should not set to work to diligently employ and cultivate the gift. Is it not possible to put these talents out at interest, to make the one talent two, the two increase to four, the ten become twenty as easily as the one become two? Unto those who have shall more be given continually. Spiritual growth has a value here and now, as well as in the life beyond the grave. It is not necessary, however, that we should isolate ourselves from mankind to develop our spiritual gifts, we should feel ourselves living now the spirit life in the spiritual universe, we should speak and think now as we would in a supernal state of existence. Theosophy claims that we can cultivate and exercise now all the powers of the spirit, they are within the reach of us all, they are already in our possession. We can have spiritual illumination, vigor of intellect, insight, or clearness of perception. Practice makes perfect, we can develop spiritual muscle, can cultivate the latent spiritual powers within us, now lying dormant. Man can use his sixth sense, can accustom himself to employ it. We are not so diverse as we suppose; we often think if we were constituted like other people we should shine more than they shine. Theosophy teaches us that genius is, after all, only applied energy, a capacity and determination to take possession of our own. We all possess powers within ourselves that characterize the most renowned people who ever stood on the platform of the globe. We need not ask "have I this or that gift," for when our gift is appealed to, it responds, and is used as a means of further development and higher culture. Every one really possesses the gift they wish for, if they did not possess it they would not care for it. The power within the breast struggles for expression, it says: "I have chosen you" (not "you have chosen me"), "I am in you already and want to be used." Our spiritual powers are continually asking to be exercised. This is the real, not fancied, condition of the spirit of man, as we unfold the law of Karma, or sequence.

QUES. — Then you believe in the plurality of existences?

ANS. — Most certainly we do. What is re-embodiment but this — the higher principle having expressed itself imperfectly through the lower principle, allows that lower to fade away and develop, again and again, all forms of expression till at the last development, in the perfected form of expression, the soul shines out in all its glory. The spirit is always in the spirit world, is never embodied into matter. The astral body is nothing more than an appearance, merely a shell or sack ; the spiritual body is as independent of the astral as the astral is of the physical. Our spirit in its essence is good, but needs experience to unfold it, even though born of the eternal soul. The expression of the soul before embodiment is like a seed unplanted. The physical form is its opportunity. Many think the spirit comes to earth merely for expression, but if, after the struggle of one or many existences, the soul was only to be converted into its first state, all the effort of human discipline would be of no avail whatever. Every soul may be as pure in a certain sense, but is not as powerful as God, has not knowledge as God. If our power is finite and His is infinite, and there is infinite difference between an infinite and finite power, then we can understand eternal progression, an unending advancement in power and knowledge. God is the only infinite, powerful Love and Wisdom. It is the eternal good will, the pure beneficence of the Infinite which brings all human beings into existence and endows them with the power and privilege of perpetually drawing nearer to Him, with eternity before them. We can constantly advance one step nearer to the Infinite knowledge and power which is always beyond us. The soul of man is as pure as the soul of God, but capable of infinite advancement in power and knowledge ; we are here on earth to acquire, to unfold, and express both. The effort of the soul thus to develop its power brings the world and the body into existence. When we have developed all that is possible in this present life, when there is no longer need of further embodiment, we advance to a higher plane, we outgrow the love of earth and yearning for it, and we go to live in spirit, no longer to grovel in the dust. As long as we have earthly leanings and attractions they draw us into earthly experiences. The earth is a magnet until we have exhausted the sense drawing, have outgrown and put away all childish things with higher development of understanding. We are drawn here just as long as desire for embodiment lurks within us; we are brought involuntarily into the state which corresponds to our mental condition. When we reach to the perfect state of being, of which eye and ear or heart cannot conceive, we reach the home of the soul, the eternal world, the kingdom of Heaven, the pure Nirvana of bliss. So far as we can travel in our finite thought we have then reached the end of our journey. What further hills there may be to climb, in conditions beyond our present conception, beyond time and sense, we cannot dogmatically declare.

QUES. — Does the soul create its theatre of action?

ANS. — In the Kabala the statement is made that all worlds and forms are brought into existence, not by Ensoph, the supreme principle, but through subordinate deities, the Eloihim. There is only one supreme life, one infinite good. In the one there is the multitude. We have always existed and always shall exist. In the eternal world it is always NOW. Of our individual soul we can say, "I am what I am in being, not existence." Existence is only an external manifestation of Being. The soul is perfectly pure and divine as a direct offshoot from the Eternal Soul. In our highest conception of ourselves we are perfectly pure, but must distinguish between this divine soul and the human spirit. Our idea of the universe is that the soul creates the individual human spirit, the soul is the atom which the physical scientist has never discovered. He discovers the molecule, the monad, which is an aggregation of atoms, but he does not find the atom. The absolute atom itself is entirely beyond the recognition of the bodily senses, can only be apprehended by spirit. This divine ultimate atom, in its endeavor to unfold power and knowledge, creates the spiritual monad (this is the second creation); the divine soul belongs to the Eloihim, being itself the work of God — Ensoph. The human spirit needs an earthly discipline and experience, we must begin at the top of the ladder. Everything begins in spirit, matter is the last outermost vibration of pure spirit. People see on earth as through a telescope whose lenses are inverted, they see where the effect ends instead of seeing the beginning. Jacob's ladder is the embodiment of all life and experience, representing the descent of spirit into matter and rising again to its source. There is no self-existent matter; there is only one atom, one primate, one homeogenous substance, heterogenously expressed. Matter is the lowest expression of this one substance, non-existent in the realm of cause, for in the realm of absolute reality all is spirit. The esoteric doctrine admits matter as an accident of time and sense: it comes between the spirit that is Alpha and the spirit that is Omega. The spiritual soul, the human soul, and the animal soul form a trinity of expression; the Atma within is the origin of everything. The spiritual soul represents itself in intuition, the human soul in reason, the animal in instinct. We have found these three principles in us. Intuition is the moral sense; reason, the intellectual sense; the instinct, the animal perception. We lose the animal perception as we lose hope in certainty, faith in knowledge, the shell in the bird, as we lose the bud when we get the flower, we lose our limitation. Theosophists have placed the human soul, the intellectual principle, between the animal soul which tends to earth and the spiritual soul which soars above; the intellect may aspire to reach higher but is constantly vibrating, falters in its allegiance between the spirit and the animal. It is for the individual to decide whether he will voluntarily unite himself with the spiritual universe, or remain susceptible to lower conditions which must result in moral suicide and death. The true point of Christian living is to decide the question: "will we live in the flesh or in the spirit?" Here comes all the allegory of the temptation and fall of man. If we had not been in the lower state we could not reach the higher. Intellectual culture alone is not the best for mankind, for many intellectual people give themselves over to vices. The spiritual soul, the intuition, like a good genius, is ever urging us onward and upward, our evil genius is ever leading us downward toward the animal plane. The fourth principle must be the servant of the fifth and sixth, otherwise comes chaos and discord. This subordination of the higher to the lower is the old question of good and evil, the glory and the shadow, the foreground and background of existence, but the light reigns forever, the shadow does its work and is then absorbed. In the truth of re-embodiment the punishment idea is both true and false. Expiation enters largely into Allan Kardec's theory; we do not mean retaliation, but unfoldment, education, expansion. We must first understand what we are, before we can understand our mission, and why we are embodied at all, before we can understand our relation either to the eternity of the past, or to that of the future. Man is a perfect unit, but a trinity in unity, the outer triangle representing the physical, the astral, and the spiritual, while within shines the central sun, the Atma, the Ego, one individual principle, forever and ever the child of God.

QUES. — Do the varying degrees of unfoldment account for the differences in people?

ANS. — If the divine soul in man is the child of God, then it never varies in its goodness and holiness. The soul of man being infinite in purity, it is only while here on earth that we do not live in this divine principle. All that we recognize of ourselves ordinarily is very much less than ourselves, we have never made a full discovery of what we are, or of our own powers. Sons of men have to come to know that they are sons of God. Some have come to a better understanding of this divine truth than others. As we have been speaking on the previous embodiment of the spirit, we endeavor to show that in harmony with God's perfect law of justice there can be no respecter of persons. The Buddhist doctrine of Karma is simply the Oriental mode of representing divine justice impartially, its entire philosophy being a vindication of divine justice and application of the law of spiritual involution, and physical evolution, in individual cases; the doctrine of evolution must teach a false doctrine if not interpreted spiritually. How often we hear of a man's being superlatively gifted, when, in reality, his gifts are only those powers acquired in a previous expression of the soul, as others are now acquiring them. There is no other way of explaining the difference between people but by this law of Karma, or sequence. If we all had equal knowledge of the truth, all would be perfectly well; if we knew the right and did the right, we should be entirely free from pain and anguish, but do we all have equal opportunities of knowing the truth? Are there not multitudes of people on earth to-day, who have no opportunity of getting this knowledge? The reason is found in this law of Karma, which the Theosophical doctrine explains. It is our Karma that makes our opportunities. In the use we make of them we utilize, or in the non-use we fail to utilize our Karma. I may have the opportunity to learn certain things; I have a friend so situated that they are never put within his reach, because his Karma did not give him this opportunity. Two persons may advertise for a position, one obtains it, another does not. Thus does our Karma operate in daily life. Some persons have power, others have not, but remember we are not stagnant, we are making Karma all along. Our past has made our present, and our present makes our future — a succession of heritages. It is only one life after all, divided into many sub-divisions, and although our present is the result of our past, still our next minute is the result of this minute, in which we are manufacturing Karma. We are creatures of past Karma, so far as opportunity goes, up to this moment, then creatures of the Karma we are making now; so our present endeavor is by no means valueless. Whatever gifts we possess, whatever favorable advancement is now ours, it is something we have learned in the past, we have laid up treasure which is now ours. Everything rests with the individual. The doctrine of Karma is most encouraging, hopeful, inspiring, and not the most fatalistic, as so many people have understood it to be. What is our fate? Not something which is arbitrarily imposed upon us, for our fate up to this time is the result of everything gone before up to this minute; whether we remember making it or not, it is our own manufacture. Our fate is our limitation. We rise beyond this fate when we begin to work. The spirit in its first embodiment has no fate, in completing all expressions ends without fate. When we have conquered fate we are the controllers, not the creatures, of circumstances.

QUES. — Is it our Karma that brings us good luck?

ANS. — Some people are called lucky — the darlings of fortune — while others are unlucky, but the theory that it is God's will that some should have all the blessings and others only hardships is altogether erroneous. In regard to our failures where we desire to win, or of events occurring which we do not like, we must feel we are not yet grown to the condition where we can attract, or be benefited by what we desire, but the very fact of our undergoing this trial is a preparation to the state where we shall receive what we crave. There is some good and adequate reason why we have not succeeded hitherto, but past failure is no evidence of future misfortune. That failure has done something for us, it has been a development, we are not the same person who failed, and there is no reason why we should not succeed in the future. It is necessary we should have had this experience as part of our birth. Bunyan, in prison, watched a spider fail in spinning his web six times, and succeed on the seventh; the six failures made the success possible. The spider was the embodied illustration of the principle of our growth; it had not gained the experience and strength after the fifth attempt that it acquired after the sixth; the spider had then developed the condition that brought about the success. Thus in all our lives and endeavors we win the golden medal after humiliation and defeat. The doctrine of success embodies the supposition that some people have grown beyond the state of others; all will have the same to conquer, but at the present moment all are not equally far advanced. We should take all humiliations of our experience as part of our education. There is no luck, or fortune, merely one path for all — the path of growth. Through the line of growth runs the ladder of effect. Whatever comes is the result of our position on the ladder, and our position on the ladder is the result of all steps taken hitherto. The law of Karma urges us never to suppose we shall not succeed, never look forward with forebodings as if doomed to failure. Go hopefully onward to such opportunities as are born of past accomplishment. Without prophetic power we can see the growth of the previous state in the condition of the present. If we can bear fame and riches without haughtiness, or use a high position well, we will not need to sweep crossings in a future embodiment. The good ruler does not return as a slave; despots must necessarily acquire the knowledge of service, learn the blessedness of ministration in the lowest position. Whatever good one has earned one holds forever and goes on to higher states. As everything is the direct effect of some past cause, every one can feel, "I have only to make the effort to succeed, I have all assurance of ultimate success, I have been through expressions others may not have experienced." It is so with the globe and the race, for the globe is man on a large scale. The globe undergoes what man undergoes in his final conflict over all material things, the growing out of a previous imperfect existence and preparing for a higher one. We do not look reprovingly on the past, but acknowledge the great apparent fulness of design and great unity of purpose. Instead of the world's being destroyed, the world will become advanced. The spirit that has operated upon it withdraws from it, then it is again brought forward by other minds until they also recede from it. These are the days and nights of Brahm which will succeed each other, not for the same individuals, but for those who came before you and for the countless hosts who will come after you. Not for the individual is there ever a going back. The world is always a school, with days of action and nights of sleep, but the nature that once graduates never goes back again into the infant school as a learner, it steadily progresses until it reaches Nirvana, the highest state conceivable. We shall have to become Karma-less, outgrow our destiny, or fate, and rise above everything we call accident. Our life here is a qualification for a higher life, this life is the chrysalis, the next state that of the butterfly. The poet says: "here in the body pent." This is our limitation, but the butterfly dies as well as the chrysalis; all resurrections die again, naturally speaking. The soul however belongs to eternity; divine love is forever and forever the same.

QUES. — Does the law of Karma make no provision for the forgiveness of sin?

ANS. — The doctrine of Karma is founded on the eternal principle of justice, beneath which there can only be abiding rock. The essential proof of the value of any theory is that it harmonizes with divine justice. Having a sense of justice in ourselves, we know that whatever is just must be true, and whatever is unjust cannot be true. Justice is the universal solvent, the interpretation of all the parables of existence. Is Karma just, or not? It is said: "to err is human, to forgive divine." We are told that Karma makes no place for forgiveness. Now why is it not divine to forgive? Can your highest idea of God be of one who forgets and forgives? Can we believe him capable of anger, wrath, or resentment? So long as the idea of God was semi-barbaric, just so long was the Divine Being endowed with human limitations. God is, after all, only human if He forgives and not human in the highest sense. Forgiveness implies an alteration in the mind of the one who forgives. God can never change His state, for He is never less than perfect; He never changes His attitude toward His children, though they may change their attitude toward Him. God is never angry though He may look so to us when we have anger in our hearts. What a lesson for humanity is the "neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." It is true that Jesus, when on the cross, said: "Father, forgive them," not as an example, or to tell God what to do, but in tender pity for man's imperfect needs, to teach him forgiveness. It is our duty to forgive because we are imperfect. God is perfect, never gets angry with any one, and therefore has nothing to forgive, He is never anything but Infinite Love. It is carnally human to err, it is humanly divine to forgive. It was once thought that in the thunderclap God revealed His anger, the lightning flash was interpreted as the fury of imperial Jove, when storms are only the footprints of Divine Love. We see only infinite love and wisdom in everything; all is good even if incomprehensible. All of God's acts are based on infinite goodness, and ours are not. Theosophy gives us the idea of God in its highest conception, which is not that of a changeable Deity. Now if God and Law and Nature are one, and Law is the law of the Divine Mind, the law is the expression of God and we thus get rid of God's rival, or adversary, get rid of everything but God, we reach a pure theism.

God is the Eternal Cause, present in the effect; the effect partakes of the nature of the cause. What then is this inexorable, immutable law, but the unvarying manifestation of Divine Benevolence?

QUES. — Does the operation of Karma bring us our bereavements?

ANS. — There is no bereavement except to sense. So long as we place our affections on the plane of sense, we need the discipline of losing their object. Every experience is a stepping-stone to a higher condition. Our happiness does not consist in external things, but in peace of mind. A bereaved mother might have a love so pure and unselfish for the child that was taken from her, a love so full of comprehension of God's will, and what was really best for her child, knowing that she was forever ensphered in the real child presence, that there would be no loss or bereavement. She would be just as conscious of the spirit world as of this, and more absolutely certain the child was with her and loving her. The animal soul in us continually wars against the spirit; the lower elements, which occasion all our personal grief, have to be overcome. Christian Science tells us death is a belief, but who has the belief? Not the one who dies, but you who pass through the belief of death. Your child, who is supposed to have died, has not passed through the belief of death at all. If he could speak to you he would say, "I am alive, I am conscious, and with you just the same;" he would persist in being alive, the belief in death is on your side, he knows he has not died. How can he believe in death, how can God know anything of death when all live unto Him, how can He sympathize with your loss when there is no loss? God sees everything in its true light, how can He sympathize with that which has never occurred? We fancy it, but that is our error, our limitation, and we continually ask God to recognize it. If God is infinitely true, how can He recognize what has no reality, what never took place and never can take place? If we knew the why and wherefore of all our experience, if we could take the point of view in all its broad sweep that a celestial visitant would take, we should see that all is good, we should know that evil is good in disguise, and would say with Job: "shall we not receive from the hand of God what seemeth evil?" We only give two names to the dispensation of divine purpose. That which we call good at one time might be evil at another. At the highest point of our development all is good, there is no evil. There is nothing more to grumble about, all things are for the best. When we arrive at this point, it will blot out from our vision the idea that there is any need of tears, or pangs, in our development. The eternal purpose is fulfilled in everything from the greatest to the least. There must come this period in our development when we shall know that whatever we have undergone is the plan of divine unfoldment, as the flower is the outgrowth of the perfect plant, foreseen when the seed is planted. The flower is there in the seed. Externally speaking, the seed comes before the flower and slowly develops into the flower; in the spiritual idea the flower is there in perfection already. The external world is to be the portrait of the thought of the Divine Artist — the photograph of the spiritual idea. In the present condition of the world, the photograph is not finished. Ideas are sitting for their portrait; when all these ideas are perfected the millennium will have come, the period of the finishing of the picture, when ideas that have existed in the mind of God shall be reflected in the mind of man and his surroundings. When we have God's idea perfectly reflected in us we shall know what it really is to be perfectly contented and happy, to know no care or annoyance. We hear geologists say that the earth struggles by its convulsions to settle itself. The earth is still young, these are the signs of its imperfections, by which it is paving the way for a more perfect condition; by means of cyclone and earthquake, all which is best fitted to survive passes from juvenility to a higher state. While the world refines about us, there is a correspondence found in the refinement of man, there is a reciprocal action between earth and man, so may we not say that physical and spiritual science teach us the same thing? When all mysterious prophecies are interpreted in the light of science and experience, when spiritual illumination gilds the page, we find that not only everything will turn out right, but everything is right now, we feel that we have lost all evil, and everything that has occasioned our sorrow, humiliation, or pain. If we could only feel that any calamity was the best thing that could possibly occur, it would cease to be a calamity any longer. There is always an under-current of thought that submission is not noble, that the world would have been better without the storm, that if something could have averted the earthquake what a blessing it would have been, when it was a necessity in the evolution of the earth, it was harmful only from a superficial point of view. If those who suffered from it could have understood this, they would have been sufferers no longer in mind, have felt no anguish in spirit, as if deserted by the divine power. The pessimist thinks all these things are occasioned through blind force, without intelligence or mercy. Does not this feeling cause much of the misery there is in the world? If our house is burnt down, should we not say, "well, this is one of the experiences that we must go through in our development, it must result in some good, there was a divine purpose in the fire." Even if it leave us paupers it was a necessity, without which we should have lost a part of our education, and thus we can maintain an active, cheerful spirit in our poverty. If we could realize that everything which occurs is really for the best, we should be able to meet all the difficulties in our way and not let them crush us to the earth; we would not feel down-trodden and overwhelmed as the sport and plaything of some blind force. How could we henceforth suffer? Humiliation for us is forever past. The point to be reached is to be unaffected by external things. Gaining this point, we have then completed our journey as far as this planet is concerned. However the result may be obtained, in this result we have the completion of this life's discipline. The question for each individual is, how much result have I, and that result is superiority to whatever is capable of making us unhappy, or ashamed.

QUES. — Can we exhaust all past bad Karma in one life-time?

ANS. — Our Karma is that whereof our thoughts, words, or deeds are borne in effect. We have been making Karma through a life of thirty or forty years perhaps, and have in it the concentrated result of all the actions and thoughts of that life. Now the question arises, can we change all those conditions in the remaining years of our earthly life, can we see a light ahead strong enough to obliterate all past Karma? Yes, if we make a very hard struggle indeed, we can, but, if we go on in a dilettant fashion, we cannot enter the future world in a state of perfect happiness, Remember, however, that what is perfectly true of the future world is not true of the eternal world. They are not identical, the forever which you call forever is not eternity. In this law of Karma, the sequence of human involution, the steady and certain development of individual merit, we get rid of that infernal doctrine of everlasting punishment, founded on the Greek adjective which means long-enduring; sulphur and brimstone being only symbols of purification. Karma makes of this life, a probation. Where churches have made a mistake is to limit probation to one life-time, to regard as eternity the period which follows one life, and antedates another. It is utterly impossible that a just God should make an eternity depend on our acts in this one life, but a temporary probation follows on a temporary life. With eternity we have nothing to do, but with the spirit life which immediately follows this life, which we must prepare for, here and now. Our whole future career depends on the use we make of this school, the duties that come to us in this world have to be done here or nowhere, a theory that endows this life with importance, makes this world an important world, gives us zest and energy to live well now, by which we shall gain temporal reward for temporal good, and temporal punishment for temporal error. Eternal reward for temporal good would be unjust. When a beautiful soul goes into the spiritual world bright, pure, and happy, it has nothing to outgrow, it goes on learning, if it has developed the power to learn spiritually in this world. If that particular talent has not been improved here it will be taken away ("even that which he hath"), not lost in the sense of annihilation, but held till the next embodiment, when the spirit shall again have the talent to use. But we cannot be happy, here or there, until we have destroyed all evil Karma, that which brings us suffering and distress. The way of its destruction is to do the very good that counteracts the evil. All can judge of their progress by noting the development of perfect charity; when we have conquered some particular vice there is proof of it when we ignore vice in others. All the good you think is so much material to build up the spirit; all your bad thoughts, or deeds, have just the same kind of effect on your spirit that bad air, or tainted food, has on your body. The question is, have you eaten enough good food to more than counterbalance the bad, otherwise there is no advance, no progress; you may build up with one hand but you pull down with the other, your whole life being an oscillation, or a see-sawing, you neither retrogade, nor advance; if you speak kind words you step forward, when you are unkind, you go backward, although if in going back you have learned something, then there is progression through retrogression. Good Karma in its effect lives forever, bad Karma only for the single state, it relates only to time, it makes us suffer and we get our advance through it. The law of Karma points as a discipline for our good, everything that comes, takes from us all repining over any grief, care, or misery which we know we have brought upon ourselves. We suffer only when we see no reason below it. The idea of Karma teaches that what befalls us now is the consequence of what we have done already. We reap our past and create our future; whatever we do, say, or think makes Karma. The study of Karma is a most practical one, for, as we can destroy evil Karma by creating good, the creation of good Karma is the work of to-day. Make the very best of past consequences, convert the failure and folly of the past into pure gold of higher thought for future days. There is no arbitrary allotted time through which we must look for such result. There is a work for us to do, when we have done it we receive the consequences of that work, independent of time.

QUES. — Should we not eliminate from our effort all anxiety as to the result?

ANS. — The reward is always given to work and not to anxiety. If we worry we are almost certain to turn the scales against ourselves. Right must prevail because it is right; truth conquers because it is truth. In a calm state of mind we have the ability to do what we could not otherwise do, or see how to do. All worry disqualifies us for work, disables us for individual, intelligent action. When we feel our success to be uncertain we fail, when we do not worry we have a light, the light of intuition for our guidance. We are too prone to pray the prayer of doubt and uncertainty. There is a higher principle in our nature. Intuition is an infallible judge, and we cannot know anything about intuition until the higher principle is developed. The highest degree of advancement is through self-forgetfulness. If we become indifferent concerning ourselves, we rise to consider the welfare of the race. When we are in our spiritual infancy we may be cold, haughty, imperious, proving we have never grown superior to the tempter; when grown, self is superseded, Jesus, as the incarnation of Truth, as the Light of the world, was perfectly in harmony with divine law. Both Jesus and Buddha were ripe fruits of the tree of life where others are simply green. If we are sour and acid now, remember Jesus and Buddha gathered also from the tree of earthly discipline. We see in those matchless lives the perfection of the wearisome stages we are now passing through. Jesus, "perfected through suffering," ascended to his glory, but he first went through with these very experiences, the utility of which we are prone to discard, before he became identified with all perfection. The very sufferings we most object to, as hardest to bear, are part and parcel of that which works out the perfection. One of the most bitter of Jesus' experiences was the infidelity of his friends, the betrayal of Judas, which he did not deserve, but, through the alchemy of the universal plan, it proved the very means by which he was perfected. In being faithful under trial you are creating good Karma, without which you would not have had such opportunity. Every time you meet with trial or annoyance you have chance to make good Karma; it will be a loss to you if you do not take advantage of it. In this sum of our existence, the many links of the one chain, we receive whatever that which we have done qualifies us for. There are scratches left on our spiritual nature by everything that we have said, or done. The law of Karma is the law of consequence.

QUES. — What do you understand by Devachan?

ANS. — Simply the night between two days, the Sabbath between two periods of activity. Devachan, the Buddhist paradise, solves one of the problems of the human mind. It is natural, perhaps, that many should look forward to a state of perfect happiness and rest, but the period is capable of an entirely better explanation. No one could greatly anticipate the enjoyment of going to bed and never getting out again to activity. The theory of sleeping in the grave is a corruption of the ancient idea of Devachan, a state where work will be perfect rest, and perfect rest will be work. The spirit has its period of repose, of satisfaction, before waking up into more active consciousness in another state of being, but there is no state of idleness. Perpetual motion is the law of every created existence. Rest does not mean idleness, or stagnation, but a putting aside the mental energies for a vacation holiday. The spirit no longer has its occupation on earth, the material world, the outward activities of life are no longer necessary. In Devachan, or the spirit world, we shall remain until we have exhausted the Karma made during our earthly life, and we begin our next existence in the condition we are in through the exhaustion of that Karma. The spirit world is for us the fruitage of the life we are now living, we have just as much to reap there as we have sown here, then we begin afresh in a new embodiment, but we cannot therein be wise and noble, and of very great use and beneficence to the world, if we have hitherto sown evil seed. The consequence runs from one life to another and then works itself out. God cannot forgive because we outgrow past errors. When we have outgrown the evil, when we are all good, we become Karma-less. The tree of life is at last the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the tree of our discipline on which our Karma grows; they grow together, the reward and the penalty. The simple fact that we can have our feelings hurt shows we are not perfect. Everything that comes to us must redound for our good, it cannot possibly do anything else. If some of us had fewer difficulties and trials, then we would have fewer opportunities for progress, and why should we not say: "does God give more opportunities for unfoldment to others than to me?" Therefore count it all joy when ye fall into temptation; it is only some old principle in our nature not overcome. The animal soul is the tempter, the only devil there is; something in us wants something, which something else in us does not want. In resisting the tempter we develop our strength and character. No one is ever great who has not made the effort to become great, either in this or in some past embodiment. All past experience is locked up in the mind but we are not always aware of it, we have more accumulation of experience than we know anything about, we do not express on earth more than we now need. Wendell Phillips was, naturally, a man of great capacity, but he never would have so distinguished himself had not the great need of the age made such demand upon his oratory. He would always have been a graceful platform orator, but not the great and thrilling speaker he was in the days when the anti-slavery conflict was at its height. The great cause appealed to the latent greatness within him. We are not all equally imbued with power, because only a few, in past experience, have gone through such discipline as has stored within the latent capacity. In the next embodiment you do not begin where you left off in the last life but where you end in the spiritual world, higher in the scale of human development. If living impurely now it will leave you in a condition of exhaustion, you have a small chance to progress, but will have to work for it, you will struggle with tremendous odds but may win a great deal. No condition is hopeless, no child was ever born for punishment. This world is not a hell, it is simply a school where we have the opportunity to learn, and no fate hangs over any head that ordains a failure, though some have to struggle very hard to make it a success. The doctrine of Karma teaches hope, it does not encourage reconciliation to the inevitable because nothing is inevitable, we all have opportunity to make good Karma and secure a happy life in the next embodiment. If you succeed in developing character here you send the spirit out into the spirit world, or Devachan, bright and beautiful to prepare for the next embodiment. A martyr's crown shines always brightest in the life beyond. For such lives there is compensation whose glory no words can portray.

QUES. — Then our heaven is always what we make it?

ANS. — Whatever is your idea of heaven you will have. Leave everything to the working out of eternal purpose and natural law. Every one, according to his effort, deserves the very best. We have all conceived of perfect happiness, but some of us are capable of enjoying far more than others, it would take more to satisfy one than it would another, but if our life is faithful we shall reach all the happiness we can attain. Some can apprehend beauty in music and art that common people know nothing about, can drink more inspiration from a landscape than they can describe. This difference in people is so great, that, if you could measure the actual amount of their enjoyment, one person would be in capacity like a pipe-butt, the other a gallon vessel. The Indian of the North American prairies has no higher idea of the future state than of the happy hunting ground, his sole ambition to reach that desired goal, which might not, with your higher development, satisfy you, but the Indian would exclaim, "Great Spirit so good to give me all I want;" he could not enjoy anything more. If you have lived a higher life, you might imagine, or picture, a beautiful city, with scenery of gorgeous description, where treasures of intellect are outpoured. You can go and receive your happiness in the ideal world which you have pictured. The man in his study is no happier with his books than the child in the nursery with his toys; the child has to grow into the stature of the man before he can enjoy the books. We go on multiplying our opportunities and possibilities, we labor and strive for the highest growth, awaking from surrender at death to all the glories we can conceive. There is an absolutely perfect reward for an absolutely perfect, brave, industrious life. The more advanced the soul, the higher the possibilities for enjoyment.

QUES. — How can we meet our friends in heaven if they have re-embodied?

ANS. — There is a very, very long period of time between embodiments, these interregnums between embodiments being referred to in the New Testament as ages, as the world coming to an end, a new heaven and a new earth, and similar expressions, but do not fear that, if your friends are re-embodied, you will not meet them in spirit when you go to the spirit world. You do not realize the life you are now living. This is the reason you cannot get along without sleep. This world is not man's native element, we are at times obliged to retire from it; this life is a workshop from which we need a temporary retreat, we have to go into our natural element to find our rest beyond the realm of dreams. From unbroken slumbers we awake built up afresh, strong, and full of peace. In the realm of spirit, our spirit has dwelt with a higher fellowship, we come back with happier aspirations, the results of renewal in spiritual states of life. We are like amphibious animals that live in two elements. We come up out of the material element of this life into the ocean of spirit. We could not be prepared for our work on the dry land, if we did not occasionally slip off into the water. We must realize that we should know each other, not only after the flesh but after the spirit. When we go into a higher state of being we shall not know or care what external form our friends may wear, since the form does not contain the spirit. The earthly embodiment is the garment it wears now, the external projection of the spirit element, but the substance must not be confounded with the shadow it casts. We always were, we always are in the spirit realm, now and forever, we must know each other in spirit if we would know and understand what, in spirit, we really are. The soul lives its own life individually in the spirit world, independent of external expression. When people speak of their desire to meet their friends in the life beyond the grave they fail to realize in what spirit union really consists. We should very soon grow tired of the outer personalities. Nothing external could forever satisfy us. We live forever in the life immortal.

Ques. — Do Theosophists admit communion with the spirit world?

Ans. — There is a decided misapprehension as to what Theosophists really teach on the point of spiritual communion. Theosophy abhors so-called business mediumship, in the ordinary sense, or communion with the spirit world for mundane advantage. It holds that mere passive mediumship ought to be superseded by individual spiritual illumination, which is very different from automatic mediumship. Mediumistic power is not necessarily associated with intellectual vigor or moral excellence, it is often nothing more than mesmeric sensitiveness, the medium serving as a weather vane to register the condition of the passing hour, living in the animal soul with no conception of God, or Spirit, at all. We have to advance a degree higher and cultivate the spiritual soul. If we cultivate our spiritual nature we cannot help seeing the spirit world, cannot help getting spiritual revelation. When we try to drag a spirit down to a money-making business, or to gratify curiosity, the knowledge of communion with the spirit world is detrimental to both sides of the house, for the spirit is hindered in its progression and is therefore deprived of the rights of a human being. Theosophy tells Spiritualists to go higher, and the best writers on Spiritualism teach the same thing. We must make an effort to cultivate and spiritualize ourselves, instead of bringing the spirit world down to this and materializing it. While our own spiritual development remains on a sensuous, phenomenal plane we are subject to astrals of every description. We do not want to be materialists with another name. The more the spirit is delivered from earthly affections and interest in earthly affairs and dreams of sense, the more the spirit is satisfied with living in a spiritual state and holding communion, through affinity, with our higher spiritual principle rather than through expression in spirit phenomena. I know a widow who has no desire for material communication, for, she says, "whenever I enjoy an unbroken night's sleep I feel myself going out into the boundless realm of the spirit world, though I cannot remember that superior state in mortal consciousness, but I feel on waking that I have only just come from my husband and children, I often hear myself saying, 'good-by, I shall be back again very soon.'" This is true spirit communion which allows of no deception, no intermission, nothing to break the reunion with any number of embodiments. Theosophy is only a higher phase of Spiritualism, there is no contradiction, no discrepancy between them. When you see a little of Theosophy it looks hostile to Spiritualism, when you study it more thoroughly they both unite. Spiritualism should mean that we commune with the spirit world through the unfoldment of our spiritual nature. The ordinary idea of mediums is that for all information, for all they see, say, or do, they are dependent on other intelligences. Theosophy claims that we are to develop independent clairvoyance, and psychometric powers. We do not want another spirit to show us the spiritual world, we can use our astral eyes and see in the astral light if we develop our sixth principle. We endorse mediumistic power as supplementary, not as substitutionary; rightly understood, it means voluntary spiritual co-operation, not arbitrary coercive control. Mediums should live what they teach. True Theosophy acknowledges we can get from the spirit world what we can get in no other way, but we must depend on ourselves also. We are living to-day as astral beings in an astral world; while with our physical eyes we behold nature, with our astral eyes we are able to look on the spiritual condition of the universe. The astral interpenetrates the physical. If we see a dog's footprint on the floor, it would not be necessary to see a dog enter or leave the room to decide that a dog had been there; by seeing a human footprint you could judge how large was the person who made it. So in the astral atmosphere every thought-condition makes an impression, our thoughts and desires all leave footprints on the astral sand. An astral seer can see these thoughts and impressions as you with physical eyes can see footprints across the snow. An individual who is clairvoyant is merely one who can look out on the astral atmosphere and see its conditions and reflections. All material things are due to astral vibrations, these in turn are due to spiritual vibrations, and that is force and life, per se. As in a descending chromatic scale, we can come down from soul itself to spirit, from spirit to astral, from astral to material, the astral being the intermediary between the spiritual and the physical. Both Spiritualists and Theosophists have grasped the fact that the disembodied can commune with man and produce all kinds of spiritual and psychic phenomena. The occultist can command a table to move and it will move by his will power. People often attribute certain wonderful powers and wisdom to spirits, which they possess themselves. We want to know what psychical powers are embodied in us, we must not imagine that death is going to give them to us, neither will it deprive us of them. The odic force in the universe, which we must discover and understand, is not unknowable. People have not demonstrated all the powers which they themselves possess that can produce these phenomena. There is a great difference between the illumination of the adept and the passivity of the medium; the latter is the lower condition. If, through this passivity, we receive spiritual tidings, the message cannot be verified, we have to take another's word for it, the words may be beautiful and helpful, if not true they ought to be, but farther than this we cannot go. If we develop our own powers there can be no doubt, because, while still in the body, we look into and go into the spirit world. If we could only understand the excursions we make every night, and remember our nocturnal rambles, for every time we go sound asleep we go to our spirit home, we travel in our astral body, here and there, and one who has developed the higher principle can consciously pass the natural barrier and go at will, into the spirit world. We must get into the position of spiritual receptivity, then we should hear from our spirit friends as we now do from one another, we should see them as plainly, the tidings no longer hypothetical, because we have taken a higher step, adding to our belief, faith, to our faith, spiritual knowledge.

QUES. — What is your opinion of spiritualistic phenomena?

ANS. — The phenomena, if genuine, are for the most part unsatisfactory and ambiguous. Human conditions are such that the astral light in which the clairvoyant sees is so tossed and perturbed that they cannot see things clearly, and get only a confused conglomeration of varied shapes. Societies for spiritual culture and unfoldment of psychic powers should be formed in private homes. A large percentage of the entire human family can develop such psychic power to a wonderful degree. Let every one allow their spiritual nature full scope, put away prejudice and misconception, and allow the soul to declare itself. We do not repudiate mediumistic phenomena, but would develop them to the plane of a higher class of intelligences. The astral world is full of cemeteries as this is, for in the astral world, as the spirit passes on into a higher life, the astral body is left behind in the astral atmosphere, as the physical body is left behind in this sphere, and the astral body gradually disintegrates, dying slowly as the higher principle advances from it. Our physical vital fluid emanates from the astral body; it is the astral body that suffers in amputation, the spiritual body is intact. Our higher spiritual principle is in the spirit world to-day. Phenomena is only valuable as demonstrative of principle. Theosophical science is a method of bringing people into higher relation with the spiritual forces in the universe that exist within ourselves and all around us. The proper study of mankind is man. Theosophy really aims at the elevation of man to a spiritual plane.

QUES. — What are elemental spirits?

ANS. — All elements are peopled with elemental spirits, there is nothing without its spirit. There is no fire without the presiding salimandi, no water without its undine, no earth without gnomes, or air without sylphs. Now man has these four orders of elemental spirits within himself. The salimandi correspond to his affections, the undines to his reason, the sylphs control his imagination, and the gnomes his animal passions or material power. If men gratify their lower instincts they attract these lower powers, and here lies the philosophy of ghosts and material attractions. The miser has united himself with the spirits of earth, for by the worship of gold in thought, or perpetual striving for wealth, we come under the dominion of those elements on the plane invoked. If we live on the ordinary animal plane, we cannot absorb or respond to spiritual truth. What do you know of life that keep the spiritual in the background, the physical in the ascendant? When you pass out of the physical form you are entirely out of your sphere, and find yourself in one you are not prepared to enter. Theosophy points out two paths, as Jesus also taught the broad way and many entering upon it, the narrow way and few going in thereat. Jesus was, undoubtedly, a Theosophist. Between the ages of twelve and thirty, he travelled extensively, visiting in Egypt, Persia, and India, the most powerful lodges on earth, becoming one of the greatest and most glorious teachers. Christians accept Jesus and reject Buddha, when no comparison can be attempted between the two religions, because they teach exactly the same thing. If any person has an idea he would like to become a Buddhist, he makes a great mistake, because the religions are alike in all essential respects. One great importance of the Oriental aspect of Theosophy is that it breaks down the wall of prejudice existing between the East and the West. Christianity has held the thought that the poor East would have no gospel unless the West carried it there, so the East has turned round and brought you its truth. The East is more privileged than the West, for, during several thousands of years, the East has represented the highest development of civilization. In the ensuing epochs the West will be the great center of spiritual activity. Theosophy is not an exotic here that belongs to another clime, but an indigenous plant, religion being the same in every age, but we are dependent on the East to teach us, in the way that children are dependent on those already educated, but every one is prepared to become a teacher in his turn, when competent. If the Mahatmas, chelas, and other mystics are our instructors in occult wisdom they have no prerogative that others do not possess, only to help others to become educated like themselves, to prepare pupils to handle these mysteries and use this occult power aright, but only a few go in at this narrow gate, while many enter the ordinary gate of fashion. There is no reason why you should not find out all mysteries for yourselves, the only hindrance thereto being that it requires a kind of life many do not wish to live. They would not take so much time and trouble, or make so many sacrifices to attain this spiritual good, as did Kepler, Copernicus, or Galileo, to demonstrate any problem of nature, and yet they would not live an unhappy life in the acquisition of divine wisdom. The Light that ever shines shows all the ways of wisdom to be ways of pleasantness and all her paths of peace. Whatever you have to give up is that which is really not worth having; the pleasures of earth are counterfeit, the gold that glitters mere tinsel. Its acquisition is the outcome of human selfishness which is a vice. Self-culture can be consecrated to the highest ends. Subordinate all love of self to love of neighbor and of God. Work for the sake of Truth and for humanity.

QUES. — How do the pure in heart see God?

ANS. — "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God," said the Master, this sight of God meaning spiritual perception, or the discovery of the Divine Existence. Man is as invisible as God is, in whose image and likeness he is made; the true man is the invisible man. What is God? There must, necessarily, be a great deal of mystery concerning the Divine Indwelling Presence. All we know about God is in the higher realms of life, it is the higher consciousness that realizes there is an Infinite Good Being that controls and rules over all. Supposing every one who doubted concerning the existence of God could enter into that state of mind in which he was absolutely certain that everything was for the best, without a ripple of doubt passing through his mind, would he not be in a condition to actually see God with the eye of the soul, as an all-satisfying, all-consolatory reality, feeling sure everything was in the hand of infinite love and goodness, all vessels worked into port, piloted by a perfectly skillful and loving commander? If this trust were perfect, how the mind would rest in it, and be free from misery of every kind. The soul would find realization of God. Reason, in a higher state of existence, develops as it never does here, it sees above and below as never before. Our horizon widens and our reason confirms and comprehends what our intuition previously apprehended. When we find God in ourselves we shall be satisfied in His reflection in our own being; when we find ourselves in Him then we shall be at peace because realizing our close relation to Deity. When we have positively found the soul, we find God, knowledge of a soul coming from the spiritual influx, of a power within us. There is more proof of the soul's immortality than there is proof on the side of any demonstrated science.

Ques. — Will not Theosophical truth have a unitizing influence on the nations of the earth?

Ans. — Theosophy meets one great need of the world to-day, that all nations should recognize their brotherhood, which unfortunately they do not; they still follow in the track of ancient barbarians and look upon those, from whom they are separated by natural barriers, as foreigners, outside the order of soul and democracy of spirit, and thus the peace of the world and the unity of humanity is delayed. Nations contend with one another for territory or worldly possessions, for intellectual ideas and divers theologies, but avowedly spiritual struggles are not confined to the inhabitants alone, for, as Paul says, "we do not war with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers," with unseen hosts. Christianity has far outgrown the recognition of a variety of spiritual influences continuously attending individuals and nations, according to all old theories that every one has his attending influences, his household lares and penates; not only so, but every form in nature had its representative in the unseen world, and every nation had its peculiar divinity. Jehovah was not the God of the world, but the God of Israel, as Zeus was the God of the Greeks, and Jupiter of the Romans; all early nations had their own spiritual hierarch devoted to their cause, and the people sacrificed oblations in their sanctuaries that this unseen power might fight their battles, their idea being of gods many and lords many. Therefore all earth religions were in a sense a form of Spiritualism, and with the recognition of spirits around them, higher or lower, to serve or to bless, there was also the conception of the Infinite in-dwelling and over-ruling Spirit, who most of all found His abiding place in the hearts and minds of humanity. While the Aryan race made much of spiritual communion, the peculiar trait of all Semitic people was the turning to the still small Voice of God that controlled them more than all the guiding spirits. The Assyrian religion blended both Aryan and Semitic characteristics, recognizing individual spiritual communion that attracted the interior recognition of the God of the soul, this dualism in religion producing the thought we find to-day, and the conception of God as purely authoritative. If any one in true Theosophy seeks for divine wisdom, he must arrive at the conclusion that all the nations of the earth have reached on the relation of God indwelling in humanity. There can be no prosperity till all nations outgrow their differences in one common harmony. Theosophy is a moral, ethical movement; as soon as we feel that we are one in spirit, we shall speak of one another as brothers, and feel in the department of soul as really one, we shall not then behave as if we were not all children of God. Ethical culture and moral reform must build the structure of universal freedom.

QUES. — What is mortal and immortal mind?

Ans. — The animal impulse, or animal soul, is the mortal mind. We cannot imagine a sensuous person to be very intellectual, or, if so, he is not intellectual in consequence of animality, but in spite of it. The animal impulse does not naturally seek expression in literature or art. The fifth and sixth principles however do harmonize. A person can, at one and the same time, have moral and intellectual nobility, or be equally engaged in benevoleuce, literature, and art, a dual expression of the soul, the human spirit manifesting itself as love and wisdom. The majority have only developed their fifth principle; if they have no conception of the seventh, and only a glimmering consciousness of the sixth, they have not the understanding of the Truth, they may have creed, belief, or theory, yet all the ideas and opinions, when compared with knowledge, are as twilight to sunshine, they may be pure and ennobling but are not demonstrable. When the sixth principle is developed, through which the seventh can shine, we shall have no need that one shall teach us, we receive unction from the Holy One. What is our true immortal mind? Our rational, intellectual principle, that vigor of mind which enables us to solve the great problems of life. The true Christ, as the true Buddha, is one equally developed in his intellectual and moral nature, the highest intellect and purest morality are jointly enshrined and infinitely unfolded. There is no true expression of the soul without this masculine and feminine development, the intellectual and the moral so perfectly one that they constitute the true spiritual marriage. The Buddha occupied in India the same relation to mankind that Jesus occupied 2000 years later in Palestine. While at long intervals vast cyclic periods intervene, you will find in about 600 years great revivals come to an end, a greater revival in 2000 years, and the still grander cycle in 25,000 years. About 600 years after Jesus, Mahomet inaugurated the faith of Islam, one of the great religious systems of the world to-day; 600 years later the Waldenses and others proclaim a more spiritual form of Christianity. At the present time, there are indications of a cycle of a new life, a new dispensation on the earth. We can safely say that every 600 or 700 years some remarkable change takes place somewhere on the earth. The great ruler of the planet, the archangel, changes at that time.

Ques. — What connection has Theosophy with metaphysical healing?

Ans. — Metaphysical teaching is really Theosophy applied, in this respect, that it utilizes occult power for the beneficent interests of mankind. This metaphysical movement has come before the world through the direct action of those masters of the most secret order on earth. All principles of metaphysics are in the possession of Eastern wisdom, and it is only just to Theosophy and the wisdom of the East to make this statement. Mrs. Eddy says she got it from a study of the Bible. How did Dr. Quimby and others get it? It matters not. These flashes of light that have come to different minds have proceeded directly from the current of thought that always held these truths, which gives them to mankind as it is able to receive them. Those who get it from intuition, get it from God. Metaphysics and Theosophy are perfectly one; Spiritualism has been, hitherto, an erratic manifestation of this power, which in its highest phases is Theosophy, in its lowest is nothing more than the grey magic of the East. No one can be a successful healer unless he lives a pure life, in conformity with the teachings of Christ. By perfect devotion to spiritual truth and the good of humanity, all can exercise the power Christ taught to his children. Every healer, like the true Theosophist, endeavors to turn the attention of the patient from things natural to things spiritual, to the culture of the spirit, and the formation of higher relations with the psychic world, enabling him to inherit all things worth inheriting. Our external forms are imprinted with all the sand-grains of thought, they mirror the person's mind within as a faithful record, a true doomsday book, and we believe in the perfect regeneration of this body through psychical means, and that it can only be accomplished under the highest thought; when the higher nature is appealed to, the higher nature drives out what the lower nature has secreted. The elixir of life is not a drug, but the life that springs from the interior principle, the Logos, the divine Ego, the Life of the God in us. In the highest condition of society you will set out to heal no one, but as the sun radiates light and heat through all the universe, so will you, as every soul is eternal, perceive only good, be receptive to, and express only good, shedding your blessing everywhere. Then you can go nowhere without healing the sick, wherever you go you carry with you a beneficent influence, dispensed as freely as the song of the bird or the perfume of the flower. We shall only develop into higher conditions as we do good, we can approximate healing another by being more in truth ourselves; those in truth carry peace with them. Cultivate the higher principle for the good you can do; all power is yours only when under the dominion of the Atma, in perfect harmony with the Divine Understanding. A metaphysical life is a battle and it is those who fight the battle that win the prize. There is such a thing as soul-cure; mind-cure is an adequate expression. It is spiritual illumination not physical healing which you practice. A metaphysical treatment closes the door that contacts with hell, and opens the door of heaven, it opens the window of a room, full of close, foul air and allows a fresh, cool, sweet breeze to flow in, to tranquilize and harmonize the apartment. This is what the thought does. When you affirm: "I am spirit, one with God, I am well in my interior, immortal being," when you thus relate yourself with the Infinite, you open a window you can never close. Sometimes there is a window open on to a most disagreeable place, then a metaphysical treatment shuts that window and opens another upon a bed of roses, upon thoughts of peace and harmony, with the celestial plains in sight. So metaphysical truth opens the avenues of the mind to the study of being, of living, studying, travelling in the right way, overcoming all discordant thought and entering upon our rightful heritage to eternal life and blessedness. So make your treatment an educator, develop a spiritual atmosphere by benevolent impulse, trust in God, rest in the Spirit, without perplexity. In giving yourself up to the spiritual tide, or influx, you are yielding to the Holy Ghost, which is better than to use your own mentality. When one treats in personal will he does himself harm and becomes exhausted. Treatment coupled with doubt is worse than none at all, if agitated you do not leave all to God, you are giving wrong medicine, your thought, not God's thought. You cannot possibly fail, for it is God's will that every one should be well and happy. The true Theosophist has seven senses; Spiritual Science undertakes to develop the sixth and seventh senses, through which you come into relation with the astral and the spiritual world. We should consider that in dealing with Spiritual Science we are studying everything there is, the only solvent of life's mystery.

QUES. — Does Theosophy recognize astrology?

ANS. — Astrology and alchemy are distinct sciences and the spiritual correspondence of astronomy and chemistry, Theosophy teaches that you were born when certain influences were in the ascendant, because of the all that your Karma brought with you from past experience, which caused you to be conceived just when you were. Our "brooding stars" are our relation with all past Karma. The perfectly unfolded being is represented astrologically in the twelfth chapter of Revelations, as the woman clothed with the sun, in contrast to Adam and Eve who were represented in the garden as naked, being ignorant and at the same time innocent, a state of earliest infancy. Their adoption of clothing signified growth in knowledge and experience. Eve, of innocent, perfect beauty, wore no crown; chaste as marble, pure as ice, with beauty unparalleled, she was still no queen, no conqueror. She was the representative woman, in perfect and infantile innocence, but one to whom you could not go for advice or instruction. She had no knowledge of the world, or its trials. While fair and pure she was at the same time a child, she could not serve as teacher, counsellor, or guide. Now look at the other picture — a woman standing in regal glory, clothed with the sun, the moon beneath her feet, a woman with all the chastity and perfection that could be imagined of the pure Edenic virgin, yet combined with all commanding knowledge, intelligence joined with purity, love with wisdom. Between the two, a great gulf is fixed. The Edenic woman has developed into the radiant creature of the Apocalypse. Eve represents the susceptible person always taking on conditions, when stung by the serpent she was utterly unprotected, while the light that surrounds the Apocalyptic woman, the armor of the Spirit which clothed her from head to foot would paralyze the serpent. Jesus placed before us, as our goal, the glorious condition that is still beyond us, the conjunction of the dove's harmlessness with the serpent's wisdom. Now what is the esoteric significance of this astronomical figure? The sun corresponds to the spiritual nature, the moon to the physical or animal nature, and the planets to the different intellectual powers. Why is it astrology tells us in terse phrase: "the wise man rules his stars?" The true Theosophist, in whom Sophia, or divine wisdom, is regnant, rules his own intellectual powers, or compels them as servants to the sun, or soul — the Atma — as the visible solar sun rules the planets which revolve about him. Your soul is the sun in you, and the you is the sun. The moon represents the animal nature, a mere satellite to a planet, which is subject to the intellect, while both mind and sense are governed by the spiritual nature. This is the true planetary correspondence of certain powers within one's self. While the planets revolve in space, they continually discharge electricity into the atmosphere, their recent perihelion has had a great deal to do with the tumult and unrest of human society, all over the world, but, all these influences being mortal, they afflict only those on the mortal plane. When we cultivate our soul power, when we are clad in armor from head to foot, there are no arrows, or bullets, that can pierce our armor. When we live in the spirit, and by constant at-one-ment with the interior life, we clothe ourself with the sun, subjugate the moon (all carnal passions) beneath our feet, and wear a diadem of twelve stars, signifying the perfect development of all our powers, the twelve stars referring to all zodiacal influences, a rounded development which the perfect being wears as a crown, while encased in a sheen of perfect light. When we live in the light of spiritual truth we become more and more invulnerable, no matter what hydra-headed monster makes war upon us, our heel being cased in perfect armor blunts the serpent's fangs, and the spiritual armor with which we are clothed upon, not only protects us but radiates an atmosphere which purifies the air for every one else to breathe, generates a counter-influence of good that destroys evil, as light dispels darkness.

of rational philosophic Spiritualism can in these days be upreared.

Much that passes for religion may be hypocrisy, much that is dignified with the name of science may be but transitory speculation, yet science and religion live, thrive and grow despite all mistakes and errors. Likewise does Spiritualism outlive and triumph over every outward attack and every inward weakness, so much so that though the very word has often been considered a reproach, not a year passes but a fresh list of noble and influential names have to be added to the illustrious company of Spiritualists.

There are in reality but three conceivable philosophies, viz.: Spiritualism, Materialism, Agnosticism. Concerning the latter, it may well be said in the words of the learned and thoughtful Prof. Felix Adler, of Ethical Culture fame, "Agnosticism is no finality." Materialism is practically dead in scientific circles, and it has never been able to claim such renowned philosophers as Herbert Spencer, Thos. Huxley or any others among the exceptionally brilliant men of science and of letters who made the 19th century illustrious.

Spiritualism, broadly interpreted and divested of all abnormal excrescences, is the only philosophy which has stood and still continues to stand the searching test of impartial scrutiny. Idle is it to point to the farces and follies perpetrated in its name, these, deplorable though they may be, detract nothing from the philosophy itself but only serve to exhibit the pitiable weaknesses of undeveloped types of human character. No sensible person rejects gold or any precious metal because it is taken out of the earth mixed with alloy. Even as gold is sifted from all which accompanies it before being transferred to the mint for coinage or employed in the manufacture of articles of worth and beauty, so must the grandest, noblest, most inspiring and consoling educative system of philosophy of which the human race has ever conceived, be stripped of all foreign matter that accompanies it before being transferred to its mint for coinage or employed in the manufacture of articles of mental worth and beauty, so must this grandest, noblest, most inspiring and educating system of philosophy of which the human race has ever conceived, be stripped of all accretions and unbeautiful surroundings and accepted only in so far as it commends itself to reason and to intuition, the two chief guides of humanity.

As the reader journeys in the following chapters from period to period, and from clime to clime, from ancient Egypt and India to modern Britain and America, one dominating conviction must lay hold upon the mind of every impartial student and that a conviction no less than the stupendous thought that the human race has sought and found convincing evidences of its immortality.

The great importance of the modern Spiritualistic movement, even though it be dated only from 1848, is too vast to be estimated, and it is beyond dispute that in consequence of marvelous and utterly unexpected occurrences at Hydesville in New York State and elsewhere in America during that memorable year, and in the momentous years which immediately followed, a complete revolution was started in the minds, not only of the American, but very shortly after, of European populations.

Liberal religious views were indeed prevalent in many distinguished circles before the world was thrilled by the audacious declaration that the gates were not only ajar, but in many instances wide open, between the two states of existence we are still accustomed to call two worlds.

This tremendous affirmation ought not to have surprised Bible students or professing Christians of any denomination, for nothing is more self-evident than that the Hebrew and Greek, in common with all other venerated Scriptures, distinctly proclaim the constant fact of the intercommunion of earth with spirit-spheres. But every one who is the least acquainted with the sad tale of ecclesiastical bigotry and blindness knows that organized religious parties fought desperately against the new revelation, thereby greatly weakening their own hold upon the masses and laying the foundation for vigorous iconoclastic onslaughts upon creeds and churches and diverting the tide of inspiration very largely away from all recognized denominational institutions.

The early history of modern Spiritualism has been copiously recorded in the standard works of Emma Hardinge Britten and other faithful chroniclers of the trials, hardships, defeats and victories of the stalwart pioneers who often literally took their lives in their hands to proclaim the new gospel which was to them more precious than their earthly all. The work of the magnificently courageous men and women who stood in the front rank of the Spiritualistic propaganda during its earlier decades on both sides of the Atlantic and also at the Antipodes, can never be overestimated. Some of those zealous champions of spiritual free thought may have been at times over intrepid and occasionally indiscreet, but they did their work heroically, and the light they braved everything to kindle and to sustain will not easily be extinguished.

In later years other movements, not Spiritualistic in name, have attained and received much attention and have unquestionably succeeded to a large extent in enlisting the sympathy and arousing the interest of many intelligent persons to whom the name of Spiritualism was not attractive.

The Theosophical Society founded in New York in 1875 and started by prominent Spiritualists,—for such Col. Olcott and Mme. Blavatsky undoubtedly were—drifted at one time into seeming antagonism to the central doctrine of Spirit communion, but has always been in reality an upholder of spiritual philosophy against materialism and is now, in the persons of its most representative leaders, throwing much light, through study and practice of clairvoyance in particular, upon the actual condition of the Spirit world which interpenetrates as well as encircles this material globe.

The popular New Thought movement, though not avowedly Spiritualistic in any pronounced degree, has always numbered among its leading exponents distinguished men and women whose public writings leave no doubt as to their knowledge of the main facts for which all Spiritualists are steadfastly contending. The chequered history of the Spiritualistic movement all over the world has presented many bright and more than a few dark features and it is not seemingly possible to unify all Spiritualists or to bring them into substantial accord any further than to acknowledge the one great essential of spiritual intercommunion.

It is not necessarily regrettable that no uniformity seems possible on anything like an extensive scale because it is the obvious mission of the great modern spiritual revelation to break the fetters of assumed authority and set the individual spirit free. The idiosyncrasies of many individuals and the dubious character of much alleged phenomena, together with the unsatisfactory nature of many purported spirit communications, continues to present a series of serious difficulties in the path of many conscientious enquirers and investigators, and with the rapidly spreading acknowledgment of limitless telepathy the old simple confidence in direct communion with our departed friends and kindred has been in many quarters greatly shaken.

The writings of the noted Prof. T. J. Hudson, whose name will always be associated with the "Two minds" theory, have been erroneously construed by many readers as undermining the fact of Spirit communion when in reality no evidences of telepathy can possibly do other than strengthen reasonable confidence therein. The enormous interest taken at present in what is termed Psychical Research is only interest in Spiritualism under a slightly different name, this every impartial student must admit, especially after perusing that monumental work by the famous F. W. H. Myers entitled "Human Personality—its survival of bodily death." A still more recent work by Prof. Hyslop of Columbia University, entitled "Science and a Future Life," and indeed a perfect host of volumes by more or less distinguished authors, written in many different languages and all testifying to the constantly accumulating proofs of spirit intercourse demonstrated in a great variety of ways and under a vast variety of conditions, but serve to further illustrate our main position.

Though the old theory of the Satanic origin of spirit communications is no longer preached as formerly, there are still those among us who see the devil in everything which seems supernormal that does not conform with antiquated, and indeed barbaric, notions of the unseen universe, and apart from old school theologians who continue to employ old-fashioned terminology there are quite a considerable number of modern writers who do not hesitate to descant upon the perils attending mediumship and the dangerous ground upon which all are treading who venture to seek to lift up the veil which divides mundane from supra-mundane existence.

Tennyson's warning in his beautiful lines entitled "The Angel Guest," a choice excerpt from "In Memoriam," are indeed applicable to all who would seek to peer behind the mystic curtain and commune with beings ordinarily invisible from the earthly standpoint. The poet truly sings:

> "How pure in heart and sound in head
> With what divine affections bold
> Should be the man whose thoughts would hold
> An hour's communion with the dead."

These stirring lines, and the three verses which follow, were sung at a great meeting in Brighton, England's most famous seaside resort, on the evening of May 24, 1874, when the writer of these pages, then an inquisitive child, was attracted to an "inspirational oration" delivered by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond (then Mrs. Tappan) at a time when Spiritualism was exciting great attention in Great Britain.

That wonderfully gifted speaker in some mysterious way, while addressing an audience of 1,500 people, was an instrument in the hands of the unseen for opening the floodgates of illumination for this curious child, who was immediately fascinated by the grace and dignity of the orator and deeply impressed with the mighty import of the inspired and inspiring message delivered so impressively in so unique a manner. Years have come and gone and the wondering child has grown to be a widely traveled lecturer and author, but never unmindful of the impetus received on that ever-to-be-remembered evening.

In the autobiographical narrative which the writer has been importuned to incorporate in this volume, personal experiences are necessarily introduced to illustrate the propositions which it is desired to elucidate and to unfold. It has been almost impossible to refer the reader in all cases to authorities which would further sustain the facts related in the successive chapters of this book, but moderation as well as accuracy of statement has been the author's constant aim, and though conscious of many defects in style and limitations in subject matter, it is confidently hoped, and indeed expected, that this comparatively humble contribution to the voluminous literature of Spiritualism will serve at least the useful purpose of providing at reasonable price, in not excessive compass, a textbook for enquirers and a work of ready reference for those who have neither time nor opportunity for searching massive records when desirous of taking a bird's-eye view of the spiritual conceptions and experiences of widely-scattered members of the human race.

Lights and shadows have alike been dealt with, but the tone of this work is avowedly and intentionally optimistic. To liberalize thought, to increase fraternal feeling, to relieve the depression which overhangs the thought of passing into the mysterious "unknown," and most of all to show how reasonable it is to have confidence in human immortality, have been among the prominent objects the author has held constantly in view.

W. J. COLVILLE.

New York, 1906.

Autobiography of W. J. Colville

If I am to relate faithfully, even in barest outline, my experiences with "unseen helpers," I must go back to my very early childhood, when my "mediumship" originally declared itself. I was practically an orphan from birth. My mother passed to spirit life in my infancy and my father was called by important business to travel in lands remote from England, where I was left in charge of a guardian. My childhood was singularly unchildlike, as I was separated from children altogether, and compelled to associate exclusively with persons of thoroughly mature age.

How I first came to see my mother clairvoyantly I do not know, but I distinctly remember becoming vividly conscious at frequent intervals of the gentle, loving presence of a beautiful young woman, who invariably appeared to my vision gracefully attired in light garments of singular beauty. The head of this charming lady was adorned with golden ringlets; her eyes were intensely blue; she was tall and of rather slender build, and manifested many attributes of almost ideal womanhood. I cannot recall to mind any occasion when this lady spoke to me as one ordinary human being on earth converses with another, but I distinctly recollect that when I saw her most plainly and felt her presence most distinctly, I was intensely conscious of information flowing into me. I can only liken my experience to some memorable statements of Swedenborg concerning influx of knowledge into the interiors of human understanding.

I should probably never in those early days have thought of such a problem as clairvoyance, had it not been for the surprising fact that what I saw perfectly other people did not see at all. I was first led to realize the unusual character of my vision when I mentioned the presence of the "beautiful lady in white" to two persons who were with me when I saw her very distinctly, and they declared that we three were the only occupants of the apartment. The mystery of the fourth inmate was for me greatly intensified when it appeared to me that the other two persons, besides her and myself, could pass through her and she through them, while they appeared completely unconscious of each other's presence. An elderly lady, with whom I was living, who was a devoted Churchwoman, summed up all my singular visions, when I related them to her, in the following words: "Well, I can't account for it, but it must be the work of either God or Satan." Though not many months over five years of age at the time to which I am now referring, I had already heard Satan called the "father of lies" and had also been taught that truth belonged to God and came from heaven; so my youthful intellect was not perturbed with dread of any power of darkness, as I found that all the information which flowed into me when this beautiful spiritual being manifested to me was correct in every particular. I was, therefore, quite content to believe, with simple faith supported by reasoning, that my dear mother was watching over me as a guardian spirit. I often heard of guardian angels, and I was sometimes taken to a children's service in a church where a favorite hymn before the catechising began with the following invocation:

"Dear angel ever at my side!
How loving must thou be
To leave thy home in heaven to guard
A little child like me."

Instead of conjecturing angels as well-nigh incomprehensible beings belonging to an order in the creation entirely different from ourselves, I rested satisfied with the simple, reasonable conviction that the messenger from unseen spheres who watched over me most intimately, was the dear mother whose physical presence had been withdrawn from earth long before I had reached an age when I could have consciously appreciated it. I do not forget the strange shock I felt when some one said to me: "It is impossible that you should see your mother; you have no mother; she is dead." Such vulgar, brutal words made no other impression on me than to set me thinking along psychic lines, far more often pursued by little children than adults generally suppose.

It must be borne in mind that I was an isolated and often a lonely child, thrown very largely upon my resources for amusement and enjoyment. This circumstance may suffice to suggest instructive thoughts regarding conditions singularly favorable to mediumistic development. Is mediumship a gift or a natural endowment? is a query often raised. To answer this inquiry it is surely necessary to recall the two distinct senses in which the word "gift" is commonly employed. We speak of natural gifts, of the universal gifts of God to humanity, as well as of particular bestowments vouchsafed to those who are sometimes segregated in our philosophy from the "common herd," and designated a "chosen few." Having used the term "clairvoyance" in connection with my own earliest spiritual experiences, I wish to define it in my own case as applying to extended vision of three distinctly different, though closely allied, varieties. The first evidence of my own clear vision, which came to me so spontaneously and unexpectedly that for a considerable season it caused me no astonishment whatever, related to beholding a form of real, consistent substantiality, existing on another plane of being than the one usually termed terrestrial. This form was completely and symmetrically human in every detail of outline, and was attired in artistic dress, not foreign to ordinary worldly convention, but vastly more beautiful and graceful than the customary mortal dress fashionable in the sixties of the nineteenth century, which included the crinoline and the chignon. The second evidence of clairvoyance did not refer to sight, even on the psychic or astral plane, as sight is ordinarily understood, but to mental enlightenment or intellectual illumination, and this, not only of a general but also of a particular character, as the knowledge which entered into my understanding related not only to topics of usual information, but went deeply and precisely into manifold details of private family history, and included many revelations which brought great consternation to the hearers when I reported my experiences, seeing that the people among whom I was being reared were very desirous of hiding from me many facts connected with my parents of which my spirit mother undoubtedly wished me to become aware. The third feature in my clairvoyance was the actual predicting of coming events, and I use the term "coming" in the precisest possible manner for the very events I was led to foretell had, in many instances, actually occurred in one sense, and were on their way to occurring in yet another. A single example will illustrate.

My grandmother's sister in Lincolnshire had decided to visit Sussex, but had not communicated her intention to any one, though her mind was fully made up. Though I had never seen my great-aunt, and had rarely heard her mentioned, I distinctly saw her in the house where I was then living, and accurately described her appearance, even to the strings of the cap which she actually wore a few weeks later when paying her sister a visit. Two questions naturally arise at this point: First, how is it that we can see people who may be thinking of us, or perhaps only of a place we are inhabiting, when they are not consciously or deliberately projecting their thought, or an astral likeness of themselves, to us? Second, how is it that we see articles of wearing apparel which those persons may not be actually wearing at the time when we behold them? The following reply may serve to elucidate, at least in part, the foregoing mystery. When Herbert Spencer many years ago criticised somewhat adversely the notion of clothing as pertaining to the spirit world, he evidently overlooked a very important consideration, to the effect that our clothing is all mentally designed before it can be physically confected. A new fashion in dress is impossible except as an outcome of a new mental concept of apparel. Not only Swedenborg, but Shakespeare also, clearly illustrates the close connection which must ever logically exist between the wearer and the garment worn; and in no case do we find the suggestive doctrine more clearly taught by inference than in the play of "Hamlet," where the father of the Prince of Denmark appears in spirit, clad in armor, at the very time when he is seeking to inspire his son to make war against an uncle who has incurred the fierce displeasure of the discarnate king. Not only do we clothe ourselves physically in such raiment as becomes our immediate mental state, but we often unconsciously supply, gratuitously, portraits of ourselves doing things we intend to do, things, indeed, which we have spiritually already done, and which we shall certainly ultimate materially unless our plans are unexpectedly frustrated. It generally simplifies the mystery of prognostication if we do but consider that seership is a faculty which enables a seer or seeress to actually behold what exists on a plane of ultimation prior to the physical.

As I grew from childhood to rather riper age, and in the meantime attended schools and became interested in many external pursuits and objects, my singularly spontaneous mediumship became less prominent, and with the exception of an occasional prophetic dream of rare lucidity, which always came as a needed warning, I gradually drifted into a more prosaic state of life, from which I was suddenly aroused by the presence of the world-renowned Cora L. V. Richmond (then Mrs. Tappan) in England during the seventies of the last century. When I was nearly fourteen years of age, and a member of a church choir, Mrs. Tappan greatly excited the population of Brighton, where I was then residing, by her marvelous discourses and poems, and singularly erudite replies to all kinds of questions, which she claimed were not due to her own erudition, of which she made no boast and to which she laid no claim, but to the action through her instrumentality of a band of guides who were ready to speak through her whenever their services were in demand. May 24th, 1874, was, indeed, an eventful day in my history, for though my public career as a lecturer and globe-trotter did not begin till nearly three years later, it was on the evening of that beautiful Whit-Sunday that I experienced the first thrill of consciousness that it was my principal lifework to travel nearly all over the earth, guided by unseen but not unknown inspirers, who would carry me safely over all tempestuous oceans and protect me from all dangers by land if I would but be faithful to the mission entrusted to me by wise and kindly helpers. I have always greatly disliked the word "control," and I dislike it still, for in my ears it savors of coercion, and I have never been coerced by my inspirers, who have ever proved themselves faithful teachers, counselors, and guides—veritable "invisible helpers," to use Leadbeater's felicitous expression, a title we may well apply to those numberless assistants who render multifold services to us of which we are often quite unconscious, but from which we derive inestimable benefit.

The record of my original introduction to the work of inspirational speaking is now an oft-told tale; in brief, I may sum it up as follows: When I was walking home after greatly enjoying Mrs. Tappan's wonderful eloquence, I registered a vow that if any good and wise intelligences in the unseen state would inspire me as they were wont to inspire the marvelous lady who styled herself their "instrument," I would most gladly take service with them and go whithersoever their counsels led me. I earnestly desired and confidently expected that inspiration would come to me if it were genuine at all, and come it did that very evening and within an hour from the time when I invoked it. Had no obstacles been placed in my way, I should have darted forth meteorically as a speaker before my fourteenth birth anniversary, but my legal guardian refused to grant permission until I was at least two years older, though she did not prevent my occasionally appearing at private gatherings, nor was she able to deprive me of some wonderful experiences of mesmeric or hypnotic character, which opened my eyes in my early teens to many of the marvels of psychology which are now demanding and receiving attention from distinguished savants the wide world over.

Hypnotism and its dangers, like Spiritualism and its dangers, is now being discussed at every turn, and I am often greatly interested to hear discussions on these recondite themes, when the debaters are people of experience, but whose experiences have been largely unlike my own. I do not presume to settle any question for my neighbors, I merely speak in the first person singular when I declare that I was never hypnotized against or even without the full consent of my own will; and as spiritualistic literature abounds with references to the virtual identity of hypnotic influence with spirit control, I deem it advisable to bear personal testimony in this connection. Shortly after my discovery that I could speak inspirationally, and even be spoken through by an unseen intelligence, to whose words, uttered through my lips, I could attend as a quiet, interested listener, I made the acquaintance of a brilliant young nobleman who was both an operatic singer and a practicing psychologist. This young "star" was introduced to me as desiring to conduct some delicate mesmeric experiments for which he needed the services of a lucide, or natural clairvoyant; or failing to discover any one who would entirely answer to the above description, he considered it highly probable that his experimentation would be successful if he could meet a sensitive young person who was thoroughly willing to yield to his suggestive influence. My first ejaculation when the subject was broached to me that I might serve for the experiments, was "I should be delighted, and feel sure they will be successful." Though all the experiments were conducted in strict privacy, so far as the general public were concerned, many distinguished persons high in the learned professions took active part in many of the most satisfactory of them. It is not usually supposed, at least by the uninitiated into psychic mysteries, that the words passive and negative are quite as correctly qualified by the terms wilfully and willingly as are positive and active. We are frequently told that mediumship is impossible without passivity, and such is doubtless the case, but voluntary rather than involuntary passivity or negativity conduces to the most reliable results. Operator and subject are terms of double import, but such terms as sender and receiver or transmitter and recipient are clearly not open to valid objection, seeing that they in no way imply enforced surrender of one individual to another. During the nearly three years which intervened between my first insight into my capabilities as an inspired lecturer and my debut before a London audience, I had many opportunities for witnessing extraordinary phenomena, as I became well acquainted with many prominent Spiritualists, who treated me with great kindness and consideration and placed many exceptional advantages at my disposal for witnessing manifestations of all varieties. Some of these appealed strongly to me, others did not. I had many opportunities for sitting in circles with Williams, Herne, Monck, Eglinton, and other extraordinary mediums, who, at about that time, were either in the inception or at the zenith of their fame. Though I was told repeatedly that I was a physical medium, and though I sat in many seances where tables moved and furniture in general behaved grotesquely, I never knowingly officiated as a physical medium, though planchette has worked for me repeatedly and automatic writing has been often with me quite an every-day occurrence. During the greater part of 1877–8, I was privileged to investigate the evidences of phenomenal Spiritualism all over England. The most private gatherings were open to me, and I was times without number privileged to sit with the most distinguished mediums under thoroughly satisfactory test conditions; but though I saw enough to convince me a thousand times over that some mysterious occult force was operating, and the spiritualistic hypothesis always seemed to me more reasonable than any other, I do not think, with my peculiar and naturally sceptical cast of mind, that I could ever have been completely convinced of the truth of spirit-communion had it not been for experiences of my own which absolutely forced me as a rational individual to accept the only sane conclusion.

When I first took the platform I felt very much as I had often felt in more private places when voluntarily obeying the silently expressed dictation of the talented psychologist who could transmit to and through me any information he desired to convey when I was in a susceptible condition; but though he declared that I was perfectly his "subject," and I was quite willing to be such, I could not be induced by any professional mesmerist, or practicing physician, who was engaged in the conduct of hypnotic experiments, to receive or transmit anything, simply because I did not choose to make myself passive or susceptible. I remember well sitting on the platform in old Doughty Hall (a Masonic edifice no longer in existence) on Sunday evening, March 4th, 1877, and gazing out upon a large concourse of people gathered to hear the "kitten orator," as I had been called because of my youth, discourse on a subject to be selected by their own vote. A hymn was sung to open a semi-religious service, and then I rose and offered a prayer, the words of which formed themselves in my mouth without forethought or conscious volition of my own. After a second hymn the presiding officer—the long celebrated James Burns, editor of the Medium and Daybreak—announced in my hearing that the youthful occupant of the platform was prepared to discourse under inspiration on any theme the audience might think proper to select. I heard this without the slightest internal trepidation. I had become tense, callous, self-assured, but completely confident that an intelligence beyond my normal own would certainly render me entirely equal to the occasion. A subject was quickly decided upon by show of hands, and I rose to lecture. I spoke unfalteringly for fully an hour, and resumed my seat unexcited and unfatigued. A third hymn was sung, and then Mr. Burns called upon the audience to mention topics for an impromptu poem. Three or four subjects were given, and no sooner was a decision reached by the chairman as to which topic had received the greatest show of hands, than I rose for the third and last time that evening, and heard myself reel off a number of verses as easily and fluently as though I had them well committed to memory, though I am certain they were nowhere in print, and I was listening to them for the first time. The report of that memorable meeting created a great sensation those many years ago; but events crowd thickly upon each other in these days, and a new generation has risen since I was a "youthful prodigy," "one of the marvels of the nineteenth century," and much else, according to the newspapers, which I have long since forgotten.

Immediately after my appearance in London I was called to all parts of England. I went as an inexperienced child to places rough and smooth, aristocratic and uncouth, clean and dirty, refined and vulgar, religious and atheistic; and wherever I went I found my unseen prompters ready to help me in all emergencies and to pilot me safely over many difficult and unpleasant places from which I should certainly have shrunk had I seen beforehand what awaited me. During the nineteen months of my touring as a lecturer in England, between March, 1877, and October, 1878, I certainly saw the world in a large number of its varied phases, and though many episodes in my career during that eventful period were extremely enjoyable, as I met kind and true friends almost everywhere, I could, without the slightest difficulty or exaggeration, unfold many a tale which might amuse or startle more than it would edify the listeners. My constitution was not considered naturally robust and I had to encounter many hardships from which many a stronger person would have fled in dismay, but though I cannot say that I quite enjoyed all the harsher features of my travels in all weathers to all sorts of places, instead of succumbing I grew steadily stronger physically as well as mentally, so that when I left England for America near the close of October, 1878, my constitution was quite equal to endure the strain of a singularly tempestuous, though not dangerous, ocean passage and the rigors of a New England winter, to the severity of which the fickle climate of Albion had never subjected me. I well remember my departure from Liverpool for unknown Boston across the wide Atlantic, whither I was journeying entirely alone save for the clearly distinguished presence of those faithful unseen helpers who never deserted me.

One of the clearest visions of my life attended me during the night prior to my departure from Liverpool. I fell asleep about 3 A. M., apparently as a result of fatigue following upon intense excitement, but my seership asserted itself triumphantly in a manner which I was soon able to verify, even to the minutest detail. I saw myself standing on a wide platform which was covered with thick red carpet, in a great hall, with high windows on either side. There was an organ in a choir gallery over the entrance to this audience room, and surmounting the rostrum on which I stood was a fine bust of the great New England preacher, the famous Theodore Parker. In that hall I saw a very fine audience numbering from 600 to 800 persons; and in the midst of the assembly the dignified figure of Dr. J. M. Peebles, whom I had met in London some months previously, loomed large before me. The vision impressed itself indelibly on the tablet of my memory; then I fell into a dreamless slumber, which continued until I was called to partake of my last breakfast in England for many a year to come. On reaching America I found that not only had my advent been heralded in the columns of the Banner of Light, the oldest spiritualistic paper in the world, but the friend who met me at the landing stage (Robert Cooper, of Eastbourne, England, who was then a prominent worker in America) informed me that Dr. Peebles had just completed a lecture engagement in Parker

Memorial Hall, and that he had announced me as his successor, the committee having accepted me for that large and prominent position on the good doctor's kindly recommendation, though I was only eighteen years of age and entirely unknown to the directors of the Parker Hall lectureship. No sooner had I landed in America than I was quite at home on what was in no sense to me a foreign soil, for there I heard the same language spoken, and, with minor exceptions of no definite importance, soon discovered that England and America are at least first cousins, if not still nearer relatives. In Boston my work quickly grew apace; then I was called to New York, Philadelphia, and other mighty cities, not excepting Chicago, where I filled Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's platform for an extended period, while she was filling an engagement in Boston. Nearly five busy years had sped their course when, in 1883, I found myself again in England, taking up afresh the work which I never laid down, but only temporarily suspended when I was led to cross the ocean and become a prominent worker in America. In 1884 I returned to the United States, and in 1885 again revisited England. During those years I accomplished a large amount of literary work in addition to extensive traveling and constant lecturing. In 1886 I visited California for the first time, and spent five delightful months on the sunny Pacific slope, in which charming country I addressed daily audiences often numbering many hundred persons, and saw wonderful results from the practice of mental healing, of which I had by that time become, and of which I still am, an uncompromising, though I trust not a fanatical, advocate and exponent.

At the close of a lecture which I delivered on a camp ground bordering on Lake Merritt, adjacent to the city of Oakland, California, a lady who had long been a cripple handed her crutches to her husband, walked home, and did not resume the use of artificial support subsequently. This "miracle" of healing took place unconsciously to me, for I did not know there was a crippled woman in the assembly. I do not claim any part in the accomplishment of this marvel further than to declare that I was led to say before I concluded my exposition of the philosophy of healing, "You can use your limbs if you determine to use them, no matter how long they may have failed to serve you." I had no idea that I was addressing anybody in particular, and no member of the audience was more greatly astonished than myself when the "miracle" occurred. My explanation of it is twofold; I firmly believe that there was an influence at work with that afflicted woman beyond my consciousness, and I feel also convinced that through her own auto-suggestive act she greatly facilitated her recovery. This case is thoroughly authenticated, and is now in print in the supplement to my old standard work, "The Spiritual Science of Health and Healing," under the heading, "Testimony of Mrs. Lily Bothwell."

During that marvelous summer of 1886, which was in some respects the most astounding in my whole career, I received pressing invitations to visit Australia, from which far-distant land cablegrams came to me in quick succession. Nine years previously, at the very outset of my public work, I had been assured by my unseen preceptors that there was a great work for me to accomplish at the Antipodes after I had crossed America, and I may here mention that I had daringly announced in a London paper, in 1885, that I was going to California in consequence of a communication to that effect having been written through my hand when I had no earthly prospect of pursuing my westward way further than New York and Boston. My disappointment was singularly keen when obstacles arose, mountain high, to forbid my leaving America on the completion of my first season in California. Duty called me back to Boston, and reluctantly I obeyed its call, with heavy heart and doubtful mind, for I was beginning to suspect that my unseen directors had been in some way thwarted in their plans for me, I having been solemnly assured by them that I had a mission to fulfil in Australasia; and now after a way had plainly opened, the door had been ruthlessly closed and by no voluntary act of mine. On the way back across the American continent, when I paused to lecture in St. Louis, a message came to me with unmistakable clearness, "You are going to Australia and New Zealand but not just yet! plans are ripening but not yet matured; have perfect confidence in your inspirers, for though there is a seeming delay there has been no hitch in the arrangements." "But when shall I go?" I inquired eagerly. "We cannot tell you just now; you would think the time too long did you foreknow its duration; but rest content; you are going, and you will fill a large place while you reside there." With that assurance I had to remain content, for I could receive nothing further concerning the Southern Hemisphere though many directions were given me concerning my continuous work in the Northern. For ten years I saw nothing of England, and it was through the joint instrumentality of Lady Caithness, Duchesse de Pomar, in Paris, and the special excursion of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union from New York, in June, 1895, that I revisited Europe after ten years' unbroken residence in America. Those ten years had been very busy and highly eventful ones; my singular experiences during their highly checkered course would fill many a bulky volume. I had scoured America from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and had met with warm receptions and enthusiastic audiences everywhere, though let no one imagine that a prominent public life means constant resting on a bed of roses; roses abound but thorns are often their intimate neighbors. I had produced a number of books, edited several periodicals, and contributed many hundreds of articles to magazines, besides having written thousands of letters to newspapers, in addition to musical work, before I again set foot in England after my departure in 1885.

What first led me to turn my attention back to Europe during the winter of 1894 was a psychic or telepathic incident well worth repeating, though it has been previously recorded. I well remember December 8th, 1894. On that day, between 2:30 fair and 3 P. M., I was seated at a desk in New York writing an article for a periodical which demanded copy at short notice. I was scribbling away at full speed, writing "against time" as literary hacks describe the process, when I was suddenly arrested by a vision of Lady Caithness, whom I had not seen for over nine years, seated at an escritoire in a sumptuously furnished boudoir, the most conspicuous feature of which was a magnificent painting covering nearly the whole of one side of the wall. This painting, which I saw distinctly in my vision, represented "Jacob's Ladder," and I remember being particularly impressed with the singular beauty of the faces of the angels. Lady Caithness was elaborately dressed, and engaged in writing to me; it seemed as though I could see ink falling from her pen on to the paper, while she informed me of many interesting events connected with the erection of her ducal palace, "Holyrood," to which she had recently moved from the fine old house in an older quarter of Paris, where she had hospitably entertained me and where I had held several conferences during 1884–5. The letter she was then writing embodied the request that I should without delay contribute an article for a periodical she was then editing, and it also expressed a fervent hope that I should see my way clear to accept her offer of an engagement to deliver a course of lectures at "Holyrood" during the ensuing June. For nearly thirty minutes this vision continued with me, and then, before the letter appeared finished, it suddenly vanished, and I resumed my interrupted article. I went to Boston for Christmas, and while there, on December 24th, I received, among other letters from New York, the identical letter from Lady Caithness, dated "Paris, December 8th," which I had beheld in my extremely vivid vision. In the course of the letter I learned that it was indited between 7:30 and 8:00 P. M., Paris time, which is five hours ahead of New York, and therefore the time coincidence was as nearly exact as it well could be.

I have been repeatedly asked to describe the difference between telepathic and spiritual messages, and I frankly confess that I have rarely been able to clearly distinguish between them. And this statement suffices to introduce a consideration which is in my opinion a matter of great importance. Take, for example, Thomson Jay Hudson's much-discussed theory of two minds and two memories. Hudson avers that the subjective mind is the sole seat of the telepathic faculty, and in his three celebrated books,

"The Law of Psychic Phenomena," "A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life," and "The Divine Pedigree of Man," he industriously undertakes to prove that, though the objective mind with its memory may perish with the decease of the physical organism, the subjective mind with its memory continues to live on in the life of immortality. If this premiss is sound, then Hudson's conclusion, as put forth in his curious article (February, 1902) in the Era, a well-known American monthly, is quite unwarranted; and it is the height of absurdity on his part to declare that Spiritualists are "fighting in the last ditch," because recent experiments in the ample field of psychical discovery have abundantly proved the reliability of just such telepathy as Hudson and many others intelligently vouch for. My own experiences in numberless instances have completely satisfied me that in nine out of any average ten instances when psychic communion between friends can be clearly demonstrated, it is almost impossible to discriminate exactly between a message received from a communicant on earth and from one who has passed to the other side of existence. What, indeed, is that "other side" but the side to which telepathy is indigenous? And can we afford to be sure that when we are functioning telepathically we are not behaving just as we should continue to behave were we suddenly divested of our material envelopes? If the physical frame be but a sheath or vehicle of the abiding entity, which is the true individual, then all these fascinating evidences of thought transference, or mental telegraphy or telephony, accumulating everywhere, are but so many convincing proofs of the reality of our spiritual nature in the here and now, which will prove continuous in the hereafter and the future. Evidences of psychic presence and spiritual guidance having attended my steps from infancy, I cannot specialize any particular season when I have enjoyed the greatest number of distinct proofs of super-terrestrial guidance, but such have always been most distinct and multiple when the need for them has been greatest.

I will now select, almost at random, a few notably striking instances of warning, guidance, and simply interesting seership, which stand forth prominently in my recollection as my thoughts revert to days gone by.

Once in California, when I had arranged to lecture in a theatre in Los Angeles while I was yet in San Francisco, I purchased a ticket and secured a berth on a steamer leaving on a Thursday, and due at San Pedro, the port of Los Angeles, by noon next Saturday. It was summer weather and the coast steamers were almost invariably punctual to schedule time. Feeling perfectly sure that I should reach Los Angeles at least twenty-four hours before I needed to appear in the theatre, I felt no apprehension, after securing my tickets, as to fulfilling my engagement, and therefore I was greatly surprised when, while walking up Market Street, I heard a voice saying distinctly beside me, "Change your ticket; go by train: boat will not arrive till Monday." At first I paid no attention to this strange admonition, and was simply perplexed to account for its origin; but after it had been twice repeated I resolved to run no risk of disregarding a valuable counsel, and I therefore returned to the office where I had secured my passage and changed my tickets from boat to rail, despite the positive declaration of the booking agent that the boats were always on time, and that I could rely on meeting my engagement if I adhered to my first intention.

Having procured a railway ticket in compliance with the urgent request of the unseen monitor, I mentally asked, "What will cause the delay?" to which I received an answer, clairaudiently, with great distinctness, "Accident to propeller; no danger, but vessel will have to return for repairs; it will arrive safely on Monday." On arrival in Los Angeles on the Saturday morning, friends remonstrated with me for having forfeited a pleasant water journey at a season when boats were far preferable to trains in that vicinity; but I insisted that as I was announced to deliver two lectures on the following day it was imperatively necessary for me to arrive before the steamer, which I was certain would be belated. Saturday and Sunday both passed and no steamer arrived. I addressed two great audiences before the boat finally got in on the Monday morning, telling a tale of broken propeller and return to port of departure for repairs.

Another incident of quite a different character, but none the less phenomenal, even though less practically useful, concerned an acquaintance I formed in London in 1897, during a course of private midnight seances I was privileged to attend at which conditions were exceptionally fine. To accommodate the several professionals who were members of the circle, we assembled twice a week at midnight and continued our sittings till from 2 to 3 A. M. Our chief focus of attraction was a huge crystal placed in the centre of a large library table. The crystal was as large as an ordinary globe for containing goldfish, and into this brilliant object we all quietly but intently gazed, with a view to increasing concentratedness of thought and vision. After we had become susceptible to psychic vision we let our eyes close if they seemed so disposed, and we described whatever came before us. Among a multiplicity of telling incidents connected with that circle, I remember describing accurately scenes then being enacted in a house in Brighton occupied by the parents and other relatives of a young army officer whose regiment was soon afterwards ordered to India. Some months later, when this gentleman was in Calcutta and I in New York, I saw him as plainly as though he were physically beside me, and on the occasion of his birthday, when some friends presented him with a handsome pair of ivory-backed military hair brushes on which his monogram was richly chased in blue and gold, I saw those articles as plainly as though he and I had been actually in a room together, inspecting the birthday presents. A letter which came to me from him a few weeks later described those brushes precisely and contained the words, "I am sure you are receiving a telepathic despatch from me at this instant."

Though I have narratives to relate which would fill many a volume, all illustrative of the great question of psychic intercourse between friends yet on earth and those who have "passed over," as well as manifold descriptions of most convincing telepathy where both parties have been incarnate, I must reserve for future opportunities the narration of other striking incidents. But now that I have rounded out nearly thirty years of public service, I feel it a solemn duty as well as a high privilege to bear unequivocal testimony to the always beneficial effect which mediumship such as I have developed has had on me from all standpoints. Mentally and physically I owe immensely much to those very endowments and experiences which mistaken people imagine are weakening to mind and body. That there are dangers and drawbacks I do not deny, but through all my varied and protracted experiences on and off the platform, for more than a quarter of a century, I have invariably found that the directions given me from unseen helpers have been sound, elevating, and truthful to the letter in all particulars; while the telepathic incidents, at which I have scarcely more than hinted, have been always interesting, never mischievous, and invariably calculated to throw bright light on many a mystic problem. During the nearly two years which I spent south of the Equator, I still pursued my way unflaggingly and untiringly in all varieties of climate and in a great variety of surroundings. I owe a deep debt of gratitude to friends, seen and unseen, for the many tokens of their care and kindness which have brightened all my journeyings and rendered possible of accomplishment the widely extended mission which took me to the Southern Hemisphere. Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Newcastle, and many smaller places in great Australia, I shall ever feel united with as centres of work which I know has already borne good fruit in numerous ways. Auckland, Wellington, and Christchurch in picturesque New Zealand will always remain equally sacred in my memory. During all my Antipodean wanderings I found my psychic faculties fully as clear and as much in evidence as in other lands where the Southern Cross is an unseen constellation. I am now assured that my traveling days are not yet over, and that I still have oceans to cross, and continents to traverse, before I can honorably retire from active service, if such retirement shall ever be my portion. The dangers of Spiritualism are in my judgment greatly overrated, while its blessings are often minimized; for though I have been since 1890 a member of the Theosophical Society, and my acquaintance and connection with the Mental Science movement is a matter of public knowledge, I wish publicly, emphatically, and irrevocably to bear my testimony to the irrefutable truth of spirit communion. With the peculiar theories advocated by some Spiritualists I have no sympathy; and I dare say there are tricksy spirits, as well as unreliable people on this side the mystic border; but though I must remain the "free lance" I have ever been, and work wherever I am called to operate, and therefore cannot pose as exclusively a Spiritualist, inclusively I am as thoroughgoing an advocate of Spiritualism as any of its most enthusiastic representatives. I owe nothing to developing circles, and comparatively little to spiritualistic literature, or to phenomenal mediumship of an objective type; therefore my assurance of Spiritualism's central claim can never be weakened by any controversy which may rage concerning dubious phenomena. I have seen the unmistakably genuine, the ambiguous, and the fraudulent, and having seen so much I am prepared to testify to this effect, irrevocably—that Spiritualism is based on truth, and no matter how many barnacles may have to be swept from such institutions as are devoted to its special advocacy, the twentieth century must and will witness a spiritual revealing for which all the wonders of the nineteenth, stupendous though they have been, have only paved the way.

Universal Spiritualism

CHAPTER I

THE QUESTION OF SPIRIT IDENTITY

THE vexed question of spirit identity is one which is always liable to occasion considerable discussion, chiefly by reason of the fact that what appears thoroughly conclusive to some types of mind seems inconclusive to others. It is, therefore, necessary to approach this immense and vital subject not only entirely free from prejudice, but also fortified with clear understanding of the actual worth of the various theories now submitted for popular acceptance as substitutes for what is often termed the spiritualistic hypothesis.

We are often asked whether it is possible for us to explain clearly how we discriminate between telepathic and spiritistic messages. Frankly, we admit that it is often quite beyond our present ability to discriminate completely between them, but this lack of ability always to discriminate, far from weakening the testimony favorable to simple Spiritualism, only necessitates a reconsideration of the entire problem of our human constitution before we attempt to formulate an inclusive theory to explain the entire bulk of our diversified psychic experiences. A very large number of thoughtful readers have been much impressed by Thomson Jay Hudson's five celebrated books: "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," "A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life," "The Divine Pedigree of Man," "The Law of Mental Medicine," and "The Evolution of the Soul," in which the hypothesis known as the dual theory of the human mind is very fully and forcibly expounded. Professor Hudson, in common with many other able writers, labors to some extent under a burden of preconception adverse to Spiritualism, which often mars the beauty and consistency of his otherwise excellent literary work. The evidence for telepathy which this author puts forward is very strong and in some instances unimpeachable, but the alleged evidence against Spiritualism is rationally inadmissible, because it is of a singularly negative and supposititious character. We must face our problem bravely, not attempting to disguise the fact that during the past several years much evidence has accumulated in favor of simple telepathy which some over-enthusiastic Spiritualists may have been liable to undervalue because it has been erroneously supposed that, if accepted, it would tend against the interests of the cause which is nearest of all to their hearts. A better understanding of telepathy, and a fuller comprehension of what is logically involved in Hudson's "two minds" theory, may serve to set many doubters at rest. We must not forget that the title of Hudson's second book is utterly misleading and an entire misnomer, if the evidences of telepathy prove communion between friends on earth but throw no light on the condition of those who have "crossed the border." The author persistently claims that of our two minds, which he persistently designates objective and subjective, the former perishes at the time of physical dissolution, but the latter lives on and finds a sphere for fuller and more perfect functioning than it ever enjoyed on earth. This theory accounts for telepathy as a sort of foretaste of the method of communion between friendly entities which will prevail unceasingly in the future life. The only flaw that we have been able to detect in Hudson's chain of reasoning is the poor opinion he seems to entertain of the moral integrity of the subjective mind, coupled with the utterly foundationless assertion that overwhelming evidence of unrestricted telepathy will drive Spiritualists, ere long, even out of that "last ditch" in which they are now desperately fighting (according to Hudson) to save a lost cause and rescue a forlorn hope.

Reasonable identification of telepathy with direct spirit-communion, instead of introducing a new perplexity and further complicating an already complicated situation, introduces us for the first time to an orderly, harmonious, and easily comprehended interpretation of many analogous facts and parallel experiences which have long perplexed the average student of psychic phenomena, though there have always been singularly luminous exponents of mental and spiritual science and philosophy, who have gone a long distance on the road which must lead eventually to universal understanding of man as a spiritual being.

We have frequently been asked to define clearly wherein consists the difference between a message received from a friend yet on earth, and a similar communication from one who has "passed over." Spiritualistic literature has largely been encumbered with two oft-repeated phrases, "spirit return" and "spirits coming back to earth." These phrases are to a large extent misleading, for, though there are instances where such language may accurately and adequately describe the nature of certain manifestations, such expressions do not by any means correctly serve to describe the actual experiences of the great majority of seers and seeresses of ancient or modern times. Intromission to the spiritual state is a phrase full of deep significance, and, were it used more frequently, it would serve to elucidate many a problem of clairvoyance, clairaudience, clairsentience, and psychometry. Professors Denton and Buchanan, in their learned dissertations concerning psychometry, illustrated by numerous recitals of personal experience, have insisted that a true psychometer perceives the aura of an object, and can at times distinctly see into the spirit-world and become consciously en rapport with denizens thereof. Such quickened perception may fairly be considered as in some degree an anticipation of the means of intercourse we shall enjoy one with another when we have bade farewell to our robes of flesh.

We may surely claim that if we are called upon to identify those intelligent beings with whom we are in communication, we must apply the same laws of evidence to this matter as to questions of individual identification when only mundane matters are involved. To identify a fellow-being in any world is not always easy, and indeed it often is found to be extremely difficult when we rely solely on outward tests. "The hands are the hands of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob" is a vivid Scriptural instance of the extreme difficulty experienced by an ancient patriarch in deciding which of his two sons was actually in his presence. The blindness of Isaac is easily typical of the condition in which most people are found when some sort of deception is successfully practiced upon them. Evidences of two kinds are presented together. One set of evidences appeal to feeling, the other to intelligence.

We judge people very often by outward appearances which we subsequently find to have been altogether deceptive, and if it be admitted in any degree that there are deceiving spirits who sometimes visit us, we are obviously placed in precisely the same position with reference to them as with regard to persons yet on earth who play us false because we are open to deception. The difficulties attending spirit identification are not necessarily greater than those surrounding the identity of persons who are yet encased in mortal garments.

No purely external tests are always valid. Indeed, to place extreme reliance upon such alone is to encourage swindling, and play into the hands of forgers who are usually very capable of simulating perfectly the outward garb of those they seek to personate. Testimonials, references, and letters of introduction constitute no infallible criteria, as these may all be counterfeit or stolen. The only sure way to identify any one absolutely is by cultivating psychic perceptiveness, and this is more apt to be strongly developed in highly sensitive persons than in any others. Deception is, however, less likely to be practiced on the spiritual than on the material side of existence, because the motive to deceive is far less strong. Expectation of worldly gain urges most deceivers on earth to ply their nefarious vocation, and it may be safely assumed that at least ninety per cent. of all deception would vanish from the earth if no financial or other ulterior gain could accrue from it. To palm oneself off as another would be objectless folly in which very few people would care to indulge did they not think they saw in such deception a means for self-enrichment or aggrandizement.

It may with some fairness be assumed that when communicating intelligences who display only very meagre intelligence profess to be very celebrated and illustrious personages, they may be hankering for the incense of adulation, but when no great names are given and no pretentious claims are made, it is difficult to see what reason could be fairly given for simply stupid masquerading or deliberate misrepresentation of any sort. We know from experience that auto-suggestion on the part of the alleged recipient of a spiritual communication may account for some instances of falsification, especially when such self-deception tends largely to self-glorification or the gratifying of personal vanity. A great drawback to untainted spirit-communion is the prejudice and vanity of many sensitives, but this very foolishness on their part sometimes serves to reveal an aspect of truth which is frequently neglected, viz., that there may be perfect sincerity and frankness on the side of the unseen communicator, while the person to whom the communication is made may be the sole suggester of the deceptive element.

A lady in one of the Southern States of America declared that she was in direct communion with George Washington, the first President of the United States; but her friends as a rule laughed at her claim, because by means of automatic writing through the lady's hand, and by means of trance speaking through her lips, "George Washington" expressed himself most ungrammatically and in negro dialect. On a notable occasion when "George Washington" was speaking through this lady's mediumship, he was distinctly seen by a fine clairvoyant who had been invited to a seance, and at the conclusion of the address this seeress described what she had witnessed during its delivery, which was the presence of a very decided African of Ethiopian tint and cast of feature, and who appeared strongly attached to the lady through whose mediumship he had been able to deliver a lengthy message. On being requested to describe all she saw, the seeress went on to give particulars of a venerable old servant who had been named "George Washington," who had been a faithful retainer of the family prior to the Emancipation Proclamation issued in 1865, and had in that year steadily refused to accept his freedom, as he dearly loved the old estate and was devotedly attached to his master and mistress, parents of the lady through whom he was then able to communicate and whom he had often nursed during her earliest girlhood, ere he passed to spirit life, when she was not over eight years of age. That simple incident served to explain the entire problem, and it afforded a thoroughly rational explanation of a phenomenon belonging to a class, by no means uncommon in America, which have led to denunciations of fraud where none existed—theories of wicked personating spirits, and many other vagaries of unbalanced judgment—to say nothing of the would-be clever remark made by people who were more "smart" than wise, that it must be a terrible thing to die if in our post mortem condition we so quickly and sadly deteriorate. An instance like the foregoing will bear thorough sifting, and it is surely much easier to explain such an instance in the light of direct spirit communion than by straining an auto-suggestive or telepathic hypothesis to the breaking point to invent an improbable, in place of a probable, interpretation. Had the lady referred to suggested the matter to herself she would certainly have been fairly grammatical, as she was a comparatively well-educated woman, and not being a negress she would not have clothed an imaginary message from George Washington, as she conceived of him, in negro dialect. Admitting telepathy, mental telegraphy, or telephony, or aught else that is in any measure psychical, nothing can well be more likely than that a good old negro who had been for many years a faithful servant to the family residing on that particular estate, should seek an avenue of communion with it through the agency of a member to whom he had been greatly attached just before he passed into the realm of spirit.

It is doubtless true that many spirits leave the earth and all pertaining to it, very shortly after the demise of the physical body, while others remain closely connected with the scenes of their earth existence, not because they are earth-bound in the sense of being unhappy creatures who cannot, on account of their sensual vices, rise above the mundane level, but because their affections still cling to persons and places with which they have enjoyed pleasing associations up to the latest moment of their terrestrial existence. Andrew Jackson Davis, as well as Swedenborg, and many other gifted seers, have said much concerning the many spheres in this solar system encircling the various planets, which have often been numbered from one to seven, and then again divided and subdivided into circles within circles, like wheels within wheels in Ezekiel's visions; and those who have become strongly attracted to such teaching—and their name is legion—have brought forward the revelations of these prophets to disavow the declaration, made from a somewhat different standpoint, that multitudes of spirits cannot return to earth as they have not yet taken their departure from this planet's immediate atmosphere, or even from the exact localities where a large portion of their earthly days were spent in work or amusements in which they took a decided interest.

When indulging in personal reminiscences, I often narrate an instance of what seems to me clear evidence of spirit identity. When I was in Australia, in 1900–1, I frequently employed the services of a bright, enterprising young man, who was an excellent typist, and to whom I dictated portions of several books and numerous magazine articles. Before taking my last earthly farewell of this young gentleman, on the eve of his departure for New Guinea, whither he went to occupy a post of trust and influence, he said to me that he hoped when I returned to England he might accompany me on the ocean, as he much desired, though by birth an Australian, to visit the Mother Country, which, though 12,000 miles distant, is invariably called "home" by Australasians. My reply was that though I could not definitely foresee my own plans for the near future, and could, therefore, promise nothing, I held myself in full readiness to fall in with his wishes should opportunity occur to favor the carrying out of the project. Shortly after his arrival in New Guinea in full possession of health, and seemingly of vigorous constitution, he caught the local fever, and in three days he had made his exit from the mortal body. I cannot say that he was very frequently in my thoughts, or that his loss would seem to me irreparable; still there was a link of sympathy between us which evidently made it possible for him to manifest his presence to me on more than one occasion during three distinct stages of my voyage from Sydney, via New Zealand and across America, to England. The first time he attempted to make himself known to me was between Sydney and Auckland, but as I was seldom alone during the four brief days that voyage occupied I cannot remember any very definite evidence of his identity, though I was fully conscious of his presence. The second visit which I know he made me was en route to California, when I had a large cabin to myself on the Sonoma and not being much acquainted with any of my fellow passengers I had many opportunities for quiet silence and uninterrupted meditation. I well remember distinctly feeling the presence of my young friend with me, just as I had known him in Australia, and so real and tangible was the sense of that presence that it seemed exactly as though another person was sharing the cabin with me. I was quite awake, perfectly calm, and fully able to determine all he said to me, and yet I am certain I heard nothing with my external ears except the motion of the vessel passing through the water. Not only did I feel, or sense, his presence, but he gave me information concerning his situation in New Guinea, and the circumstances of his life there, which I subsequently learned, through correspondence with a mutual acquaintance, were correct in every detail. On the third occasion, when I as strongly realized his presence, I was nearing Plymouth on my voyage from New York in February, 1902, and on that occasion he gave me information concerning his present state and occupation, and told me several things in regard to my own near future, which have since been fully verified. Such definite, direct, and truthful communications certainly do not proceed from lying spirits, nor do they emanate from my own sub-self, whose reputation for veracity and sanity I am naturally interested to maintain; and when I speak a good word for my own subjective mind—which is to live hereafter when my objective mind has perished—I stand up equally for the corresponding sub-selves or subjective minds of all my neighbors. It is immeasurably more rational to maintain a reasonable spiritualistic version of such facts as I have just related than to invent, and uphold at all hazard, a contradictory and extremely complicated theory of the mysteries of telepathy, which serves to befog far more than to enlighten rational inquirers. In seeking to reply definitely to the very natural inquiry whether there is any marked difference in appearance between the psychic, or astral, body of a person yet on earth, and of one who has parted company with earthly raiments, I venture to suggest that only when the factor of clairvoyance is added to telepathy is this clearly determinable. Usually the appearance to psychic vision of one who has left the flesh is more ethereal than that of one who is still connected with it, but when only a sense of presence is realized, and intelligence is inwardly communicated, it is often impossible to decide whether the despatch in question is being received from a friend yet on earth or from one who is more frequently designated a "spirit."

Unnecessary difficulties in the way of rational spiritual identification are created by many persons who evidently mistake identity which pertains to abiding individuality for the most external incidences of ever-fluctuating exterior personality. Such questions are often raised as, "If you see my father can you describe his appearance? does he wear a beard? how is he dressed?" and much else of the same almost ridiculous character. A little sober reflection must convince the veriest tyro that such questions, answered one way or another, cannot determine identity. We all know that fashions alter and habits change with wonderful rapidity, and it is by no means difficult for a man to remove a full beard in a few moments, or let one grow in a few weeks, thereby completely altering one aspect of his appearance. Black hair easily turns white, stout persons grow thin, and slender persons become stout, very frequently, while changes wrought by passing years and varying emotions frequently suffice to render old photographs, once speaking likenesses, no longer discernible, unless to the acutest students of physiognomy. It is, however, continually declared that clairvoyants see our spirit friends as they were when we last beheld them or as they appeared when we were most intimately associated with them. And such testimony, founded as it often is on actual fact, needs to be interpreted in the light of other knowledge than that obtainable by simple and often mysterious clairvoyance. Astral pictures are often beheld in the air of old houses, where certain people have lived long periods, and to which they have become greatly attached, and these psychic photographs are often mistaken for the actual presence of departed spirits by persons who rely on sight as evidence apart from feeling or manifest intelligence. A fact in my own experience may serve to illustrate two features of this portion of the subject of spirit identity.

Some years ago I was sojourning in an old country house which had been the abiding place of a single family ever since its erection. The room assigned me as a sleeping apartment had, as I afterwards learned, been for many years the special working and reading room of a maiden aunt who had been quite a second mother to the family. In that room she had spent a great part of her time during her latest years on earth, and one of her favorite occupations was knitting stockings by the fire. For four nights in succession, during my occupancy of that room, did I see that quiet elderly lady, with knitting in her hands, seated before a fire in the grate, which was at that season of the year filled with a summer ornament. At first I thought I must be actually in communion with the kindly, placid dame, and that she might have a message to convey through me to some member of the household; but, concentrate my thoughts and attention intently as I could upon the vision, I could detect no animation, nor could I receive even the faintest intimation of intelligence. The people with whom I was residing were not at all averse to Spiritualism, and when I told them exactly what I had seen four nights in succession in that particular bedroom, they all agreed that it was an exact description of their aunt, even to the smooth bands of brown front hair, and the cap with lilac satin ribbons tied under the chin; but they, in common with myself, wondered why, if I could see their aunt so clearly, I never saw her move and could obtain no impression of her intelligence. On the fifth night of my occupancy of that apartment I experienced a totally different sensation in connection with the same apparition, which I again beheld stationary and unresponsive as before; but on this occasion, hovering over the astral picture I beheld a radiant, youthful form bearing a certain family resemblance to the abiding simulacrum, but instinct with the fire and energy of active life and operating intelligence. Contemporaneously with this new additional experience, information clearly flowed into some receptacle of my consciousness, causing me to become aware that the original of the portrait desired her nieces and nephews to find in her old writing desk certain papers she had written long ago and which she desired should be revised, edited, and published. Following the minute directions given me by this guiding intelligence, I accompanied several members of the family to a lumber room in which many discarded articles of furniture had long been stored; and there among them stood an ancient escritoire, in which we found a completed story setting forth a romantic and highly edifying history of marvelous episodes in what the world would doubtless have looked upon as a secluded and uneventful career. After this startling confirmation of the veracity of my vision, we formed a private family circle for further investigation, and thereat, by means of automatic writing, supplemented by clairvoyance, we verified many extraordinary statements made by this living relative of the family, who assured us that she was no longer sitting by a fire engaged in knitting, but most actively employed in spiritual occupations, which did not, however, alienate her in the least from her old associates but, on the contrary, kept her in close vital touch with all of them, though in a subtler and more ethereal manner than before she had quitted the material frame.

Another interesting experience of my own dates back to the autumn of 1899, shortly before my first visit to Australia. I had long known Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, but my first interview with her was in 1877, at a lecture delivered in Manchester, when she was a middle-aged woman, dressed in much the same style as she continued to adopt till she finally withdrew from the public platform. Since her passing to spirit life, this earnest worker has occasionally made herself distinctly known to me, both on and off the platform, and in November, 1899, I distinctly saw, in connection with a most forceful realization of her close proximity, the likeness of a radiant maiden with light golden curls, somewhat resembling the earliest pictures of Mrs. Richmond when she was Cora Hatch, but in no way suggesting Mrs. Britten to me by the appearance. I never could have understood that vision had I not visited Mrs. Wilkinson (Mrs. Britten's sister), about a month later, and, while her guest in Manchester, been shown a picture taken many years ago, representing Emma Hardinge in youthful costume as "Queen of the Fairies." This picture represents the young lady who afterwards became Mrs. Britten with flaxen ringlets, and in every way precisely as she showed herself to me on the occasion of my vision. Had I suggested to myself a similitude of Mrs. Britten, I should certainly have conjured up from the depths of memory a likeness of her as I had known her; and when I interrogated her spiritually through the mediumship of automatic writing, subsequent to beholding the portrait at Mrs. Wilkinson's, the following message was communicated: "I knew you were going to my sister's; therefore, I wished to give you a singular test of my identity, which I find I have succeeded in doing; and there is another reason why I showed myself to you thus—I wished to impress you with the knowledge that I can now show myself in various forms to my friends, and my present appearance far more closely resembles that of my youth on earth than that of my later age."

"How do we know each other here?" is quite as grave a question as "Shall we know each other there?" I remember some years ago, in New York, being asked by a mutual friend to meet a gentleman who was returning to America after ten years' residence in Germany, and who was described to me from a portrait as a slender man with jet black hair. And such he doubtless was when he embarked for Germany, but during the decade of years he had spent in Europe, he had grown decidedly corpulent and his hair had become positively white. I nevertheless knew him by instinct, though I had never met him previously, and I accosted him by name, greatly to his surprise, directly he had left the steamer. Had I been slavishly governed by my physical senses instead of trusting to some surer and subtler faculty of discernment, I should certainly have failed to acknowledge him, so greatly did he differ in appearance from the description I had been given of him. We cannot expect that when we change in outward aspects thus rapidly on earth, we shall remain stationary in external aspect in the world of spirits. There is, however, this to be said concerning relatively fixed appearance in the life beyond. We are not there, as here, so greatly affected by outward climate, and outer appearance changes only as it indicates alterations in our interior state. Such is the unanimous and unfaltering verdict of spiritual testifiers wherever they have made their presence known.

And now, finally, concerning the weighing of evidence in the scales of reason. We may certainly maintain in the face of all opposition that every individual communication should be judged on its particular merits, and neither be accepted nor rejected on the merits or demerits of any other submitted message. We cannot believe, unless we part company with reason, that we are victims of stupid or wicked deception in cases where the teachings given are of the highest moral import, and where the information offered is proved correct in every detail as far as we can possibly verify it. The crude and intricate theories now afloat to discredit evidence of spirit intercourse are far more difficult and far less probable than the plain satisfactory conclusion long ago reached by all intelligent and dispassionate inquirers—that we do on many occasions receive convincing proof of the identity of communicating spirits. In conclusion, let us look for an instant at the mental characteristics of a few of the typical students of psychic phenomena who during recent years have become thoroughly satisfied that in many instances, though not in all, proof positive of spirit identity has been obtained. Professor Hodgson and Mr. Myers were thoroughly satisfied at length, through Mrs. Piper's mediumship and that of other sensitives; and so were Miss Lilian Whiting and Rev. Minot J. Savage, as well as many other representative and cautious investigators. These famous persons had nothing to gain and possibly something to lose, by outspoken advocacy of Spiritualism; and in the case of Dr. Savage it is well known that his tendency of thought was decidedly agnostic, and for many years during his popular ministry in Boston he was largely a champion and exponent of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer. It is difficult to see why people should prefer the devil to their own friends who have passed beyond the mystic portals, and it surely cannot be easier for normal intellects to believe in imaginary evil demons, of whom we know practically nothing, except on unsupported hearsay, than in the presence and activity of the very people whom we have known on earth as real personages, and who reappear with their own well-known characteristics. Telepathy and all other demonstrable phases of psychic phenomena, must be freely admitted by every student of psychic science, and it has now become the imperative duty and solemn privilege of all who have knowledge in this direction to elucidate as far as possible the truthful doctrine of the close resemblance and intimate relation of telepathy to Spiritualism. Simple telepathy throws much clear light on our present spiritual abilities, and spirit communion transcends mundane telepathic experience by carrying telepathy across the unseen border into those sympathetic realms of spiritual activity where the powers and functions of our "subselves" or "subjective minds" are more fully unfolded and more freely and extensively exercised than they seemingly ever can be during terrestrial embodiment. Let us be open to all classes of evidence, and construct theories to account for facts, but never seek to squeeze facts into grooves of premeditated theory.

CHAPTER II

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF ANCIENT AND MODERN SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY

To the searcher of ancient records who endeavors to diligently compare the views entertained by philosophers of remote antiquity with those of the present time, the truth of the famous saying, "There is nothing new under the sun," is forced home with remarkable force of demonstration, for notwithstanding the claims for novelty and the boasts of originality which meet a student at every turn, whenever we candidly compare the newest theories with the oldest, we soon discover that the new are very old and the old are very new.

This discovery, far from disheartening, should greatly encourage our endeavors to find a common basis for philosophy rooted deeply in the essential constitution of humanity, therefore capable of subsisting through all ages and reappearing on the surface of human thought periodically, as wave after wave of spiritual excitement testifies to the working of a cyclic law in the history of human progress.

Spiritual philosophy is truly Spiritualism as properly distinguished from Materialism and Agnosticism, its only two serious competitors. Spiritual philosophers base all their conclusions upon certain fundamental premises, first among which is the cardinal postulate of SPIRIT. Whether INFINITE INTELLIGENCE or any other specific term be now employed to designate the ABSOLUTE REALITY, the fundamental premise must always be an acknowledgment of INFINITE ETERNAL LIFE, supreme consciousness, beyond all comprehension, yet surely apprehended by human intuition and revealed in measure to human understanding.

It is idle to speculate concerning the UNCONDITIONED ABSOLUTE, as we are living in realms of relativity and can only deal with finite concepts and limited experiences, yet are we compelled to predicate the illimitable, no matter whether we name the Infinite or leave the Infinite unnamed.

Herbert Spencer, who is always ranked as a foremost agnostic, did not hesitate to say that philosophers had always been divided into schools of Materialists and Spiritualists, some interpreting universal phenomena in terms of Spirit, others in terms of Matter.

It is not the object of the writer of these pages to enter upon any labored endeavor to refute materialistic statements seriatim, but rather to present in consecutive order, as far as possible, some reasons for faith in the spiritual nature of the universe which render invalid all denial or negation of human immortality. And even should it be contended that no philosophy explains all facts or solves all problems, granting that such an assertion be correct, the acceptance of its verity by no means necessitates our acceptance of a philosophy which accounts for fewer instead of embracing one which explains satisfactorily a much larger number of the facts with which we are all compelled to wrestle, if we seek to solve the problem of existence with the aid of any working hypothesis.

We find ourselves in an objective world, but in a subjective region also. We experience much through our five external senses which, however, we can by no means limit, therefore such terms as clairvoyance, clairsentience, psychometry, and other words coined to express our consciousness of enlarged perceptions and experiences, are quite as much a part of a legitimate vocabulary as the much commoner words, sight, hearing, feeling and other terms universally employed to designate experiences of which all average human beings in normal condition are unmistakably conscious.

Nothing can be more self-evident than that our range of observation is practically limitless, for no one can decide how much wider or narrower may be another's range of observation than his own. We speak glibly enough of five senses, and talk of sight, hearing, taste, touch and smell, and unless some of us are abnormally deficient in common faculties we all understand well enough what is meant by the terms we so familiarly employ. But when asked how much do we see, hear, taste, touch or smell, an amazing difference is found to exist among seemingly normal individuals, so much so that anything like an average extent of knowledge obtainable through the five universally acknowledged avenues seems almost impossible to reach.

Once let this admission, which is actually self-evident, be estimated at something like its adequate worth, and we shall cease to cavil and demur when told of seers and seeresses who see, or otherwise become conscious of, far more subtle phenomena than meet the ordinary gaze of the average man, woman or child.

To the average human being of to-day, living in a state of so-called civilization, and engaged in ordinary secular employments, a spiritual realm seems an unknown if not an unknowable region. And it cannot be truthfully asserted that the rank and file of religious teachers are much more open to conscious acquaintance with the realm of Spirit, than is the bulk of the laity whom clergy seek to instruct in spiritual mysteries.

A very large proportion of religious leaders rest all their vaunted knowledge of a spiritual universe and a spiritual revelation upon doubtful historic evidences, many of which are now seriously discredited in scientific circles. Though modern biblical criticism is often unreasonably iconoclastic, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it does certainly seem reasonable to deny that events of a highly mysterious character ever occurred in the past if such are never duplicated in the present. And it cannot be denied that a large section of the Christian Church has resolutely contended against all claims to a present-day revelation, while insisting upon the verbal accuracy of every biblical record of spiritual manifestations which occurred 1,800 or considerably more years ago.

It must of necessity be extremely difficult to verify facts many of which are said to be 2,000, 3,000, and even more years old, particularly when we are told that nothing like them can take place to-day. But no sooner is such an insane position abandoned and a reasonable doctrine of the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation substituted, than the chief objections vanish and the greatest difficulties are dispelled. Not one Bible only, but many Bibles must be searched and studied side by side before we can fairly claim to be acquainted, even in barest outline, with the bulk of testimony which long ages have afforded to substantiate the primal claim of all Spiritualists, that we as human beings are not mere mortal existences, but immortal entities clad a while in mortal garb.

Our first enquiry must be into the nature of humanity itself, then let us proceed to points of variation which serve to distinguish individuals and races from each other. Every human being, so far as we have opportunity to judge, is endowed with affection, desire to live, and many other distinctly universal attributes which humanity does not, however, exclusively possess, as the entire animal kingdom gives evidences of sharing these emotions.

Evolutionists of the materialistic school, headed by Prof. Ernst Haeckel of Germany, lay much stress upon the fact that many animals (dogs especially) display qualities which we are accustomed to call moral, and if we claim immortal life for human beings, we must be prepared to concede some future existence for the higher animals as well as for ourselves.

With such a proposition, thus mildly stated, we are prepared to take no issue, and were that doctrine the summing up of Haeckel's teachings, we should offer no protest against conclusions reached in "The Riddle of the Universe." But its author emphatically denies that there is a true human entity or a persistent soul surviving physical dissolution, either in man or animal. It is not with any affirmative declaration concerning animals, but with negative statements concerning humanity that we take decisive issue.

If certain animals are conscious of yearnings after continued life, and are capable of sharing and enjoying it, they will certainly have their portion in a state beyond the grave; but to grant continued existence for certain animals is in no sense to deny, or even to call in question, human immortality.

With the purely philosophic view of immortality, beginningless and endless individual life as proclaimed by Socrates, according to Plato, comparatively few modern Spiritualists attempt to deal, although there are some who declare with the world-renowned Cora L. V. Richmond, that inspiring intelligences of great experience and profound wisdom affirm that the soul is an "eternal finite entity." Be this as it may, we can none of us deny that the doctrine of preëxistence as well as future existence has been taught by illustrious seers and sages in almost every age and clime. And this fact is vouched for by Dr. J. M. Peebles and other veteran Spiritualists who belong to a school which opposes the doctrine of repeated embodiments of the soul, and does not hesitate to attack vigorously the views of many prominent Theosophists.

On all points of speculative philosophy, both as concerns man's past and future, it appears that there is as much difference in the spirit-world as there is on earth, if we may credit the testimony which the ages have brought concerning teachings received from the other side of the mortal veil which hangs between the earth and spheres of existence capable of manifesting individual life through other than physical vehicles. But on one point all spiritual testimony seems agreed, viz. : that life on the inner side of the mystic veil is subject to the same great universal law which regulates the course of individual existence on the outer earth.

Human nature is not changed by death, for death only removes an outer covering (the most external sheath of personality) leaving the entity and its psychic vehicle entirely unmolested. Shakespeare's expression "When we have shuffled off this mortal coil" has never been improved. As centuries roll on and testimonies accumulate concerning spiritual existence, we can still revert to Hamlet and ponder over the marvelous insight displayed in that immortal tragedy.

The description of Hamlet's father clad in armor is one of those unmistakable evidences of world-wide belief in the actual objectivity of the psychic realm which crops out wherever any attempt is made to vividly portray a condition beyond death; and though there are, to some minds, grave difficulties connected with this dominant and everlastingly persistent faith, it is, when closely analyzed, found to be entirely rational and in complete accordance with all that we have a right to expect.

In Shakespeare's day belief in purgatory was undoubtedly strongly ingrained in the mind of the British nation, even though the Protestant reformers had vigorously inveighed against it, and the thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England distinctly repudiates what it styles the "Romish" form of the doctrine.

But theological disputes aside, the idea of suffering for purposes of spiritual purification beyond the grave is common to all religious and philosophical systems at their base, though there have often been times when a reactionary movement has set in against a reasonable doctrine, in consequence of perversions and abuses such as the "sale of indulgences," which at one time gave great scandal in many parts of Europe. But protest as we may against accretions which may be fairly termed excrescent, we are not justified in casting any slur upon the essentials of a doctrine which is at root reasonable and moral in the extreme.

Hamlet's father had been a good king, a faithful ruler beloved and honored by his subjects, and it seems at the first glance not quite fair that he should be a sufferer in the unseen world, because it was only Hamlet's mother and uncle who had committed grievous wrong. It takes but a very little psychic insight, however, to perceive that Shakespeare was teaching forcibly the all-important truth that no spiritual rest or bliss is possible while thirst for vengeance vitiates the heart.

Hamlet's father was seeking, so the tragedy declares, to force his son to be revenged upon his wife and brother, but though those individuals had proved guilty of atrocious crimes, there could be no peace for the spirit which haunted earth with such an object in view as that of working bitter, even though not unjust, retaliation.

Recompense is meted out to all by infinite equity, and it is sound doctrine that assures us that we are rewarded by our virtues and afflicted by our vices. But let the mills of destiny do their own most perfect grinding, it is not for us to interfere, and we cannot seek to interfere, without wrecking our own happiness, with the outworking of the changeless plan which causes every word, deed, and even secret thought, to be its own rewarder or avenger.

The armor worn on the psychic plane by the spirit who is still in will a warrior, describes with glowing accuracy a fundamental proposition of universal Spiritual philosophy, a truth attested by every seer and sage who has spoken definitely on the mighty subject of the relation of subjective causes to exterior effects.

When the old English poet, Spencer, in his "Faerie Queen," tells us

> "The soul is form, and doth the body make,
> For of the soul the body form doth take," that bard of olden days, with keen spiritual discernment such as poets frequently make manifest, found himself far more knowing in the realm of deep philosophy than his illustrious nineteenth century namesake, the philosophic Spencer, who found a mighty obstacle in the world's perpetual belief in what he called "the immortality of clothing."

The plastic substance of the psychic plane, which is matter of a less gross grade than that of the external earth, lends itself far more readily than does the grosser sort to every psychical emotion. Therefore have the seers of all ages informed us that the state of conscious existence which survives physical embodiment, and is the next state following immediately upon the present, does not differ very radically from the earthly plane in any important particular.

The concensus of statement among seers and sages may be summed up in a single sentence used by Dr. Lyman Abbott many years ago, "We do not die and live again, we simply go on living." And long after that phrase had become familiar, as an expression in harmony with what was at one time called "new progressive orthodoxy" came the monumental work of Prof. Frederick W. H. Myers, bearing the title "Human Personality, its survival of bodily death." In the course of two massive volumes extending to 1,360 pages, that able, conscientious, tireless worker in the field of "psychical research" gave to the world as a most valuable legacy, a carefully kept record of experiences extending over from twenty to thirty years, during which long period Prof. Myers was a co-investigator with Sir Wm. Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and many other illustrious men of brilliant scientific attainments who never hesitated to bend their best energies to an enquiry into the mysteries of what the gifted journalist and author Wm. Stead calls "Borderland."

And it is along the border line between two planes of conscious activity, often called two worlds, that most modern investigations in the psychic field are industriously conducted. Beyond the border, few seek, or dare, or even know how to venture. The typical Spiritualist who prizes phenomena and delights in "tests," no matter how conscientious and upright he or she may be, seeks and finds only the fringe of the border of that immeasurable spiritual universe which stretches to infinity.

With all becoming modesty, therefore, scientific explorers claim to be agnostic regarding what lies very far ahead of immediate conditions directly connected with ordinary life on earth. Beautiful and blessed are the consolations, and valuable indeed the lessons which borderland experiences can teach, but there are adventurers, bold enquirers, intrepid souls who falter not because of difficulty or of danger, who have in all ages (and their race is not extinct to-day), crossed the mystic bar, transcended the occult threshold, and sailed forth upon the unfathomed ocean of transcendentally spiritual existence.

Such are the Illuminati, the master-spirits to whom we are assuredly indebted for the highest instruction to be found in the world's many bibles whose arcane significance remains unguessed by the teeming multitudes who con the letter but seek not to crack the shells of spiritual nuts, for they dream not of the delicious and nutritious meat within. As we trace the history of spirit-communion through the ages, we shall catch occasional glimpses of a dazzlingly fair transcendent realm beyond, though very often our eyes will be directed only to the border and what lies just beyond our present physical existence.

CHAPTER III

DIFFERING ASPECTS OF SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY—THE RIGHTEOUS CLAIMS OF EGOISM AND OF ALTRUISM

QUITE recently the statement has appeared in public print that in addition to the "Iron" rule of conduct which bids us render evil for evil; the "Silver" rule which counsels us to return good for good; and the "Golden" rule which urges that good be rendered in exchange for evil, there is still another rule which should be the guide of all who accept modern spiritual philosophy, a "Diamond" rule which exhorts us to do "all for others." Beautiful and ennobling though the sentiment may be which is couched in such uncompromisingly altruistic language, there seems room for dispute as to whether such a precept is truly practical or altogether desirable. The charms of altruism consist in its avowed unselfishness, and we are often told that to be saintly we must be selfless. But is this counsel entirely sound? Will it stand the test of rigorous investigation, or is there somewhere a defect which renders it less than perfectly satisfactory? Egoism is doubtless far more ancient than altruism; it is indeed the most primitive of all philosophies, entrenched as it is in that stronghold of self-preservativeness which is the primal instinct of every living creature. "I must protect myself," says every form of animate existence, and human entities offer no exception to the universal rule. Egotism is a corrupted and insufferably conceited form of egoism and does not rank among philosophies, therefore we need not now discuss it, but simple egoism or individualism must be reckoned with as a permanent factor directing human conduct. Altruism is extremely difficult to comprehend though mutualism, which is pure philanthropy, is readily comprehended. Even Tolstoi, the most nearly altruistic of all great characters now in the public eye, must pay some heed to his own requirements or even he could not sustain existence on the earthly plane. But the question evidently raised by advocates of the "Diamond" precept is can we not still care for ourselves but only because we know that by so doing we are helping others? The answer is readily given that we can, but this granted is it not well to inspect our motives a little closely and put ourselves on guard against exaggerated statements which may lead us unconsciously into the quagmire of hypocrisy. That there may be a few exceptional individuals who do all with a view to the good of others is quite conceivable, but we need, when formulating a practical philosophy, to adapt it to the rank and file of honest aspiring human beings, not to render it acceptable only to a very small minority of exceptionally spiritualized individuals. A highly respected English bishop, late of the See of Peterborough, said that the "Sermon on the Mount" was never intended for ordinary humanity but exclusively for special disciples who, to use theological language, had been called to transcend the way of the commandments and walk in the narrower path of the counsels of perfection. That there is some justification for that view cannot be gainsaid when we remember the peculiar circumstances amid which the body of doctrine thus designated is said to have been enunciated, and research into earlier and contemporary literature by no means disposes of the idea that exceptional teachers sometimes gave exceptional teaching to exceptional disciples. The doctrine of extreme non-resistance advocated in such familiar sayings as "whoever would deprive you of your coat let him have your cloak also" and "whoever would compel you to go one mile, go with him two miles" is susceptible of more than a single interpretation. It therefore becomes us to endeavor to grasp the widest possible application of such counsels if we profess any regard for their authority.

With the state of the Roman world and the Jewish people eighteen or nineteen centuries ago we are not now immediately concerned. We cannot, however, afford to entirely neglect historic features if we are to clearly grasp the genuinely practical import of teachings which are said to constitute the original basis of Christian ethics. Judea was a Roman province and Cæsar's eagles were displayed in Jerusalem as a sign of Roman supremacy at the beginning of the Christian era. Then, as in many later as well as earlier times, certain Jews were extremely ready to take up arms and fight to rescue Zion from servitude to Rome. The more spiritually-minded teachers in a community are always averse to warfare, and the wisest among them, owing to deep spiritual penetration, are able to clearly foretell the literal uselessness as well as barbarity of a fierce material contest. They consequently use their utmost endeavors to proclaim a policy of non-resistance by brute force, but they never hesitate to advocate mental and moral resistance to iniquity. The over-valuation of material things leads many a man and woman to think very highly of the surrender of coats and cloaks and all sorts of material goods and chattels, which in the eyes of seers and sages are of very little value. A neighbor may be in destitute circumstances and require certain garments of which you have an over-supply. Let him have them if he wants them, says the spiritual master, but never give up your honor. Your extreme generosity may win for you the good-will of many who would be otherwise your persecutors; your readiness to make even more innocent concessions to your reputed foes than they demand may obtain for you their good opinion and prevent cruel massacres. Seeing that there are many sacrifices you can make without lowering your moral standard, make them in a spirit of true philanthropy and thereby you may convert enemies into friends, oppressors into advocates. Such counsel is sound as well as politic and reflects the highest possible credit upon whoever may have been the first to announce it to the world. The only possible controversy concerning such magnificent and thoroughly practical doctrine centers around the comparatively unimportant question whether the hero of the Christian gospels was or was not the original enunciator of so sublime a set of precepts. Many Jews who highly endorse the sentiment attributed to Jesus, declare that Jewish literature much older than the beginning of the Christian era emphasizes the same vital rule of conduct. Students of Indian philosophy also come forward with a similar declaration concerning Buddhistic teaching which antedated the origin of the gospel manuscripts by several centuries. Historical research alone is competent to deal with controversies of such a nature, but it is clear to the eye of all impartial students that no really important point is raised by such discussion as to the ethical value of the doctrine submitted for consideration. Judging from the recent action of a widely advertised "Interchurch" movement which has excluded Unitarians from fellowship one can see that it may be considered vital in the interests of strictly orthodox Christian theology to separate the teachings attributed to Jesus entirely from all other counsels given to mankind, for by so doing support may be seemingly lent to the doctrine of exclusive divinity claimed for the great Master of Christendom, but aside from the peculiar interests of controversial theology there is nothing gained, and possibly much lost, by insisting that in one collection of valuable scriptures alone can we discover the highest moral guidance. To the universal religionist it is a source of delight to discover that the very highest standard of morality has been upheld in many lands, in many ages, by many illumined teachers, and surely in days when the frightful effects of religious bigotry are so awfully manifest that American citizens and British subjects regardless of creed, when imbued with the spirit of humanity, have sought to induce the President of the United States and representatives of British authority to urge upon the Russian government the necessity of putting an immediate stop to outrages upon unoffending Jews inspired by race prejudice and religious fanaticism of the worst imaginable sort, it will prove a boon to all humanitarians if scholars can give the Christian world to understand that the noble and glorious rules of conduct emphasized in gospel records are not to be found in the New Testament alone but are the common heritage of enlightened humanity conveyed through the illumined and inspiring seers and sages of every race and age. We hear very much in these days about the relation between religion and business and it is well that pulpits ring with protests against commercial dishonesty and that preachers urge upon congregations everywhere the supreme importance of a spiritual life which can be lived every hour of every day, every day in every year. "Tainted money" and "frenzied finance" are phrases which many seek to conjure with and doubtless much that is extravagant is often said when these highly sensational topics are being passionately dealt with, but the great cause for thankfulness in this generation is that there is a palpable renaissance of morals now everywhere in evidence. Mammon worship is going out of date. The still mighty dollar is no longer believed to be almighty and a sense of responsibility towards moral order is surely taking the place of conscienceless search for naught but material gain. Nothing is so pleasing or so hopeful, nothing so cheering to the heart of genuine philanthropists as to note how increasingly sensitive the public conscience is assuredly becoming. Churches are doing much good work in this direction, but the ethical sentiment is quite apart from all ecclesiastical affiliations and is demonstrating its sovereignty in many movements which are founded upon no dogmatic theological basis. The work of Felix Adler of New York, and all associated with him in the interests of simply Ethical Culture, which is entirely distinct from any special kind of theology, is quite sufficient to convince all who use their reasoning faculties to-day that in church and out of church, in college and out of college, men, women, youths and maidens are beginning to feel intensely that the mere holding of great wealth is no passport to the esteem of right-minded people anywhere. We know it can be argued, and it often is, that John D. Rockefeller, Andrew Carnegie, and other multimillionaires are almost worshiped wherever they appear, even if it be at a Bible class, but it ought not to be overlooked that the chief cause for admiring those unquestionably remarkable men is the prevalent belief that they have been more industrious and have evinced more intellectual ability than have the bulk of their contemporaries. It is not necessary to prove whether such a belief in those particular instances is well-founded or ill-founded, the fact remains that that section of the public which almost adores the very wealthy individual of to-day professes to see in the object of its veneration not so much money as enterprising will and intellectual ability.

Now comes the higher standard. We have worshiped intellect too much; we are seeing that intellect alone can be cruel, unjust, tyrannical, and from cold intellectuality we are turning our affection towards a purely spiritual type of morality. By spirituality should never be meant sentimental piety, which is the very reverse of heroic piety, but that true saintliness which is soundness, symmetry, holiness in the true meaning of the term. "Do all for others" sounds well and it contains the germ of a mighty truth, but it is an ill-chosen sentence by reason of its non-applicability in its obvious form to the actual nature of humanity. The American Declaration of Independence signed in 1776 served a needed purpose then, and still contains much that is permanently valuable, but were we to draw up a declaration now we might frame it around the greater word interdependence which truly embodies the idea of righteous fellowship between nations as well as individuals.

Selfishness and unselfishness, or selflessness, are words which are pitted against each other as though one was entirely wrong and the other entirely right. The utterly selfish person (if he exist) is a monster not a normal human being, while the utterly unselfish or selfless person conveys the idea of one who is impracticable. Self-culture is certainly not selfishness, but it springs in measure, though not entirely, from self-regard and it seems almost impossible to draw such very subtle lines as would need to be drawn in economic teaching if a class in social science and political economy had to be taught by a professor of sociology from the standpoint of unqualified altruism. The mutualistic position is sane, safe, sound, sensible, and has the great merit of being easily understood. If any thoroughgoing altruist assumes the middle way of Mutualism to be a "compromise" then it is not for him to theoretically advocate it, but even he will discover, sooner or later, that as no radical or essential change can be expected to take place in human nature his efforts will be productive of far less generous fruit than those of his equally conscientious, though less sentimental, neighbor who unblushingly acknowledges that he takes human nature as he finds it and deals with it accordingly. Self-interest itself is not the shocking vice which altruists infer it to be, nor are we obliged to mourn over inate depravity before commencing to instruct young people in mutual obligations, for many more unkind and unjust deeds are performed thoughtlessly than with malice aforethought; and because we know this to be so we are not so depressed and weighed down with a sense of the world's exceeding sinfulness as are many of our "altruistic" neighbors. We do not see in simple self-love a sin but only a natural instinct, not the highest or sublimest instinct of humanity, only the earliest and most rudimentary, a good and tangible instinct nevertheless and one which Swedenborg has assured us continues to inhere in even the celestial angels who are human beings entirely regenerated according to Swedenborg's philosophy and theology. As members one of another let us seek to live up even to the altitude of the Beatitudes. "Blessed are the pure in heart" and "Blessed are the peacemakers" are two of the loveliest, truest, and most inspiring sentences in any literature. For beauty and simplicity of statement they are decidedly unsurpassed and they may fairly be selected as among the choicest gems in the casket of ethical philosophy. It remains then only to consider what may be reasonably intended when those great sayings are set forward as "counsels of perfection." When a distinguished bishop of the English Church said that business could not be conducted in strict conformity with the Sermon on the Mount he merely resorted to Jesuitical casuistry, and this every Jesuit teacher will admit, for Jesuits have never hesitated to declare that there are lower than saintly standards of morality which can be safely tolerated in the secular state though a much higher rule must prevail among all who give themselves up to a technically "religious" life. The same distinction is made in India among Brahmans, and this is freely admitted by Annie Besant in articles which appeared in the Theosophical Review during the summer of 1905, at a time when the terrible war then raging between Russia and Japan called forth protest of the most vigorous kind against warfare in all directions. Katherine Tingley, from "Lomaland" in Southern California, inveighed against all justification of warfare and in her very interesting and instructive periodical New Century Path she called attention to the self-evident, but often unheeded, fact that war is not simply an outlet for impurities in the planet's body as many Theosophists and others not unreasonably aver, but it is a means of generating fresh disease, and from that standpoint it is certainly well for us to regard it. Children are brought up to fight, they are taught the brutal art of physical self-defense, to call which "manly" is absurd because every animal practices it and there can be nothing distinctly human in doing what every quadruped does also. Henry George in his masterly work "The Science of Political Economy" has called needed attention to a greatly neglected aspect of this vast theme, for he teaches unequivocally that we know ourselves to be truly human only by discovering and exercising super-animal traits. We all know that warships and guns have long been blessed by prelates, that weapons of warfare are taken to church services and that arms are presented by soldiers at the most solemn moment in a Military Mass even in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City. But there are some people among us who are daring to hope that new thought may lead to new action and that these old practices which are supported by ages of established precedent may in the present century become defunct. True it is that a Boy's Brigade conducted by clergymen of the English church may teach boys who belong to it useful lessons in obedience and self-restraint and they may be much better situated with a view to general moral training than are soldiers generally in barracks, but it is a poor comment on established Christianity with all its vaunted following of the "Prince of Peace" that it can show no higher than a military ideal to the unchurched and unchristianized multitudes. Complaints are constantly made of an alleged decline in religion based upon the supposed extreme self-seeking of this age, but despite all gloomy views, which some facts seem largely to substantiate, the bright side of the present outlook is clearly manifest to all who take adequate account of the earnest protest against iniquity and the outcry for justice and humanity which has never been louder or stronger than it is to-day. The signs of the times at present point unfalteringly to the opening of a dispensation of clearer light and fuller equity than the world has yet enjoyed within any historic period, and to usher in the glad new age the ancient trumpet sound is heard anew: Love thy neighbor as thyself. Than this there is no higher precept, for herein we trace the true meeting place of science with religion, a genuinely synthetic philosophy satisfying alike the conscience and the reason of the human race, blending self-improvement with loving service devoted to the good of all. Such we claim is the unanimous teaching of illumined teachers Oriental and Occidental, ancient and modern alike.

CHAPTER IV

THE SPIRITUAL FAITH OF ANCIENT EGYPT

THANKS to the enterprising spirit of the present enquiring age, we need not remain in serious doubt as to what was the faith of those mysterious ancient people who were old as a nation long before the Joseph of the Pentateuch was appointed to high station under one of the Pharaohs, native princes of Mizraim. Though the very greatest interest has long centred in a single monument, the Great Pyramid at Gizeh, whose splendid and exact mathematical proportions are still a living wonder to the chief among modern Egyptologists, it is by no means a thankless task to wander far from that unique structure, which stands unrivaled, internally if not externally, among the world's discovered monuments, and gaze upon the numerous erections which thickly stud the Delta of the Nile, all bearing testimony to the faith and life of a mighty and curious people who largely influenced Greece, and through Greece the entire civilized world, after their own supremacy among nations had been utterly extinguished.

"The Book of the Dead," which contains an enormous mass of fascinating information for students of ancient beliefs and customs, can now be obtained in a partly English dress without much difficulty, and it is from that extraordinary volume that we can gather enough concerning ancient Egypt to familiarize us pretty thoroughly with the Egpytian theory of the soul and its transmigrations entertained long before the period of the Israelitish Exodus.

The remarkable silence of the Old Testament concerning the state of the departed soul is not so much due to the materialistic tenor of early Hebrew thought as to the close acquaintance with Egyptian Eschatology which undoubtedly prevailed among the people who were led by Moses out of Egypt to found a new nation in Palestine.

Though considerable superstition, some of it beautiful and some of it repellent, attaches to this old body of doctrine, it has for the most part a noble moral tendency, as the entire philosophy of a future life elaborated in ancient Egypt exalts character far above belief; and the influence of this early faith upon the Jewish mind is easily traced by even the most casual reader of the Pentateuch. Life was in ancient Egypt, exactly as it was in later Palestine, a continuous round of religious duties. The universe was regarded as living, and all the forces of Nature were looked upon as spiritual agencies. Therefore there was no atheism or infidelity, and very little scepticism, rationalism, or agnosticism among Egyptians, and there is very little among their descendants to-day. The average Christian from Europe or America has an utterly false idea of Solar worship, and also of Sex worship, two of the very oldest forms of worship of which any traces have been found; and though boasting of exceptional culture, and the possession of a perfect divine revelation, Christian nations until very recently have been engulfed in superstitions of a materialistic type, such as pagan peoples never entertained.

William Rounseville Alger in his long famous work, "The Destiny of the Soul; A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life" informs us that the ancient Egyptians can only be understood, as to their views concerning a future existence, when we have comprehended the motives which led them to lay the immense stress they laid on embalming the dead. Contrary to many widespread opinions favoring the gratuitous assumption that in early Egypt belief in a literal physical resuscitation of the corpse prevailed we are led, alike by analogy and testimony, to conclude that the Egyptian theory of resurrection was far more nearly in accord with some modern ideas attributed to Theosophists than with the old school orthodox Christian conception of a literal physical re-animation. Herodotus declares that the Egyptians of old believed that after the dissolution of the flesh the soul passed through a round of transmigrations, and eventually reassumed a physical human body, but not the same body that it had laid aside. This is an ancient view of reincarnation, a doctrine which in one or other of its varied aspects is constantly cropping out in modern literature and laying hold upon popular thought.

The body which was embalmed was always seriously mutilated; the brain was extracted, and the skull stuffed with cotton. A most important section of the anatomy was therefore unpreserved. This fact alone is sufficient to prove that the resurrection of the identical physical structure was not a primitive Egyptian anticipation. The real object of embalming may fairly, in general outline, be stated as follows:

While the practice of embalming was clearly not connected with any idea of a future physical resuscitation, it was intended to keep constantly in vision the images of the departed, much as we employ portraits and statues without the slightest expectation that our departed friends will incarnate within them; though it is quite generally believed in India that sacred images do, in a certain sense, possess magical qualities, and that they furnish links of communion, more or less direct, between us and those who are represented by the images. Therein is a mild explanation of much that is commonly called idolatry, a view which frees a good portion of idolatrous practice from actually reprehensible associations. This view, now quite widely entertained by students of Oriental beliefs and practices, furnishes a considerable clue to the Egyptian customs of embalming, which were by no means confined to human bodies, but extended to all venerated animals, a fact clearly attested by the presence of mummied cats in the British Museum in London.

Modern research among Egyptian antiquities is revealing with constantly increasing clearness the spirit of the religion of that curious ancient land whose extant monuments furnish overwhelming evidence in favor of the doctrine of immortality couched in the symbolic language of figurative art. Cats, dogs, beetles, and other "sacred" creatures were not probably venerated to the extent that comparatively modern Christian critics have supposed, but they were undoubtedly used as reminders of certain definite qualities, and often regarded as links with some of the lesser divinities. Mummy-cases are, in very many instances, profusely decorated with scenes intended to represent the experiences of souls in Hades (an inclusive term intended to include many varied conditions of post-mortem existence, ranging from very gloomy to almost glorious states). The god Thoth is frequently described leading the soul into Amen, the underworld in which souls polluted by grievous sins suffer greatly, but which holds no terrors for those who have led pure lives. The soul of the newly departed is often represented kneeling and inter-ceding before the forty-two assessors of Osiris. The final trial takes place in the Hall of Two Truths, one of which approves, and the other condemns. Another name is the Hall of Dual Justice, which metes out rewards and penalties. Three divinities, Horus, Anubis, and Thoth, weigh every soul in an unvarying balance. In one scale an image of a female divinity is placed, in the other a heart-shaped vase, symbolizing the heart of the departed with all the actions of the earthly life. Thoth notes the results on a tablet, and the soul advances with it to the foot of the throne of Osiris, who pronounces sentence, which his assistants execute. A condemned soul, one whose evil acts outweigh the good, is either sent back immediately to be re-born as a repulsive animal or reptile, or driven into the atmosphere at the mercy of the tempests, till all sins are expiated; after which another terrestrial human life begins.

Unacceptable though this doctrine may be to some modern philosophers, it is immeasurably superior to any view of endless useless torment such as many benighted Christian theologians have proclaimed, for the simplest reasoning must suffice to prove that any penalty which ultimately uplifts the one who undergoes it may be benevolent at core, while unending misery is a conception for which there is neither rational explanation nor apology.

Ancient Egyptian theories of cosmogony are distinctly worthy of consideration, particularly in consequence of the side-light they throw upon the familiar accounts in Genesis. The divisions of the universe popularly accepted in the Egypt of long ago included the earth, considered as a place of trial where all live a probationary existence, and an atmosphere in which all sins are punished, and where all offenses may be expiated. The spiritual realm is described as a serene blue sky where the blessed dwell in peace and happiness imperturbable.

Many allusions to Egyptian beliefs are discoverable in several of St. Paul's epistles, and his mention of the "Prince of the Powers of the Air" clearly refers to some continuation in early Christian thought of a primitive Egyptian belief in Pooh the ruler of the realm of storms and the overseer of souls in penance. The sun is always conceived of in Egyptian theology as the central sphere of life and the abode of the mightiest of deities, and all planets are regarded as spiritual spheres robed awhile in physical habiliments, much as human souls are robed in forms of exterior matter during certain periods in their history.

The number 12 figures very largely in Egyptian symbolism the upper realm of spiritual existence being divided into twelve sections, at the entrance to each of which a sentinel-divinity is stationed. To each of these gods the newly arrived soul must present satisfactory credentials or it cannot pass the portal. The twelve sections of the higher realm correspond with the twelve day hours, while the twelve sections of the lower realm correspond with the twelve hours of night; the holy hours ranging from six A. M. to six P. M., the unholy from six P. M. to six A. M.

The picturesque and highly impressive symbolism connected with the venerable Sun-worship which found its central home in Egypt through many generations, served to impress upon the public mind the idea that this is indeed a spiritual universe, and though the esoteric theories and customs which prevailed among the populace suggested geocentric rather than heliocentric astronomy, every student of the inscriptions upon the ancient papyri, and the still older monuments, cannot fail to discern a far wiser and immeasurably sublimer view of universal order than could possibly be gathered from a simple investigation of those superficial modes of thought and practice which characterized the belief and practice of the uninitiated multitudes. Astronomy and astrology (the two were never separated) constituted a vital part of Egyptian theology, for the stars were regarded literally as spiritual orbs dressed in material garments, a concept which raises the ancient science of astrology to a place of dignity which it can never enjoy in modern days until its essential propositions have been entirely rescued from fanatical and fatalistic accretions. Though some authors tell us that the great planets were anciently regarded as deities, we may not find sufficient grounds for accepting that assertion without some discount. A better definition, and one far less liable to serious dispute, is that the various planets were regarded as homes of deities who presided over the life of the worlds placed under their immediate charge.

Wm. R. Alger rightly says, "There was much poetic beauty and ethical power in these doctrines and symbols. The necessity of virtue, the dread ordeals of the grave, the certainty of retribution, the mystic circuits of transmigration, a glorious immortality, the paths of planets, gods and souls through creation, all were impressively enounced dramatically shown. The solemn linking of the fate of man with the astronomic universe, this grand blending of the deepest of moral doctrines with the most august of physical sciences, plainly betrays the brain and hand of that ancient world." "That such a system of belief was too complex and elaborate to have been a popular development is evident, but that it was really held by the people there is no room to doubt. Parts of it were publicly enacted on festival days by multitudes numbering more than 100,000. Parts of it were dimly shadowed out in the secret recesses of temples, surrounded by the most astonishing accompaniments that unrivalled learning, skill, wealth, and power could contrive. Its authority commanded the allegiance, its charm fascinated the imagination of the people. Its force built the pyramids, and enshrined whole generations of Egypt's embalmed population in richly adorned sepulchres of everlasting rock. Its substance of esoteric knowledge and faith, in its form of exoteric exhibition gave it vitality and endurance long. In the vortex of change and decay it sank at last, and now it is only after its secrets have been buried for thirty centuries that the exploring genius of modern times has brought its hidden hieroglyphics to light, and taught us what were the doctrines originally contained in the altar-lore of those priestly schools which once dotted the plains of the Delta, and studded the banks of eldest Nile, where now, disfigured and gigantic, the solemn

> 'Old Sphinxes lift their countenances bland, > Athwart the river sea, and sea of sand.'"

CHAPTER V

INFLUENCE OF EGYPTIAN THOUGHT ON JEWISH VIEWS OF IMMORTALITY

THOUGH it has been boldly asserted in some quarters on many occasions that until after the return of the Jews from exile in Babylon, they, as a people, entertained no clearly defined belief in a future life, such a declaration appears incredible in the light of Israel's general history, and the extremely large amount of Egyptian influence which entered into the composition of early Jewish doctrines. Judaism has been from its inception a moral system of faith and practice, laying far more stress upon a righteous life than upon any amount of simple creed or doctrine, and it stands to reason that so eminently ethical a faith as that of Israel must appear, in the eyes of many, to undervalue the extreme stress laid upon a future existence which has characterized a very large amount of accepted Christian teaching. There seems good historical foundation for the time-honored tradition that a multitude of Hebrews at one time lived under Egyptian rule, and that they at length went out of Egypt and gradually established themselves as a nation in Palestine. But, as the book of Exodus unmistakably informs us, the people who accomplished their exodus at the time of the overthrow of the Pharaonic dynasty were a "mixed multitude," by no means exclusively of Hebrew origin or of Israelitish faith.

The Old Testament does not seem greatly concerned with any definite theories of a future life, though it abounds in narratives which, if accepted in any degree literally, teach spirit-communion in an unmistakable manner. It should never be forgotten that the Mosaic law was intended to be a practical guide to life on earth regardless of what particular views of a hereafter might be entertained, and one of the most palpable reasons for much silence concerning the future life may have been the excessive attention paid to beliefs concerning it by the Egyptians, whose spiritualism had doubtless greatly deteriorated and become largely mingled with highly objectionable practices. But though it is often urged that the Old Testament is, as a whole, at deadly variance with all attempts to communicate with the spiritual world, such an inference is entirely unwarranted, and it has grown out of a most erroneous habit of confounding simple spirit-communion with those abominable necromantic practices which are degrading and revolting in the extreme wherever practiced, and with which all that rightfully pertains to spiritualism has never had the least affinity. There was never a time when prophets in Israel believed only in the possibility of holding unlawful intercourse with the unseen spheres, but when they most scathingly denounced iniquitous customs, they surely condemned them because they were perversions and desecrations of faculties and powers which should be righteously employed instead of prostituted. Shortly before the period of the Exodus, magic in Egypt had so far fallen from its primitive high estate that the priests and wonder-workers connected with the temples not only often resorted to trickery, but frequently endeavored to cast unholy and injurious spells over all who came into collision with their schemes and interests; and as it can never be successfully denied that occult agencies are dangerous weapons in the hands of the unscrupulous, the prophets in Israel were doubtless actuated by the noblest motives, looking to the general welfare, when they vehemently protested against wizards, witches, sorcerers, necromancers, and all others who were seeking to intimidate the fearful, and in some instances to practice the Black Art, which in modern France is known as Satanism.

The trial of strength recorded in the book of Exodus as having taken place on the banks of the Nile, between Moses and Aaron on one side and Pharaoh's soothsayers on the other, is clearly intended to call attention to the distinctly doubtful character of all bewildering phenomena which are not accompanied or followed by some beneficent result. The Bible tells us that equal success, phenomenally speaking, was secured by both parties, and it was only when the good work of healing the afflicted was to be accomplished that Moses and Aaron triumphed and their antagonists met with complete defeat. However valuable may be all psychic phenomena from a strictly scientific standpoint, as throwing light upon the workings of some hidden force in Nature and latent faculty in man, from all ethical view-points we must attach value only to that which, in some direction at least, is calculated to really confer benefit on man or beast.

Spiritualists to-day, in common with many who do not rank themselves in that category, are rapidly arising to a sense of responsibility for the sort of phenomena they encourage, and are coming clearly to see that many facts may be wonderful yet undesirable. Egypt had had a wonderful and glorious past, references to which are made in the book of Genesis, which describes a happy situation when people of different nationalities and occupations lived and worked side by side, coöperating rather than competing. In those palmy ancient days we are told that Pharaoh the Egyptian monarch and Joseph the Hebrew counselor worked together in beneficent accord. The stress laid upon dreams and their interpretation in that older time is specially significant, as it throws a flood of light on noteworthy psychic experiences which were then and there almost universally credited. To foretell coming events through the agency of night visions was no uncommon experience with seers of old, and though the Pharaohs themselves seem not to have been able to clearly define the significance of their own visions, they did not hesitate to have recourse to interpreters more clairvoyant or clairsentient than themselves. The Hebrew is a psychic race, and the Bible deals very largely with incidents in the lives of noble prophets which tally closely with much that is now exciting scientific interest the wide world over.

To say that any useful and elevating phase of spiritualism is condemned in the Pentateuch is to utter an absurdity, though there are laws and precepts therein which denounce iniquitous practices in unmeasured terms. Legislation in the ancient Jewish state may have been excessive, but its entire tendency was to increase rather than to curtail liberty. The practice of sorcery was intended to wreak vengeance, to work mischief generally, to curse one's neighbors or to injure their belongings, and for that cause it was placed under the ban. But sorcery has no connection with any innocent or normal exercise of any psychic gift or spiritual endowment. As the general trend of Egyptian belief in a future life was clearly in the interests of morality it was not condemned in the Mosaic code, and because of its wide-spread acceptance among the people it needed not that any legislator should specially instruct the masses concerning it. We may fairly infer that in early days of Jewish communal life in Palestine the prevailing views entertained concerning life beyond the grave did not differ radically from those enunciated and elaborated in that fascinating compendium of Egyptian doctrine, "The Book of the Dead," a fair English translation of which, at least in its main features, is published both in New York and London. In that marvelous transcript of ancient ceremony and philosophy we find much that is in complete accord with the famous Jewish saying, "God's people are all the righteous," and we know that modern English scholars of high renown, notably Thomas Huxley and Matthew Arnold, have laid great stress upon the Jewish concept that righteous life alone, not race or creed, is a passport to blessedness with the Eternal.

Egyptian philosophy was in essence monotheistic, with a polytheistic accompaniment. The many subordinate divinities of Egypt are not necessarily at variance with the different orders of Sephiroth acknowledged in the Jewish Kabala, and indeed also in the Ninety-fifth Psalm and in many other places in Hebrew sacred literature we find the Eternal One spoken of as a great King above all gods, having supreme dominion over all lesser divinities.

Much that must appear contradictory to the cursory student of the Bible is readily elucidated as soon as we admit its distinctly Spiritualistic element. We are told that the Supreme Being is always invisible, but God's angels are seen by men and hold conversations with them. Three angels appear as young men to Abraham, two of whom go on to another place while one remains with the patriarch. There are but two possible explanations of such a narrative; either the theory that those angels were spiritual beings sufficiently materialized for Abraham and others to behold them, or that they were inspired men sufficiently open to spiritual influx to be rightly called God's special messengers because they had apprehended spiritual order to a much greater extent than ordinary. It seemed nothing singular for the spiritual world to break in, so to speak, in patriarchal times upon common scenes of daily living, yet the actual number of people who were sensitive enough to take cognizance of these psychic irruptions seems to have been but small. The same mistake is being made to-day that was often made of old, viz., that of failing to discriminate between lawful use and illicit abuse of psychic potencies. A witch meant a poisoner, and particularly one who sought to accomplish the ends of malevolence by invoking the aid of charms and incantations and purposely affiliating with such occult influences as could be used for evil ends. But the woman at En-dor whom Saul consulted, and who declared she saw the departed Samuel, is described in the text as only an innocent clairvoyant. Much has been made, by commentators averse to Spiritualism, of the sin of Saul in consulting this woman, whereas the narrative itself distinctly shows us that the unhappy king's missteps before he went to her had already brought him into such condition that, so far as his earthly career was concerned, his fate was sealed already, it was therefore in vain that he sought to "disturb" Samuel.

Samuel had been Saul's counselor on earth for many years, but the wayward monarch had time and time again rejected the prophet's warning, then, when the consequences of his repeated errors had made his throne so insecure that it had already virtually slipped from under him, Saul in desperation sought to gain an interview with Samuel, hoping to be shown a way to avert an impending catastrophe. Samuel could not help Saul to retain his earthly throne, for it was then too late to undo the mischief that had been accomplished. Such is the narrative in outline.

That much-abused story serves to illustrate a mighty verity and to enforce a greatly needed moral lesson, that we be wise betimes; but it does not justify any of the diatribe indulged in by fanatics, who wrest from it its obvious ethical instructiveness and misemploy it as a weapon which they seek to direct against all attempt at communion with friends departed from the range of mortal vision.

It is indeed true that individual human immortality is not very clearly taught in the Old Testament, but it is inferred in many places, and Jewish rabbis of ripe scholarly attainments have not been lacking through a long course of centuries, who have found in original Hebrew texts, of which we usually get but very poor translations, what they consider conclusive evidence that nothing but the fleshly tabernacle was ever believed to pass away or to be destroyed even if a heaven-sent deluge came and swept away "all flesh wherein was the breath of life."

The so-called pessimistic book known as Ecclesiastes, though it apparently denies the immortality of the soul, at least in the opinion of many of its critics, does not actually do more than contrast the inevitable outcome of divers ways of living, and in one famous passage, in which it seemingly makes man and brute synonymous, it really raises the question of who knows enough to discriminate between the man and the animal, and who can explain why the breath of the one floats upward and the other downward when each is living normally.

Here again we have a recurrence of primitive Egyptian teaching. The sensualist and the egotist, even though such may have gathered much external information of which they are extremely proud, find at length that self-indulgence and intellectual conceit yield finally only the bitter fruit of weary dissatisfaction. They, on the other hand, who have chosen a life of righteousness find peace and satisfaction.

Greek philosophy is present in Ecclesiastes, but much Greek thought was continuous from Egypt. "Out of Egypt have I called my Son," is a phrase which admits of considerable wealth of explanation, for though Egypt literally declined and its glory was scattered between Greece and Israel,—Persia and Rome were also indebted to "Mizraim" for much of their philosophy. That mystic, ancient land so graphically referred to in Isaiah (especially in Chapter XIX) lives to-day not only as a monument to departed glory, but as a fruitful field from which scholars are now busily gathering information which throws enormous light upon the history of the ancient world and reveals the roots of much modern philosophy and theology freely accepted in Christendom.

The famous school of Philo of Alexandria embodied very much of the ancient Egyptian spirit at its best. Philo sought to unite Hebrew with Greek philosophy, combining stern righteousness as set forth in an uncompromising moral code with the charming beauty with which Hellenic thought endowed all with which it came in contact.

Judaism to-day, with its many schools and parties, ranging from extreme orthodoxy to radical reform, still preserves many traces of the "ornaments" and other valuables which tradition says the Israelites took out of Egypt.

"They spoiled the Egyptians," is not a mere reference to the removal of earthly goods from one country to another. The phrase has deeper reference to the passing of Egypt's philosophy, together with much ceremonial accompaniment, out of the Nile country to the banks of the Jordan.

Saul of Tarsus, known to the Christian world as Paul the Apostle, made multitudinous references in several of his epistles to the faith of Egypt, and when he wrote to the Corinthians, (Corinth being a Grecian seaport having much trade with the Egyptian coast), he refers to the Egyptian scriptures far more frequently than to the Hebrew Law. If we carefully compare 1 Cor. 15 with much that is contained in "The Book of the Dead," we shall find a striking similarity between the views expressed in both places concerning our inner and outer bodies, and also as touching the nature of the resurrection. No hint is given that the identical physical robe is to be resumed, but quite the contrary, the comparison between the body left behind and the body to be made manifest is as between bare grain or seed and the fruitage which eventually it yields.

Some sort of resurrection from the dead has always been taught in Israel, but Jewish sages, like the illustrious Moses Maimonides,—who in the twelfth century of the present era drew up the famous thirteen articles of Jewish faith,—have always contented themselves with saying simply that the resurrection will be when and as God pleases, leaving details completely aside.

As the Unity of God and a righteous life are the only two essentials of Jewish religion, we can well understand how natural it is that there can be different parties in Jewry and different views on many points and yet Israel can remain a solidarity.

CHAPTER VI

THE JEWISH KABALA,—ITS TEACHINGS CONCERNING IMMORTALITY

So mysterious a work as the Kabala cannot be reviewed as one reviews ordinary literature for the original claim made for the Kabala is that it is in every sense a revelation to earth from heaven.

One tradition concerning its origin is that a society of angels constitute a Theosophic school in Paradise and that they chose seventy elders in Israel as their mouthpieces on earth and through those elders alone, it was claimed, a correct knowledge of the esoteric meaning of the Torah could be obtained. But regardless of legends concerning its origin the Kabala is unquestionably a marvelous production well deserving serious attention. Written for the wise alone it has seldom occurred that an extensive translation into English has been attempted, though a valuable book entitled "The Kabbalah Unveiled" was issued by S. I. MacGregor Mathers, published by George Redway of London in 1887. This fascinating volume was dedicated to those two remarkable authors Dr. Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland who were deep students of ancient mysteries and producers of really extraordinary literature, of which "The Perfect Way or Finding of Christ" is the best known portion. The Kabala may reasonably be styled the handbook of esoteric Judaism, and though it is largely discredited among Jews of the modern school, it is unquestionably a source from which many prevailing Jewish ideas and ceremonies have emanated. The Kabala has long exerted an intense fascination for all lovers of the profound and the mysterious, and though at first sight its claims appear too stupendous, and its introductory propositions well nigh bewildering, it thoroughly repays an earnest painstaking study conducted in a spirit of impartial examination. The twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet must be interpreted somewhat mystically before one is prepared to read their significance when employed Kabalistically.

The following table may aid all who desire familiarity with the outlines of the subject.

Name	Roman Equivalent	Significance	Numerical Value
Aleph	A	Ox	1
Beth	B	House	2
Gimel	G	Camel	3
Daleth	D	Door	4
He	H	Window	5
Vau	V	Peg or nail	6
Zayin	Z	Weapon or sword	7
Cheth	CH	Enclosure or fence	8
Teth	T	Serpent	9
Yod	I	Hand	10
Caph	K	Palm of hand	20
Lamed	L	Ox-goad	30
Mem	M	Water	40
Nun	N	Fish	50
Samekh	S	Prop or support	60
Ayin	O	Eye	70
Pe	P	Mouth	80
Tzaddi	TZ	Fishing-hook	90
Qoph	Q	Back of the head	100
Resh	R	Head	200
Shin	SH	Tooth	300
Tan	TH	Sign of the Cross	400

Thousands are denoted by a letter of increased size, thus a large Aleph signifies not one, but 1,000. In stating numbers beyond 400 and below 1,000 recourse is had to finals.

Final Caph stands for 500. Final Mem for 600. Final Nun for 700. Final Pe for 800. Final Tzaddi for 900. Students of Kabala declare that the most mystical and highly figurative portions of the Old Testament, notably the books of Daniel and Ezekiel, also the New Testament Apocalypse, are quite intelligible when we are furnished with the Kabalistic Key though without it the intricate symbols are, to the bulk of readers, meaningless or else suggestive of wild and lurid fancies such as are frequently indulged by would-be interpreters whose particular delight is in predicting awful world-wide catastrophies. Among European mystics of a recent period in whose eyes the Kabala has appeared extremely sacred may be mentioned Cornelius Henry Agrippa the famous philosopher and physician (1486–1535), John Baptist von Helmont the remarkable chemist (1577–1644), Robert Fludd (1574–1637), Dr. Henry More (1614–1687). These highly learned and profoundly philosophic men have eulogized the Kabala in the strongest and most enthusiastic terms displaying their glad acceptance of its claim to a Divine origin. The story of the Kabala is an intensely romantic one and one that taxes the credulity of modern scholars to almost the breaking point. After man's fall from primitive innocence into a state of partial alienation from God, though there was no longer such close communion of earth with heaven as had been enjoyed in the primitive age of man's sojourn on this planet, the angels of the Theosophic school in Paradise who were the custodians of the celestial truths revealed in the Kabala, graciously arranged to communicate them through chosen instruments on earth for the ultimate good of all humanity. These angels appointed or selected certain men as "Protoplasts" beginning with Adam and extending through Noah to Abraham, who is said to have emigrated to Egypt where he allowed a certain portion of the mysterious doctrine to become approximately public. Moses, we are distinctly told in the Bible, was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, but though he imbibed much instruction in the land of his birth, tradition states that it was only during forty years wandering in a wilderness, and by means of instruction specially imparted by an angel, that he became qualified to take the exalted place among seers and sages which he has occupied for so many centuries in the estimation of a vast number of both Jews and Gentiles.

When considering the interviews of Moses with the Angel we are soon led on to familiar Spiritualistic ground, and it seems impossible to attach any literal significance whatever to much of the Bible narrative without indorsing the simple theory that an angel is a spiritual messenger qualified and commissioned to impart instruction to selected pupils.

In four out of the five books which constitute the Pentateuch, it is said that the esoteric doctrine which Moses imparted to the sacred seventy elders is contained, but it is absent from Deuteronomy. We are further told by traditional authorities, that David and Solomon carried on an unbroken line of Kabalistic tradition, but Kabala was not committed to ordinary writing until the days of Schimlon Ben Jochai who lived during the period of the destruction of the second temple in Jerusalem. Rabbi Eleazar, his son, with the assistance of Rabbi Abha, his secretary, and some of his disciples, collated the treatises of Schimlon Ben Jochai and composed out of them the celebrated Zohar, a title meaning splendor. The Kabala is usually divided into four sections: Practical, Literal, Unwritten, Dogmatic. The practical portion deals with talismans and the general details of ceremonial magic. This is kept very secret and is not considered edifying for the multitude. The other sections known as the esoteric significance of the Law are considered highly profitable for Rabbinical edification, and through the Rabbis the congregation of Israel can be enlightened, and through Israel eventually all Gentile nations may be made recipients of universal wisdom.

The principal doctrines of the Kabala are designed to solve every problem in the universe beginning with the nature and attributes of the Supreme Being. Cosmogony, the creation and destiny of angels and men, the nature of the soul, descriptions of demons and elementals, the import of revealed law, the transcendental symbolism of numbers, the mysteries of Hebrew letters and the "equilibrium of contraries" are some of the principal topics dealt with in the Kabala.

The "Book of Concealed Mystery" deals with the "equilibrium of balance." Equilibrium is said to be "that harmony which results from the analogy of contraries." It is the central point, the "point within the circle" of ancient symbolism, the living synthesis of counter-balanced power. Eliphas Levi, an eminent Kabalist of the nineteenth century, says in his "History of Magic" that Kabalists have a horror of whatever savors of idolatry; they however ascribe the human form to God, but only hieroglyphically.

The Kabalistic definition of Deity is "the intelligent, living, loving, Infinite One." God is in all, but distinct from all, immanent but not inherent in the manifested universe. The Kabalistic idea of a trinity as a manifestation of Deity is of Kether (Crown) Chokmah (King) Binah (Queen). The universe is spoken of as "born from the union of the crowned King and Queen." Before the complete form of the Heavenly Man (the 10 Sephiroth) was produced primordial worlds were created, but they could not very long subsist because the equilibrium of balance was not perfect. These are called "Kings of ancient time" and "Kings of Edom who reigned before the monarchs of Israel." Edom means a world of unbalanced force; Israel signifies the balanced Sephiroth.

The archetypal world (Olahm Atziloth) gave birth to three other worlds in a descending or decreasing scale of brightness. The second world is termed Olahm Ha-Briah or world of creation, an immediate emanation from the first, a realm of pure spirit. The third world is called Olahm Ha-Yetzirah, the world of formation and abode of angels who are draped in luminous substance and who appear in human form when they communicate with men. The fourth world is designated Olahm Ha-Asiah or world of action. Here are to be found the Demons or "Shells" which are the grossest and most deficient of all existences. There are ten varieties of Demons answering to the decade of the Sephiroth, but in inverse ratio. The Demons have a prince named Samael, the original of Satan. Kabalists lay great stress upon the unpronounceableness of the true name of Deity by the multitude, the secret of its pronunciation being the greatest of secrets known only to a very few illustrious initiates.

The famous saying, "He who rightly pronounceth the Divine Name causeth heaven and earth to tremble, for this is the name which rusheth throughout the Universe" accounts for the fact that no devout orthodox Jew will attempt to pronounce the name formed from the sacred consonants Yod, Heth, Vau, Heth, but makes a slight pause or substitutes Adonai, which is customary when reading from the scrolls in synagogues. The ineffable Name has twelve transpositions, all conveying the same meaning, "to be." It is the only name that will bear so many transpositions without involving a change of meaning.

These twelve transpositions are called "banners of the mighty Name" and have a reference to the twelve signs of the Zodiac which are also the twelve major sections into which the human body is divisible.

The Sephiroth of the Kabala are called both persons and attributes of God, some of which are male and some female, for no Kabalist ever does violence to the central truth of the equality of male with female in Divinity.

The clear teaching of the first chapter of Genesis (vide, verses 26, 27, 28) is never forsaken for a false interpretation of the second chapter which has long obscured the true idea of the union of masculine and feminine in the eternal Godhead as set forth in all esoteric treatises. While we cannot possibly understand a trinity of three exclusively male personages at the root of a creation which displays male and female expressions of life conjointly, we can in some measure comprehend the idea of a Divine Father and Mother begetting offspring. In the Kabalah the "Ancient of Days" is expressed as Father and Mother and thus begets the Child. In Egypt the concept of Osiris and Isis begetting Horus, and Horus being presented for contemplation under a dual aspect of son and daughter, agrees exactly with the entire teaching of the Kabala which is, in main features, scarcely distinguishable from the Hermetic philosophy which at one time had its home in Egypt. The ten Sephiroth are divided into three divisions called Pillars. The right-hand pillar is Mercy; the left-hand pillar is Justice or Judgment; the middle pillar is Mildness. In their total unity the ten Sephiroth signify the Archetypal Man, Adam Kadmon, the Protaganos. In the form of the human body is found the Tetragrammaton. The sacred letters Yod, Heth, Vau, Heth, are distributed as follows: The head is Yod; the arms and shoulders are the first Heth; the trunk of the body is Vau; the lower limbs are the second Heth. In considering the three great divisions of the inner life of humanity—Neshamah, Ruach, Nephesh — the first is the spiritual realm, the second the rational, the third the sensuous. All souls are declared preëxistent in the archetypal world and are in their original state androgynous, but when incarnate upon earth they are separated into male and female and inhabit different bodies. The doctrine of counterparts is clearly taught in the Kabala, but there is no suggestion given anywhere that one expression of the soul—male or female—is any sense superior or inferior to the other.

Eliphas Levi in his dissertations upon the Kabala drew the following inferences concerning the nature of the soul. The soul is a veiled light; this light is triple. Neshamah is pure spirit; Ruach is the rational soul; Nephesh is the plastic vehicle. Nephesh is immortal only through destruction and renewal of forms. Ruach progresses through the evolution of ideas. Neshamah is without forgetfulness and not susceptible to dissolution. The book of Ecclesiastes read in the light of the Kabala no longer appears sad or pessimistic for the various questions it raises and the statements it makes are all intelligible and acceptable when we are aware of the differing planes of consciousness and states of existence to which the analytical preacher so searchingly refers. Souls when perfected on earth pass to ether planets and eventually they reach the sun; then they ascend to a superior universe and begin another career from planet to planet and from sun to sun. In the suns they remember all their experiences, but in the planets they seemingly forget. Solar lives are days of eternal life and planetary lives are nights in which the soul dreams. Angels are luminous emanations personified by divine influence and reflex. . . . Angels desire to become men for the perfect man is above all angels. Planetary lives are composed of ten dreams each lasting for one hundred years. Each solar life lasts one thousand years, therefore is it said that in God's sight one thousand years is as one day. Every "week," i. e., every fourteen thousand years the soul "bathes itself and reposes in the jubilee dream." On awaking from which it remembers only good, for good alone is worthy of remembrance. Spinoza was a deep student of the Kabala and in his Ethics summed up its teachings with much insight and ability. Among Spinoza's definitions the following are especially luminous: "By the Being who is the Cause and Governor of all things, I understand AinSoph (Supreme Wisdom) infinite, without attributes." "By Sephiroth, I understand the potencies which emanate from the Absolute, all entities limited by quantity." "AinSoph is both immanent and transcendent." "The Sephiroth are emanations not creations." "As AinSoph is perfect the Sephiroth proceeding therefrom must also be perfect." The great mystery of Macroprosopus and Microposopus, the greatest and least countenances, is elaborately treated in the Book of Concealed Mystery which few modern scholars attempt to explain though, to all who are disposed to search for profound verities below the surface or behind the veil of archaic symbolism, it is a treasure-house of wisdom rich beyond compare. In the books of Greater and Lesser Holy Assembly studious Christians will find the roots of the doctrine of the Trinity and indeed of practically all the mystic doctrines which the esoteric Christian Church has dogmatically formulated, insisting upon their acceptance by the multitude to whom they are indeed unexplained and seemingly inexplicable mysteries. The great offense of dogmatic theologians has been the persistence with which they have forced dogmas upon the masses as necessary to salvation while the Kabala only sets forth propositions and condemns no one who fails to comprehend them. The "Three Heads" are alluded to frequently in the Kabala and it is not difficult to surmise from what source the Athanasian fathers derived their precise definitions concerning a trinity of persons though God is absolute unity.

How widely different is the Kabalistic view from the perverted doctrine which multitudes of Christians have unthinkingly accepted on the basis of alleged authority is clearly evident when we find in the Kabala no threats of damnation for those who fail to perceive a truth veiled in august mystery, but only a statement is made that as the soul advances in enlightenment it comes to perceive a truth "hidden from the foundation of the world."

Were the Anthanasian creed revised by enlightened Kabalists its so-called "damnatory" clauses would be greatly changed, for instead of implying that souls "perish everlastingly" if they do not endorse a mysterious doctrine, the Kabala declares that as man becomes increasingly illumined or regenerate he gradually comes to an understanding of mystic verities, the knowledge of which is an evidence of an advanced stage in the progress of illumination or regeneration. There is no perdition taught in the Kabala, but on the contrary only a continual rising of the soul from sphere to sphere, casting off error and retaining truth alone. Enigmatical the language of the Kabala may be, cruel and unreasonable it decidedly is not.

As Swedenborg in his voluminous treatises revived the similitude of the Human Form as the form of all the heavens, and his theological works, in particular, are industriously circulated by his admirers to-day, the language of the Kabala is gradually becoming measurably familiar to the general public. We have no space in this volume for further discussion of it, but we commend a perusal of this marvelous and fascinating literature to all students who have leisure and disposition to peer beneath the surface of familiar Scripture, to divine the deeper truths which long have been veiled beneath the guise of seemingly but doubtful ancient history.

CHAPTER VII

PERSIAN THEORIES OF THE SOUL AND ITS DESTINATION

THOUGH to-day if we wish to learn of Parseeism, the origin of which is attributed to Zoroaster, we must visit India rather than Persia, and seek for information in Bombay, where a famous Parsee colony has enjoyed an unbroken continuity of existence for over 1,200 years, it is to a still remoter period than that which marks the foundation of that ancient and venerable colony that we must turn if we would inspect any of the roots of the still flowering tree of Parseeism, a religion which disputes the palm for antiquity with even its eldest contemporaries. The story of Zoroaster, the reputed founder of the Parsee faith, is veiled in considerable mystery, and until quite recently scholars have had much difficulty in attempting to reconcile seemingly conflicting dates, which have been found so divergent as to prove ultimately irreconcilable on any basis of belief that there has been but one great teacher in all time who has borne the title of Zoroaster, as his period has been placed as early as the days of the Jewish Abraham and as late as the time of the Greek Pythagoras. It is now beginning to be understood that there has been a long line of highly enlightened spiritual teachers, running through the ages, and that Zoroaster is a title of dignity rather than a proper name.

That very instructive writer and lecturer on theosophy, Annie Besant, has in one of her many books, "Four Great Religions," sought to explain how one after another, as the ages have rolled by, highly illumined teachers have appeared on the stage of the world's great theatre and imparted instruction specially adapted to the times and places when and where they have ministered, then left the good seed they had sown and watered to germinate and bear fruit, which it always does at the end of a cycle, at which time there is demand for another great enlightener who comes in his turn as his predecessors have come and gone before him.

According to this theory, which is authenticated by almost universal testimony furnished by students of the Mysteries the wide world over, we have swept away the major portion of the perplexing difficulty concerning Zoroaster and have found that Parseeism is founded, like many other ancient systems of religion and philosophy, not upon one sole teacher but upon a succession of spiritual enlighteners who, according to universal theosophy, are commissioned by celestial guardians of this planet's destiny to convey to a special section of this earth's inhabitants such portions and aspects of heavenly wisdom as they are ready to receive, assimilate and propagate. Though Parseeism is not an ideal system as we find it expounded by its best known modern exponents, and some of its doctrines, as set forth by its appointed delegate from Bombay at the World's Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in 1893, seem inferior to the highest inculcations of prophetic Judaism and Christian Universalism, we must admit that the sacred books of the Parsees termed Zend-Avesta abound in excellent teachings, and also present a view of good and evil far more reasonable than that which overspread beclouded Europe in the mediæval period, and which still survives as a blighting element in orthodox phases of Christianity.

We hear and read much of dualism whenever we hear of the Parsee or Iranian religion, but the dualistic theories of all Zoroastrians are resolvable into an original and ultimate monism, because the contending forces of good and evil, even when these are personified in their respective fountain-heads, Ormuzd and Ahriman, are only finite and temporal. There is no such absurd belief as faith in sempiternal evil in the Parsee creed or doctrine, for it teaches that Ormuzd and Ahriman are brothers who have had a dispute and are now engaged in works of diametrically opposite character, but as the two sprang from one source so they will return to the state of harmony which was originally their blissful portion and from which they have fallen, not everlastingly, but only for a limited period.

The Persian Ahriman and the Hebrew Satan (Accuser) are so practically identical that we may well discover traces of Parseeism in the book of Job, one of the most instructive and comforting of all the books which make up the Hebrew Bible. This book of Job commended itself very largely to the sympathies of Thomas Paine, who alludes to it in a friendly spirit in that much abused treatise, "The Age of Reason," which contains many assaults upon much that the Bible contains but never calls in question the unity of God or denies a good hope of human immortality.

If Milton when he wrote "Paradise Lost" was not familiar with the Zend-Avesta, he at least shows familiarity with much of its incidental teaching, though the English poet never rose high enough in his theology to reach the spiritual altitudes which are the peaks and crowns of the Zoroastrian faith. The Christian apostle Paul, who was a classic as well as Hebrew scholar, shows much familiarity with the essentials of the Iranian as well as of the Egyptian religion in his noblest utterances, for after having conceded to the "powers of darkness" all that any well-instructed Parsee would attempt to claim, he launches forth into those glorious and magnificent declarations of faith in the perfect triumph of infinite goodness which are simply paralyzing to all believers in the possibility of the ultimate victory being gained, even in a single instance, by any spirit which opposes itself to the rule of the perfect righteousness which dwells at the centre of the universe.

Even Robert Browning's perfect optimism as expressed in "Abt Vogler" is none too grand for a consistent Parsee to endorse, for should one make an earnest and searching study of the Zend-Avesta he might well rise from his researches with the jubilant exclamation on his lips, "There shall never be one lost good, and for evil so much good more." Browning may speak of a few "musicians" into whose ears divine secrets are specially whispered, but who are those sublimely privileged and singularly enlightened ones but they who have learned the mighty lesson of transmutation, and have indeed resolved discords into harmonies, thereby proving that evil is only misplaced good, that evil is a state or condition only, never a fundamental reality or an essential of universal life.

Quite a number of modern metaphysicians would be helped to greater clarity of statement if they would study the Parsee doctrine which, when rescued from degenerate accretions, is found to be an ambitious, and by no means unsuccessful, attempt to explain the origin, nature and destiny of relative discord in a universe which is absolutely good at core and in essence.

To give some idea of the antiquity of the fame of Zoroaster we have only to be reminded that Pliny, agreeing with Aristotle, asserts that Zoroaster flourished 6,000 years before Plato. Gibbon, Volney, and many other distinguished historians concur largely in this view, which, as we have already intimated, is easily accepted on the basis suggested by Annie Besant and other theosophical interpreters; for when we consider that several illustrious teachers have borne the same high appellation among the followers of the doctrines they proclaimed, we should not be staggered if we discovered statements to the effect that Zoroaster lived even 100,000 years ago, perchance in the mighty island-continent Atlantis, which was probably in the height of its glory while the lands we now call ancient were resting beneath the ocean waves, precisely as Atlantis is now slumbering. Many historians have assigned Zoroaster to a period as recent as about 700 B. C., when no doubt some great enlightenment came to the Iranians and a revival of ancient wisdom took place among them, led by a special master-guide. However ancient may have been its origin, or however comparatively modern, it is certain that Parseeism flourished in the Babylonian Empire and that Judaism was largely tinctured with it during the time of the Babylonian Exile.

Portions of the book of Isaiah were undoubtedly written after the Jews had returned from Babylon to Palestine, and the author who is often styled "the second Isaiah" (vide Isaiah 45) protested vehemently against the infiltration of Babylonian doctrines into the Jewish creed, at least in so far as those tenets were out of harmony with the simple faith of ancient Israel, which admitted no rival with God upon the throne of the universe. Though much of the ancient history of Zoroastrianism may be draped in uncertainty, scholars have not encountered anything like insuperable difficulties in their endeavors to trace the history of the Parsee faith during the Christian era.

Max Müller—whose monumental contributions to the science of comparative religion and philology entitle him to rank among the very greatest scholars of the nineteenth century—has thrown much light on this interesting subject in the course of his elaborate commentaries upon the various sacred writings of the East, and to his voluminous and fascinating works we advise all of our readers to turn who have both desire and leisure to pursue their studies to a far greater length than is possible for those whose occupation is such that they can only find time for a study of the briefest condensations. For our immediate purpose we need only refer to a few important facts which throw light upon the special subject we are now considering. In the fourth century B. C., Alexander of Macedon overran the Persian Empire and with his rule the old faith and ritual declined or became obscure. In the following centuries this decadence became more and more marked, and it was not till about 700 years later that a great revival of Parseeism occurred; this was in the days of Ardeshir, who overthrew the Parthian dominion in Persia and established the Sassanian dynasty. To quote the words of William Alger, "One of his first acts was, stimulated doubtless by the surviving Magi and the old piety of the people, to reinaugurate the ancient religion. A fresh zeal of loyalty broke out, and all the prestige and vigor of the long-suppressed worship were restored."

The Zoroastrian Scriptures were now sought for, whether in manuscript or in the memories of the priests. It would seem that only remnants were found. The collection, such as it was, was in the Avestan dialect, which had grown partially obsolete and unintelligible. The authorities accordingly had a translation made of it in the speech of the time, Tehlevi. This translation—most of which has reached us written in the original, sentence after sentence —forms the real Zend language, often confounded by the literary public with Avestan. The translation of the Avestan books, probably made under these circumstances as early as 350 A. D. is called the "Huzvâ-resch." It is probably from this source rather than from one of greater antiquity that floating theories concerning the original Parsee faith are commonly drawn, therefore it would be unwise to speak dogmatically, when scanning such translations, concerning the highest and purest concepts of a remote original.

To quote once more from William Alger, "The source from which the fullest and clearest knowledge of the Zoroastrian faith, as it is now held by the Parsees, is drawn, is the Desatir and the Bundehesh. The former work is the unique vestige of an extinct dialect called the Mahabadian, accompanied by a Persian translation and commentary. It is impossible to ascertain the century when the Mahabadian text was written: but the translation into Persian was, most probably, in the seventh century of the present era." After descanting upon the improbability that those speculations are well-founded which seek to attribute the teachings of modern Parseeism to Jewish, Christian, or even later Mohammedan origins, Dr. Alger proceeds to summarize the tenets of Magian theology and from that summary

("A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," pages 133 et seq.) we have compiled the following extremely abbreviated narrative. In the deep background of Magian theology there looms belief in an infinite first Principle-Zeruana Akerana, the meaning of which is Absolute Duration or Indivisible One. But the beginning of vital theology furnishing the actual ethics of Zoroastrianism is the idea of the antagonistic forces—Ormuzd and Ahriman—which constitute the first emanation from the Absolute. These are said to divide between them the unresting striving of the universe. Ormuzd is the principle of light; Ahriman is the principle of darkness. From Ormuzd proceed all virtue and all beauty; from Ahriman proceed all wickedness and deformity. There is some dispute as to whether these antagonistic powers have always been at variance; different views have doubtless prevailed at different times, the more pessimistic theories belonging, no doubt, to an age of spiritual declension and mental obscuration, the more optimistic ground having been always taken by the more enlightened in intellect and the more advanced in spirituality among the numerous exponents of Zoroastrianism who have risen from age to age, all claiming to interpret the original faith no matter how widely, in some instances, their commentaries may have departed from it.

Dr. Alger holds to the view entertained by clear-sighted students in general and emphasized most powerfully and beautifully by Marie Caithness, Duchesse de Pomar, in her splendid treatise, "The Mystery of the Ages, Contained in the Secret Doctrine of All Religions," in which valuable volume we are informed, on the basis of deep spiritual insight coupled with profound scholarly research, that uncorrupted Parseeism teaches that Ormuzd and Ahriman are indeed true brothers, originally harmonious, but during a long age called a Gahambar they are in a state of active antagonism, though when the cycle ends they will become fully reconciled, then Pralaya or the Golden Age will result from their return to harmony.

Dr. Alger does not omit to trace the close connection which certainly exists between Ahriman and the Satan of the book of Job, which is a splendid epic poem, intended to set forth the glorious ancient doctrine that no spirit of evil in reality exists, as Satan (or the Accusing Angel) is only a messenger of Heaven and receives a commission from the Most High, or he could work nothing among the inhabitants of earth. Job personifies the typical human soul, individualized in every human being, and as the poetic narrative most clearly shows, its author's object was to convince all readers that nothing befalls humanity except for ultimate good and when we see what looks to us like unmitigated disaster we are, in our temporary blindness, misinterpreting some perplexing phenomena which will yet be explained to us as a part of our education, a means of discipline the outcome of which will be a glorious and wonderful enlightenment, impossible of achievement except through its seemingly evil though, in reality, benignant agency.

The Parsee delegate at the World's Parliament of Religions had no hesitation in telling the multitudes who heard his speech or read the published report of it, that Parsees to-day believe that every noxious creature and poisonous plant is the work of Ahriman, while all that is amiable and wholesome is the work of Ormuzd. This is an easy disposition of phenomena, and it may not be an incorrect statement, but even though Ormuzd and Ahriman have each created a multitude of emissaries and sent them forth to people this material globe, the ultimate question of the final outworking of all for good remains quite undisturbed. All that we have need to consider, even if we accept this popular version of Parsee doctrine, is a method by means of which the goal is reached, the object finally accomplished.

The Parsees' teaching that every soul embodied on earth is attended by a light and dark unseen attendant, (a ferver and a dev) and that every star is peopled with spirits of light and darkness, is in complete accord with the almost universal opinion of mankind, though such a doctrine is easily subject to so much rational modification that it may eventually be accepted, as already taught in many schools of theosophy, only in the sense that light is positive and symbolizes wisdom, while darkness is negative and symbolizes ignorance. Gerald Massey's able pamphlet, "The Devil of Darkness," bears a title which throws much light on the primal question which still sorely perplexes the bulk of enquirers into the nature of the universe—Whence cometh evil? We cannot falter in our own allegiance to the blessed concept that absolutely good is all in all, and we find nothing, even in Persian Dualism, to shake our confidence in the truth of that mighty declaration, nor do we discover any historic evidence that any truly illumined teacher ever taught the contrary. Only a corrupted priesthood allied with a similarly corrupted temporal power ever invented the false, hideous, irrational dogma of an endless, and therefore useless, hell together with the insane and frightful notion that God was an angry tyrant who doomed a large portion of his own creation to everlasting misery. The nightmare theology which seeks to enslave and terrify the world with such atrocious fictions may have its origin in the dark land of shades, in which the unenlightened dwell until they have risen out of the murky shadows in which their ignorance and ill-will may have plunged them; but never once has a radiant messenger from any sphere of light suggested anything to humanity which casts a slur on the character of the Almighty, or that leads sensitive natures to despair, while it arouses the worst passions of the cruel and the relentless. We make no apology for condemning the doctrine of endless or perpetual evil, whether personified or not, as an insult to intelligence as well as a flagrant contradiction of all that enlightened morality is willing to accept. That there are unsolved problems and mighty mysteries in the universe no sane thinker will for an instant dispute, but to make capital out of these for the purpose of exploiting a doctrine of sempiternal evil is a crime against humanity and an insult to our common sense.

The precise views which Zoroastrians entertain concerning the future life are rather difficult to describe in limited space, but it may safely be decided that there is an idea of purgatory among them, and also some idea of hell, though not necessarily any idea which is at variance with the ultimate salvation of every spirit in the universe. Parseeism, in common with practically every other religion, teaches concerning a great variety of states or conditions in the world beyond death, and, as Dante has taught in the Divine Comedy, if it take four or five centuries, or even longer, to purge a soul from the dross of avarice, envy, or any other stain, so long must it be subjected to some cleansing discipline called "purgatorial fire." The root of the doctrine of purgatory is found in all religious systems, and if it be separated from all belief in damnation, with which the thought of purgation is never properly allied, it may well be accepted as a means of illustrating the consequences of error, and the purifying ends of penalty.

Having already taken a glance at Egyptian eschatology, we find Persian views of life beyond death extremely similar and we must not forget that after the overthrow of the Pharaonic or native Egyptian dynasty Egypt became subject to Persia, consequently the religious beliefs and symbols of both nations became greatly intermingled. The bull, always greatly venerated in ancient Egypt, looms large upon the Persian horizon, the origin of all manifested life being presented under the figure of that powerful animal. Among Persian practises throwing light upon the popular belief concerning the future life, is the ancient "Festival of the Dead," which is still celebrated by Parsees during the last five days of every year, at which season it is believed that the sinners in the spirit-world who are undergoing expiatory penalties proportioned to their offenses, are permitted to visit their relatives and friends who are yet on earth, after which respite those who are not sufficiently purified to pass on to Paradise must return to "Dutsakh." Annually, it is taught, "Ormuzd empties hell," and at this great solar feast (observed by all Occult Societies the world over, which can boast of any respectable antiquity) multitudes are finally released from the shadows of Hades and conducted to brighter realms on their way to the ultimate bliss of Heaven.

To every student of comparative religion who is not swayed by prejudice, the striking similarity of one creed to another must prove convincing that prevailing Christian doctrines are all derived from earlier sources, and that this is the case the gospel narratives themselves most clearly testify. In the Apostle's Creed (usually regarded as the oldest, as well as the simplest and concisest, of all the creeds of Christendom) the much-disputed passage (which some Protestants disapprove of and omit), "He descended into hell," shows unmistakably the complete sympathy which existed between primitive Christianity, which was highly eclectic, and other older and widely prevailing faiths.

Again do we insist that in their original purity or simplicity all religious systems taught the purification of departed souls, through suffering indeed whenever such is necessary, but never final extinction or, what is far worse, endless misery. The Parsees of old declared that the present order of the world was fixed at 12,000 years duration, divided into four equal parts. During the first three thousand years Ormuzd reigns triumphantly, during the second three thousand years Ahriman reigns. The third three thousand years is occupied in strife between them, and the fourth three thousand years is to be a period of Ahriman's victory, when the earth will be the scene of all manner of awful tragedies. This dark period will, however, be triumphantly overcome, for Ormuzd will rise in majestic might and put a complete stop to all calamities and all atrocities. Ormuzd will send to earth a saviour, Gosiosch, to deliver mankind and to bring the arch-enemy to judgment. Then comes the resurrection, when all the departed will reappear and friends will gladly recognize each other. Great difference of opinion among scholars still prevails as to the exact nature of the resurrection, but all agree that Parseeism teaches individual immortality.

Every doctrine taught in Christendom concerning the disobedience and fall of man can be found paralleled in Parseeism. Though it seems fairly clear that Dualism is inextricably interwoven with the Zoroastrian faith, Rawlinson argues—and sustains his argument by powerful proofs—that the Dualistic doctrine was a heresy which broke out among primitive Aryans who were the ancestors of subsequent Iranians and Indians. It is contended, almost universally, that the Jewish Scriptures are honey-combed with Persian doctrines but the only book in the Old Testament which lays any clear stress upon the doctrine of resurrection is Daniel, which is replete with Chaldean and Persian allusions. This apocalyptic treatise (which the book called Revelation or Apocalypse in the New Testament strongly resembles) is usually attributed to a period not earlier than 200 B. C. The spiritual idea of the resurrection which prevailed among thoughtful and educated Zoroastrians in the days of the famous Plutarch is clearly shown in his quotation from Theopompus who gives it as the opinion of the Magi that when Ahriman is subdued and men are restored to life "they will need no nourishment and cast no shadow." Such is undoubtedly the original Magian doctrine and it comports well with the idea of a purely spiritual body not dependent upon material elements for sustenance and not subject to the limitations of time and space.

Every reader is doubtless familiar with the Towers of Silence, the Parsee burying places, and many travelers have seen them. The dead body is not permitted to be thrown into water or fire or to be buried in the earth lest it contaminate an element, it is therefore placed at a high elevation above the ground and subjected to the action of birds of prey, which Parsees believe have a necessary mission to fulfil and are properly endowed with a taste for carrion. The dead body is treated with no indignity by these scrupulously cleanly people who make cleanliness an essential part of their religion. Bodies are placed in dry, pure, open places upon a summit where fresh winds blow and the vultures which devour the flesh, leaving the bones completely harmless, are accounted sacred.

Though there is much attributed to Parseeism which is not altogether charming, a stern sense of justice, coupled with a proclamation to the effect that righteousness alone will eventually triumph, runs through all doctrines which claim Zoroaster and the Zend-Avesta for their source. At the time of judgment a complete separation will be made between the virtuous and the vicious, but though the latter will be condemned to penal sufferings their anguished cries will rise to heaven and find pity in the soul of Ormuzd, who will eventually release all from their sufferings. The awful words in a Christian gospel, attributed to Jesus, "Depart ye cursed into everlasting (aionian) fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," though by no means delightful reading, are susceptible, and that without the slightest straining, of a reasonable and even a benevolent meaning, for we have a right to challenge theologians to debate the question: For what purpose is the fire prepared? Who shall dare to deny that a just Deity has wisely prepared it for the express purpose of purifying and enlightening those who are unclean and dark in their spiritual condition? Fire enters largely as a highly expressive symbol into all religions, and as fire accomplishes on earth three useful and beneficent ends—it enlightens, it warms and it purifies—we have not the slightest right or reason to suppose that Zoroaster, Jesus, or any enlightened spiritual teacher or Messiah at any time in the world's history, ever intended to teach any other doctrine than the ultimate enlightenment and purification of every individual spirit in the universe.

Parseeism is essentially in union with Universalism, and though the Universalists of to-day would probably refuse to endorse a good deal they might find in ancient Parsee documents, they have publicly announced in two great sentences, included in the Confession of Faith of the American Universalist denomination, their complete agreement with the essence of Zoroastrianism, for they profess belief in the certainty of retribution, and the final harmony of all souls with God. Here we have arrived at a complete synthesis of acceptable spiritual philosophy and no matter how widely some of us may differ among ourselves as to the means whereby universal harmony may be effected, we can all endorse the noble sentiment voiced by Hosea Ballou, the father of American Universalism, in a still popular hymn :

> "In God's eternity,
> There shall a day arise
> When all of Adam's race shall be
> With Jesus in the skies."

And equally in the glorious words of Epes Sargent, the stalwart Spiritualist, which are also found in many well-compiled hymnals :

> "The soul that sinneth, it shall surely die,— > Die to the sin that did its life confine."

Again quoting from Dr. Alger, we will sum up our all too superficial glance at the Parsee faith. In the following sentences we behold a glorious picture of the future which awaits our planet and its multitudinous inhabitants: "The earth-wide stream of fire, flowing on, will cleanse every spot and everything. Even the loathsome realm of darkness and torment shall be humbled and made a part of the all-inclusive Paradise. Ahriman himself, reclaimed to virtue, replenished with primal light, abjuring the memories of his envious ways, and furling thenceforth the sable standard of his rebellion, shall become a ministering spirit of the Most High, and together with Ormuzd, shall chant the praises of Time-without-Bounds. All darkness, falsehood, suffering, shall flee utterly away, and the whole universe be filled by the illumination of good spirits blessed with functions of eternal delight. In regard to the fate of man —

> "Such are the parables Zartusht addressed > To Iran's faith, in ancient Zend-Avest."

To this sublime picture we invite the earnest, prayerful attention of every benighted traveler along earth's highway, who doubts that "Good will be the final goal of ill." Universal salvation is the only salvation conceivable in a sane universe, and it has been the glorious mission of modern, as of ancient, Spiritualism to proclaim this blessed truth, not only as a postulate of philosophy or a reasonable religious faith, but as a demonstrated certainty based upon progressive life in the immortal spheres of Spirit.

GREEK AND ROMAN VIEWS OF A FUTURE LIFE

ONCE more acknowledging indebtedness to the splendid work of Dr. Alger, from which we have already quoted freely, we again present our readers with a fine descriptive passage from "A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," (pages 175–6), as it serves our purpose so exactly at this particular juncture in our progressive narrative. "The disembodied soul, as conceived by the Greeks, and after them by the Romans, is material, but of so thin a contexture that it cannot be felt with the hands. It is exhaled with the dying breath, or issues through a warrior's wounds. The owner passes through its uninjured form as through the air. It is to the body what a dream is to waking existence. Retaining the shape, lineaments and motion the man had in life, it is immediately recognized upon appearing. It quits the body with much reluctance, leaving that warm and vigorous investiture for a chill and forceless existence. It glides along without noise and very swiftly, like a shadow. It is unable to enter the lower kingdom and be at peace until its deserted body has been buried with the sacred rites; meanwhile, naked and sad, it flits restlessly about the gates, uttering doleful moans."

Unsatisfactory though such a picture unquestionably is, if we apply it to all humanity, it certainly is not without an element of truth if we restrict its application to those who, while on earth, have failed to pay any adequate attention to the supersensuous demands of life.

The Greeks and Romans, as peoples, were during a considerable portion of their externally prosperous history devoted far more to sensuous than to spiritual ideals; consequently the highly gifted seers and seeresses among them, of whom there were many, soon came to perceive that the state of the soul, immediately following physical dissolution, was not extremely enjoyable in a majority of instances, though hopeless misery was no part of the Greek or Roman creed. The importance of burial rites was purposely exaggerated by an ambitious priesthood and various orders of tradespeople, who to this very day, almost all over the earth, profit greatly, not only financially but in the sense of upholding the dignity of their respective offices by the superstitious regard almost universally entertained for funeral services and their elaborate collaterals. There is, without doubt, even some spiritual foundation for funeral and memorial rites, and we would be far from discouraging them totally; at the same time it is clear to see that all unnecessary expenditure upon orgies for the departed is a waste of means and effort, and it also tends to encourage necromantic beliefs and practices in place of aiding us to outgrow our slavish dependence upon external forms to help us in seasons of extremity.

Such mighty minds as Socrates, Plato, and a few other superb philosophers, entertained almost nothing of the popular belief, and one of the chief causes which led to the condemnation to death of the highly honorable Socrates by Athenian judges was the fearless outspokenness with which he inveighed against the slavish devotion to externals which prevailed in his day, even as it prevails in ours to an extent which is almost incredible.

The Greek Mysteries were (and are) sublime beyond compare, but their magnificent symbolism was often shrouded in pitiable superstition before the gaze of the multitude. The splendid dramas in which were enacted the story of the descent of spirit into matter, its gradual ascent through matter to a higher self-conscious immortal life than it had previously enjoyed, and its final participation in the bliss and glory of life celestial, were regarded by many only as religious spectacles, like the famous Passion Play in Bavaria, which has drawn enormous crowds to the celebrated village of Ober Ammergau whenever it has been presented.

The people at large, in all centuries and through all ages, have seen the shell but have not even imagined the kernel within, and when true philosophers (lovers of wisdom) have determined to penetrate to the core of symbolism and unveil a mystery they have been greeted with execration and doomed to execution by a fanatical mob prompted by a corrupted priesthood. A few faithful disciples have, however, always gathered about them, and these have preserved, even though but imperfectly, for future generations the mighty saving truths which the world's greatest thinkers have, at the peril of their earthly all, uncompromisingly enunciated. Some of the early Greek authors described the universe in highly fantastic language and gave to the world descriptions of the unseen spheres of spirit which are to-day generally regarded as merely fanciful speculations. Imaginary though the bulk of these undoubtedly are, there is much in them which repays attention as they are a strange combination of the results of genuine seership and the workings of undisciplined imagination. Though many of the joyless scenes depicted by early Greek rhapsodists as belonging to the world of departed souls would be sad indeed to contemplate were they presented as enduring conditions, we must not forget that the doctrine of reincarnation prevailed in ancient Greece among those who could see little brightness ahead of any one in the "land of shades," thus, while they did not expect much joy or sunshine in the unseen realms, they looked forward to a glad return to earth provided the life previously lived merited so felicitous a consequence as another earthly existence superior to the former.

Modern Theosophy teaches many doctrines which are as near of kin to early Greek as to Hindu concepts, even when leaders in the Theosophical Society draw their teachings avowedly from Hindu sources and freely decorate their speech with Sanskrit words and phrases. This is not difficult to explain when we have once grasped the idea of a universal doctrine and symbolism which runs through all ancient and modern creeds and rituals. We must not forget that when dealing with views of the future life entertained by Greeks of old, we are more often presented with poetical rhapsodies than with anything claiming to be a recital of unembellished fact, and this is precisely the case with Christian legends also. We turn to Virgil and to Homer to study classic views and to Dante and Milton to grasp the ideas of Christians of a later age. In both instances we must make allowance for "poetic license" and not take too literally much that may have originally been intended as an allegory. Allegorical teaching is not properly fictitious, it is illustrative, representative, dramatic in form, and intended to present vivid tableaux by means of which the picture-loving multitude may be led to embrace certain moral truths which they might not so readily heed were they presented without theatrical accompaniments.

That the Greeks expected to recognize their friends in the spirit-spheres is evident from the words of Sophocles who reports the last words of Antigone: "Departing I strongly cherish the hope that I shall be fondly welcomed by my father, my mother, and my brother." Plato, in common with others among the greatest of Greek philosophers, endorses the Socratic doctrine, which is noble, rational and true, that one who has lived an upright life on earth has no need to fear death or aught that lies beyond it. This ancient philosophic doctrine has found its way into modern religious poetry, as witness a beautiful and highly optimistic hymn found in Unitarian and other rational, though spiritually minded, hymnals:

> "Fear ends with death, beyond it
> I nothing see but God."

Extravagant though such a sentiment may be if we seek to apply it universally,—and a sternly just spiritual philosophy may insist upon modifying it,—it is immeasurably superior to the awful reasonless outcries of the bigots and fanatics who "preach into hell" all who have not accepted their creed, or who may have wandered from the path which they in their impudence and arrogance have declared to be the only road to heaven.

Hades, or the underworld of the Greeks, was not a state or place of banishment because of sin or in consequence of any broken law in the plan of the universe; it was merely a state into which all must pass after they had completed their term of physical existence upon the surface of the earth, if their souls were too feeble to climb to Olympus and dwell among divinities. But we must not be unmindful of the important part played by the irrepressible idea of retribution for all righteousness and for all iniquity which is formed in the very essence of human nature, and which blossomed forth in Greece in a contrasting Elysium and Tartarus, the former being the blissful abode of the righteous, the latter a penal settlement for the ungodly.

The distribution of poetic justice as set forth in the Plays sometimes borders on the ludicrous and reminds us of burlesque, precisely as we can scarcely avoid laughter when remembering some of the fantastic mediæval means employed to teach moral lessons and lead the illiterate to forsake their vices and pursue a path of virtue. As accommodations to an undeveloped mental condition on the part of the "vulgar" these representations may be pardonable, but we must seek far beyond them to discover the higher ideas of the learned æsthetic Greeks, whose extreme culture is to this day universally acknowledged. There can be little doubt that the gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome were glorified heroes and heroines who had been, to use a Christian phrase, "canonized as saints" and afterwards promoted to the rank of deities, though there is also a decidedly astronomical element in all mythology.

Ignatius Donelly, in his interesting book "Atlantis," declares that the Greek divinities were founded upon the rulers of Poseidon, that latest fragment of a once enormous island-continent over which the Atlantic waters for many millenniums have rolled. Be this as it may, mythology distinctly reveals to us a popular belief in communion with individual beings who had once lived on earth, and who still retained the distinctive features of their respective individu-alities, but as astronomical elements are found in every theological and theosophical system, we find the names of the different planets given to divinities and attributes ascribed to them not unlike those which modern astrologers assign to Jupiter, Saturn, Venus, Mars and Mercury when they engage in casting and reading horoscopes. Turning to Ovid, we find him summing up the cream of Greek and Roman thought concerning the hereafter in the following illuminating words, which clearly show that differing planes of existence were acknowledged and that the fate of the lower was not ever confounded with the destiny of the higher.

> "Terra tegit carnem; tumulum circumvolat umbra; > Oreus habet manes; spiritus astra petit."

A free translation of which may read,

> Earth hides the flesh; the shade flits round the tomb;
> The image is received by the underworld; the spirit seeks the stars.

Euripides declares that each element in man seeks affinity with its own; thus comes the saying, "the body to the ground; the spirit to the ether." Sublime indeed are many classic accounts of the promotion of ennobled souls to rank among the gods in the Elysium. As human souls still retain distinctive individuality, they were portrayed as exercising sway over the destinies of earth, and this rational faith undoubtedly was shared by all among the truly enlightened philosophers, seers and sages of antiquity. Plotinus has told us that "Whoever has wisdom and true virtue in soul differs but little from superior beings, in this alone being inferior to them—that he is in body." Such an one dying may therefore say with Empedocles,

"Farewell! A god immortal now am I." Vespasian in his expiring moments said, "I shall soon be a god." These and many more expressions of similar character easily culled from the riches of the classic treasure house, must prove beyond dispute that the pure, upright and valorous of earth had no doubt as to their reception among divinities when they had finished their earthly course and passed on to their inevitable reward.

Among devoted friends between whom the bond of friendship has been extremely strong, though one has been manifestly intellectually and morally the superior of the other, fears have been expressed lest the apotheosis of the heroic one should completely banish him from the society of his less-developed comrade who could not be transported to the "Blessed Isles." In many such instances a hero is said to have voluntarily foregone his beatification that he might still remain united with the companion to whom he was devotedly attached. In esoteric confraternities where the Mysteries of Eleusis are fully understood, the praise of this voluntary self-immolation for the sake of another is highly extolled and the declaration is made that whosoever makes this voluntary sacrifice is not only not deprived of his own merited exaltation, but is enabled to so minister from the Elysium to his friend for whom he wished to sacrifice his own promotion that his friend is soon redeemed from the land of shades and entitled to join him in the bliss of Paradise.

Though the barbaric notion is not absent from classic literature that Elysian rewards are bestowed arbitrarily by gods upon their favorites, this crude and decidedly unjust opinion must not be taken as other than a corruption of the classic faith, and it was always discountenanced, and often vehemently inveighed against, by moral teachers who unanimously insisted that all happiness and glory in the hereafter resulted solely from virtuous life. Seneca satirized in the most biting language what he considered a demoralizing doctrine and travestied the supposed deification in the future life of those who were not worthy of such distinction, even going so far as to sarcastically describe the reception of Claudius among celestial "pumpkins." Pindar, the glorious Theban lyrist, takes cheerful views of the state of the departed in general, though he never fails to draw a sharp and equitable line of demarcation between the righteous and the insincere after their exit from mortal bodies. In the various dialogues of Plato many different doctrines are reviewed, but we may reasonably believe that the teachings of his illustrious preceptor, Socrates, were those which he really accepted and transmitted to the world.

It cannot be disputed that Plato has expressed a firm religious and philosophical faith in the immortality of the soul, his thoughts, indeed, were constantly directed to this transcendent theme, and such pure meditations had a great effect upon his wise and useful life. Plato's faith rested not alone or chiefly upon traditional doctrines but upon metaphysical reasonings, in which he took elaborate delight. The sincerity of his reasoning is self-evident as he always seeks to draw practical inferences which tend to ennoble conduct and lead his pupils to live more sanely and seriously than though they had been bereft of their counselor's sage precepts. Plato's philosophy is at times obscure but it is always moral and his teachings concerning reëmbodiment are fully up to the standard of many modern Theosophical deliverances. The soul is always essentially pure, only its vesture can be soiled or muddy. The physical body is sometimes alluded to as a prison-house and the whole material world to a place of humiliation, which is in direct contrast with the materialistic theory, very prevalent in Plato's day, that this external world is the place of joy and blessedness and the state beyond death a dreary unlighted wilderness in which the waning shades of the departed gradually lose all consciousness and eventually pass into extinction.

The immense variety of views entertained by ancient Greeks and Romans were no more numerous and conflicting than those put forward at the present time, for this enlightened twentieth century, with all its boasted culture and refinement, has not outgrown materialism on the one hand or ecclesiastical fanaticism on the other, though both are surely and rapidly declining. Present day spiritual revelations do not serve entirely to dispel confusion, indeed they sometimes seem to add to it, though to the really thoughtful examiner of the many diverse communications alleged to proceed from "departed spirits" the conflict of statement is only superficially apparent.

We cannot presume that all who pass from earth to spirit-life are equally enlightened or that all share identical experiences, nor can we suppose that messages from spirit-spheres are always accurately transmitted or correctly interpreted. Now, as in days of old, there must be an immense amount of difference in the condition of souls who have "crossed the border" even as there is practically incalculable difference between one state of humanity and another here on earth. Again and yet again are we compelled to reiterate the just and solemn truth that dropping a physical body does not transform a character, and no belief in vicarious atonement can produce results in the hereafter which it certainly does not produce on earth.

Stern yet loving is the decree of Deity made manifest in all worlds equally. As the individual sows so must the individual reap. It is a matter of small moment whether we agree or not as to the means whereby the law of equity is universally fulfilled, but to acknowledge that law and trust undoubtingly in its universal fulfilment is to equip ourselves with a moral philosophy which will stand the test of every assault that can ever be made upon it.

How far Plato in the "Phædo" has given us an all-satisfying philosophy of life we leave our readers to decide among themselves by supplementing these meditations of our own with a portion of one of the finest dialogues which the famous Grecian sage has transmitted to posterity.

Socrates is preparing to quaff the hemlock and in view of an almost immediately impending change of state, from earth to spirit life, discourses thus among his friends who have remained faithful to their teacher to the last, despite every calumny and every blast of persecution.

"Answer me, then," he said, "what that is which, when it is in the body, the body will be alive?"

"Soul," he replied.

"Is not this, then, always the case?"

"How should it not be?" said he.

"Does the soul, then, always bring life to whatever it occupies?"

"It does indeed," he replied.

"Whether, then, is there anything contrary to life or not?"

"There is," he replied.

"What?"

"Death."

"The soul, then, will never admit the contrary of that which it brings with it, as has been already allowed?"

"Most assuredly," replied Cebes.

"What, then? How do we denominate that which does not admit the idea of the even?"

"Uneven," he replied.

"And that which does not admit the just, nor the musical?"

"Unmusical," he said, "and unjust."

"Be it so. But what do we call that which does not admit death?"

"Immortal," he replied.

"Therefore, does not the soul admit death?"

"No."

"Is the soul, then, immortal?"

"Immortal."

"Be it so," he said. "Shall we say, then, that this has been now demonstrated? or how think you?"

"Most completely, Socrates."

"What, then," said he, "Cebes, if it were necessary for the uneven to be imperishable, would the number three be otherwise than imperishable?"

"How should it not?"

"If, therefore, it were also necessary that what is without heat should be imperishable, when any one should introduce heat to snow, would not the snow withdraw itself, safe and unmelted? For it would not perish; nor yet would it stay and admit the heat."

"You say truly," he replied.

"In like manner, I think, if that which is insusceptible of cold were imperishable, that when anything cold approached the fire, it would neither be extinguished nor perish, but would depart quite safe."

"Of necessity," he said.

"Must we not, then, of necessity," he continued, "speak thus of that which is immortal? if that which is immortal is imperishable, it is impossible for the soul to perish, when death approaches it. For, from what has been said already, it will not admit death, nor will ever be dead; just as we said that three will never be even, nor, again, will the odd; nor will fire be cold, nor yet the heat that is in fire. But some one may say, what hinders, though the odd can never become even by the approach of the even, as we have allowed, yet, when the odd is destroyed, that the even should succeed in its place? We could not contend with him who should make this objection that it is not destroyed, for the uneven is not imperishable; since, if this were granted us, we might easily have contended that, on the approach of the even, the odd and the three depart; and we might have contended in the same way with respect to fire, heat, and the rest, might we not?"

"Certainly."

"Wherefore, with respect to the immortal, if we have allowed that it is imperishable, the soul, in addition to its being immortal, must also be imperishable; if not, there will be need of other arguments."

"But there is no need," he said, "so far as that is concerned; for scarcely could anything not admit of corruption, if that which is immortal and eternal is liable to it."

"The deity, indeed, I think," said Socrates, "and the idea itself of life, and if anything else is immortal, must be allowed by all beings to be incapable of dissolution."

"By Jupiter!" he replied, "by all men, indeed, and still more, as I think, by the gods."

"Since, then, that which is immortal is also incorruptible, can the soul, since it is immortal, be anything else than imperishable?"

"It must, of necessity, be so."

"When, therefore, death approaches a man, the mortal part of him, as it appears, dies, but the immortal part departs safe and uncorrupted, having withdrawn itself from death?"

"It appears so."

"The soul, therefore," he said, "Cebes, is most certainly immortal and imperishable, and our souls will really exist in Hades."

"Therefore, Socrates," he said, "I have nothing further to say against this, nor any reason for doubting your arguments. But if Simmias here, or any one else, has anything to say, it were well for him not to be silent; for I know not to what other opportunity beyond the present any one can defer it, who wishes either to speak or hear about these things."

"But, indeed," said Simmias, "neither have I any reason to doubt what has been urged; yet, from the magnitude of the subject discussed, and from my low opinion of human weakness, I am compelled still to retain a doubt within myself with respect to what has been said."

"Not only so, Simmias," said Socrates, "but you say this well; and, moreover, the first hypotheses, even though they are credible to you, should nevertheless be examined more carefully; and if you should investigate them sufficiently, I think you will follow my reasoning as far as it is possible for man to do so; and if this very point becomes clear, you will inquire no further."

"You speak truly," he said.

"But it is right, my friends," he said, "that we should consider this—that if the soul is immortal, it requires our care not only for the present time, which we call life, but for all time; and the danger would now appear to be dreadful if one should neglect it. For if death were a deliverance from everything, it would be a great gain for the wicked, when they die, to be delivered at the same time from the body, and from their vices together with the soul; but now, since it appears to be immortal, it can have no other refuge from evils, nor safety, except by becoming as good and wise as possible. For the soul goes to Hades possessing nothing else than its discipline and education, which are said to be of the greatest advantage or detriment to the dead, on the very beginning of his journey thither. For, thus, it is said that each person's demon who was assigned to him while living, when he dies conducts him to some place, where they that are assembled together must receive sentence, and then proceed to Hades with that guide who has been ordered to conduct them from hence thither. But there having received their deserts, and having remained the appointed time, another guide brings them back hither again, after many and long revolutions of time. The journey, then, is not such as the Telephus of Æschylus describes it; for he says that a simple path leads to Hades; but it appears to me to be neither simple nor one, for there would be no need of guides, nor could any one ever miss the way, if there were but one. But now it appears to have many divisions and windings; and this I conjecture from our religious and funeral rites.[1] The well ordered and wise soul, then, both follows, and is not ignorant of its present condition; but that which through passion clings to the body, as I said before, having longingly fluttered about it for a long time, and about its visible place,[2] after vehement resistance and great suffering, is forcibly and with great difficulty led away by its appointed demon. And when it arrives at the place where the others are, impure and having done any such thing as the committal of unrighteous murders or other similar actions, which are kindred to these, and are the deeds of kindred souls, every one shuns it and turns away from it, and will be neither its fellow-traveler nor guide; but it wanders about, oppressed with every kind of helplessness, until certain periods have elapsed; and when these are completed, it is carried, of necessity, to an abode suitable to it. But the soul which has passed through life with purity and moderation, having obtained the gods for its fellow-travelers and guides, settles each in the place suited to it."

The foregoing extracts are taken verbatim from a literal translation of Plato's "Phædo" made by Henry Cary, M. A., Worcester College, Oxford, England, and contained in a very convenient edition of ancient masterpieces entitled "Pocket Literal Translations of the Classics" issued by David McKay, Publisher, Philadelphia.

[1] It is difficult to express the distinction between ὅσια and νόμιμα. The former word seems to have reference to the souls of the dead; the latter, to their bodies.

CHAPTER IX

HINDU CONCEPTIONS OF THE SOUL AND ITS IMMORTALITY

THOUGH during recent years Europe and America have been flooded with Oriental teachers, and translations of Sanskrit literature have been industriously and widely disseminated, the enormous variety of views entertained in eastern Asia concerning all spiritual problems is so bewildering that India and Ceylon, chief centres respectively of Brahmanism and Buddhism, are still storehouses of an immense amount of knowledge as yet unappropriated and uncomprehended in the West. Max Müller styled the "Rig Veda" the oldest book in the world, and it may be clearly seen by all who are attempting to fathom Oriental philosophy, that Vedic teachings lie at the root of almost every modern philosophic system. India has always been a land of entrancing mystery which only the very keenest among Anglo-Indians have ever sought to penetrate.

British rule in India has been something of a blessing, and it may have saved the country from a far worse fate; but the average Briton, until quite recently, even when fairly, and sometimes highly educated, has taken so contemptuous a view of the religion of all "heathen" peoples that he has regarded India only as a field for missionary effort, not as a school in which all peoples may profitably study the foundations of religion and philosophy.

The Sacred Books of the East are now fairly accessible to the reading public the world over, and ever since Max

Müller lectured in Westminster Abbey, by invitation of Dean Stanley in 1870, the stupid prejudice which formerly existed against Oriental doctrines and religious practices has, in some measure, subsided even among the most conservative Christians. Much more recently the work of the Theosophical Society, and in a very marked degree the lectures and writings of Annie Besant, who always commands a large and attentive hearing, has served to dispel much of the gloom and misrepresentation which formerly hung like a funeral pall over the spiritual and intellectual treasures of the mighty East.

Brahmanism and Buddhism are the two great aspects and embodiments of Oriental religion and philosophy which naturally receive the largest share of popular attention. These are not at root antagonistic; for, as Sir Edwin Arnold clearly proved in his magnificent poem "The Light of Asia," Gautama the Buddha was not an iconoclast who sought to destroy the Brahmanic faith, but a reformer whose sole aim was to purify it. The caste system, which seems an integral part of Brahmanism, is not the wholly objectionable thing which many of its traducers still imagine it to be. It is indeed essentially quite reasonable, though liable to gross corruptions; and against perversions of it, and against such only, did the hero of "the Great Renunciation" forcibly protest. The Absolute Being Para-Brahm, being beyond all related definition,—and all peoples demand some concrete views of Deity,—we find three expressions of Infinite Life, called Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, prominent in Indian theology; as we find Osiris, Isis and Horus in Egypt, and Father, Son and Holy Spirit in Christendom. "Three Persons and one God" seems to be the first endeavor on the part of religious leaders to put into something like intelligible phrase the idea of one Supreme Being manifesting in a threefold manner—as Creator, Preserver and Transformer.

The ancient symbols of the Circle and the Triangle are common alike to India and Egypt; indeed we find them everywhere, the former intended to denote the Infinite-Eternal and the absolute immortality of life itself; the latter intended to deal with manifested Being in measure comprehensible by human faculties.

Sir Monier Williams, whose work on Hinduism has been published by the British Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, has very frankly stated that the primal doctrine of Brahmanism is one Infinite Eternal Spirit. All that seemingly exists separate from that Spirit is illusion. This statement should not be taken to mean that there can be no individual existences distinct one from the other; but, though they are distinct, they are essentially inseparable one from the other and are all derived from the Infinite One. We may well remember the words of Mabel Collins in "Light on the Path" where she informs her readers that "Kill out the sense of separateness" is a direction given to all who are seeking to enter within the charmed circle of Eastern (esoteric) wisdom.

Annie Besant, in "A Study in Consciousness," throws much light on the true significance of such a precept, and employs many telling illustrations to elucidate the Oriental idea of unity expressed in multiplicity. Readers of Swedenborg will be quite familiar with this distinction between "separateness" and "distinctness" upon which the illumined seer and sage of Sweden voluminously dwells. "God is the First (original) of every man" is one of Swedenborg's highly important declarations; and we must not forget that he tells us that many thousands of years before his time there were those on earth who knew and treasured the holy truths which he was commissioned to redeliver to mankind in the eighteenth century in Europe. In Great Tartary he says a portion of the "Ancient Word" remains concealed, and he informs us that as the world grows more and more enlightened, as a new dispensation of truth advances on its way, long hidden mysteries will be revealed for the edification of humanity at large.

Brahmans and Buddhists alike conceive of the universe on a gigantic scale, and not only are their ideas of size, but also their ideas of time, magnificent. Mount Meru rises to a height of two million miles from the centre of the earth. On its summit is the abode of Brahma, occupying a space of fourteen thousand leagues, surrounded by the splendid dwellings of celestial regents. Between Meru and the extreme circumference of the earth are seven concentric circles of rock; between these are continents and seas. We might easily go on to paint a wondrous picture of glories and horrors, all contained within this vast expanse, were it our purpose to give to our readers a detailed account of how Oriental imagination has pictured forth its concepts of this universe (one out of a countless multitude of universes) in which we are now abiding,—and through it all a moral purpose runs. But we have no space for such enormous wealth of detail, nor do we undertake to decipher so many graphic hieroglyphics or attempt to point the special lesson which each sublime romantic tale is designed to teach. Suffice it to say that the cosmology and cosmogony of India are so intricate and wonderful, and withal so well in keeping with the latest findings of Western astronomers, that when stripped of picturesque imagery and translated into the sober prose of English speech, we might well accept the claim to supernal wisdom made for the original authors of the Vedas by those who firmly believe that India's sacred literature and immensely ancient traditions embody a system of science and philosophy unequaled elsewhere on earth.

Brahmans and Buddhists alike, sharing faith in an illimitable cosmos, declare that gods, men, demons and every form of animal life occupying a countless host of worlds, all constitute one family. The totality of animated existences, from glorious Indra to the most insignificant insect, constitute one vast fraternal race. We read in the Vishnu Parana: "The Universe, this whole egg of Brahma, is everywhere teeming with living creatures, all captives in the chain of acts." "Elder Brethren of the Race" is the appropriate title often given to Masters and even to Devas (the shining ones) by modern students of Asiatic philosophy, which, when delivered from the shackles of repugnant superstitions with which it is even yet deeply shrouded, will be found to contain a doctrine of Cosmic Consciousness satisfactory to head and heart alike.

The vexed question of the transmigration of souls from body to body until Nirvana is attained, must be considered under two widely differing aspects. With popular credulity we are all measurably familiar, and we can well credit the tale told by H. P. Blavatsky, in her book of travels entitled "In the Caves and Jungles of Hindustan," where she describes an ignorant family mourning over the incarnation of the soul of a member of that family in the body of a vampire bat. Wild, foolish, and repugnant though such superstitions are,—and no one works to abolish them more earnestly than intelligent Theosophists who make a special study of Oriental philosophy,—even such a fate for a human soul is mild and merciful indeed when contrasted with belief in endless misery; for a bat will die in a few years, if it be not killed prematurely, and then the temporarily imprisoned human soul is liberated and allowed another opportunity to pursue an onward way. Such beliefs are, however, exclusively the property of the ignorant and form not any portion of the faith of the learned in Hindustan. This H. P. Blavatsky most positively declares, and Colonel Olcott, president of the Theosophical Society, whose headquarters are at Adyar, has many times confirmed this declaration. James Freeman Clarke, in his splendid treatise on "Ten Great Religions," suggested that the right interpretation of transmigration was evolution. In a "backward cipher" the scientific knowledge of Eastern Asia has been often written; so that when we reverse the order of the literal statement we shall not look forward to incarceration in the bodies of lower creatures, but shall look backward down the ages and trace the life-tide ever rising higher and higher through the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms up to man; then on from stage to stage in human development till at length the progressing spiritual entity clothes itself in garments of celestial glory and manifests as a bright shining Deva, as far beyond the highest human stage with which we are acquainted on earth as that stage is superior to the lowest type of savage.

India's ancient philosophy is indeed intricate, but its intricacies are practically unavoidable, for it aims at nothing less than a definition of the universal Cosmos. We advise our readers to peruse "The Ancient Wisdom" and "A Study in Consciousness," two wonderful books by

Annie Besant, if they are desirous of gaining further insight into the mysteries of Oriental philosophy. Mrs. Besant's works are quite profound, and at the same time sufficiently popular in style to commend her writings to the attention of all seriously disposed people, particularly to all such as wish to know how a studious Englishwoman, who was for many years a public exponent of Materialism, has found in Indian lore a satisfactory answer to all her doubts and cavilings. We do not wonder that many travelers in the East, not excepting some who are highly intelligent, have supposed that Brahmans and Buddhists alike look forward to the ultimate obliteration of all individualized existence; but such a view is not taken by those who penetrate deeply into Oriental doctrine. A single Sanskrit term, Para-Nirvana, is sufficient to prove that Nirvana cannot mean extinction of individual life, or there could be no state beyond; and Para means a higher state. When, in the Christian Scriptures, we read of a condition of blissful existence in Paradise which "eye has not seen, ear has not heard, and the heart of man has not conceived," we are confronted with a truly Oriental concept, and a thoroughly reasonable one; for nothing can be more absurd than to suppose that those spheres of existence which immediately encircle, and also interpenetrate, this earth, and are the present dwelling places of the vast multitude of excarnated human entities who constitute the unseen population of this globe, are the ultimate abiding places of humanity, or that they represent or can make manifest anything higher or larger than the next state, the immediately succeeding link in the mighty chain of progressive individual existence which follows directly upon physical disbodiment.

Though the idea of reincarnation pervades all Hindu literature, there is no mistaking the fact that all Hindu philosophers have spoken of a glorious condition when the soul shall be no longer chained to the "wheel of change." Births and deaths and rebirths are necessary until all lessons have been learned which incarnations can teach, until the soul has become so fully purified from carnal desires and selfish purposes that it is no longer attracted earthward.

But, even when it has fulfilled its allotted tasks, assigned to it by these benevolent "Fires of the Kosmos" and "Lords of Karma" who superintend all the winding paths of man's terrestrial existences, the soul may then, if it so wills, incarnate voluntarily on a mission of good will to humanity, making a voluntary renunciation of the bliss to which it is entitled, and plunging again into the vortex of the earthly maelstrom that it may teach, heal and bless those who are yet struggling on lower rungs of the ladder of attainment. Such is the motive which brings to earth a Messiah or Avatar. Christ, "emptying himself of his glory" and descending to earth to save humanity, is a very familiar thought among all who are diligent students of Asia's profound philosophies. Christians, particularly if they are intelligent Universalists, may do much good in India and help to lift the native populations out of the dreary apathy into which millions have sunk, and out of the superstitions which a degraded form of religion has tolerated if not actually fostered; but missionaries from the West must never forget that they are ministering among a people whose traditions are filled with the noblest ethical precepts, which need only to be revived and restated, not to be supplanted by the jargon of an alien creed.

When perusing much of the accessible literature which attempts to explain Hindu philosophy and makes quotations from the Vedas, Puranas, and other venerable tomes, we are reminded of beautiful pictures executed by truly great masters (such as we often find in Italy), blackened by candle-smoke, festooned with cobwebs, overlaid with dust and grime, but only needing restoration by a cleansing process which shall remove accumulated débris to show themselves anew in pristine glory, as they first appeared when the great artists who produced them had finished their exquisite work. Slowly, but surely, the West is beginning to understand the East, and with the certain downfall of sacerdotal assumptions and ecclesiastical fallacies in Christendom, revised philosophies which do indeed interpret the universe both spiritually and rationally will come prominently into view and take the places now being left vacant by the decline of dogmas which the intelligence of Europe and America has certainly outgrown. We need not attempt to vouch for figures, all of which may have a symbolic and esoteric meaning, but even when we are told that four billion, three hundred and twenty millions of years constitute a day of Brahma, during which a manifested universe exists, and that this is followed by a Night of Brahma, during which it sleeps, we can only exclaim that such stupendous periods agree far more with the findings of modern astronomers than did the ridiculously small numbers, extending only to a few thousand years, which our forefathers believed marked correctly the duration of a solar system, because they took every word in Genesis literally and had no knowledge whatever of the figurative style in which all Oriental books are written.

Hindu philosophy is centred in the idea of Karma, which is relentless equity, allowing no place for such pardon, forgiveness or vicarious atonement as the orthodox Christian world delights to picture; but stern and unrelenting though the Karmic law appears, it is truly described by Sir Edwin Arnold in those memorable words—"the heart of it is love," which should never be forgotten by any who seek to penetrate its august mysteries. The most orthodox of Christians love the beautiful text from the first of John's Epistles—"God is love," but such words are a mockery in the ears of heart-stricken mourners, who have been newly bereft of some beloved friend who has passed into the unseen state "unconverted" or "unregenerate," for a wicked belief in endless misery does not tolerate even a hope that such poor souls shall ever be released from misery. "God has decreed otherwise" is the blasphemous utterance of many a deluded and deluding preacher, who controverts what Tennyson expressed as "the larger hope." Though so frightful a doctrine is not nearly so common as it used to be, it is still preached, particularly at revival and mission services, but never with any permanently good effect. If all Christians were Universalists we could listen in complacent silence to their attacks on some aspects of Oriental philosophy, and even then we would mildly suggest that there is something yet to be learned from Asia, but the most savage attacks upon the allied doctrines of Karma and Reincarnation have come from types of missionaries into whose darkened minds the light of Universalism has never shone. It may not be pleasant, while the suffering lasts, to pay the penalty due to one's misdeeds, but the result is well worth all that it has cost to reach it; this the Christian New Testament, equally with Hindu Scriptures, unequivocally declares.

Many Spiritualists antagonize the thought of reëmbodi-

ment, while others fervently proclaim it, but all teach retribution and progressive elevation. We may dispute over ways and means, but we can all agree on one point, viz., that as we sow we reap. The law of sequence (Karma) does not permit of inequity in the universe. All is adjusted perfectly throughout the immensely complicated scheme of worlds of which this earth is one. This is a teaching common to Spiritualism and to Theosophy, and its roots are deeply grounded in ancient Oriental doctrines.

Our attention having frequently been called to the necessity of having clear English equivalents for Sanskrit terms which are now often freely mentioned among students of spiritual philosophy, and wishing to present our readers with as clear and concise an outline as possible of Hindu teaching, we have drawn the following interpretations from "A Study in Consciousness" by Annie Besant (Theosophical Publishing Society) in the hope that the few extracts we have taken the liberty to make from that erudite volume will lead many of our readers to procure and study it themselves. Though the sub-title of the book is "A contribution to the Science of Psychology," it is widely different, alike in tone and subject matter, from works on psychology in general, as it is based on Hinduism, and then branches out into all the many fields which Materialists equally with Theosophical psychologists seek to study. Mrs. Besant says "We have learned that the matter in a solar system exists in seven great modifications, or planes. On three of these, the physical, emotional (astral) and mental—often spoken of as the three worlds—the well-known Trilokî or Tribhunanam of the Hindu cosmogony is proceeding the normal evolution of humanity. On the next two planes, the spiritual—those of wisdom and power, the Buddhic and the Atmic—goes on the specific evolution of the Initiate, after the first of the Great Initiations. These five planes form the field of the evolution of consciousness, until the human merges in the divine. The two planes beyond the five represent the sphere of divine activity, encircling and enveloping all, out of which pour forth all the divine energies which unify and sustain the whole system. They are at present entirely beyond our knowledge, and the few hints that have been given regarding them probably convey as much information as our limited capacity is able to grasp. We are taught that they are the planes of Divine Consciousness, wherein the Logos, or the divine trinity of Logoi, is manifested and wherefrom He shines forth as the Creator, the Preserver, the Dissolver; evolving a universe, maintaining it during its life-period, withdrawing it into Himself at its ending. We have been given the names of these two planes: the lower is the Anupadâka, that wherein no vehicle has yet been formed; the higher is the Adî; the first, the foundation of a universe, its support, the fount of its life. We have thus the seven planes of a universe, a solar system, which, as we see by this brief description, may be regarded as making up three groups: 1. The field of Logic manifestation only. 2. The field of super-normal human evolution, that of the Initiate. 3. The field of elemental, mineral, vegetable, animal and normal human evolution. We may tabulate these facts thus:

1. Adî 2. Anupadâka	I. The field of Logic manifestation only.
3. Atmic 4. Buddhic	II. The field of super-normal human evolution.

5. Mental 6. Emotional 7. Physical	III. The field of elemental, mineral, vegetable, animal, and normal human evolution.

As we are indebted to Mrs. Besant for this summary of Hindu teaching concerning the system of worlds in which we are at present living, she in turn acknowledges indebtedness to a Sanskrit manuscript called Pranana-vâda. Here we have a very ancient and truly profound exposition of the seven states, or spheres, which are continually being mentioned in connection with spiritual existence. The number seven is the number of the system to which this earth belongs, and throughout all sacred literature, and persistently in spiritualistic statements does this number appear. In the first chapter of Genesis the work of Elohim is accomplished in six periods of activity followed by a seventh period of sublime repose. In the Apocalypse there are seven spirits of God or divine emanations from the Ineffable One, seven seals which have to be broken before the contents of the mystic book can be made known, also a rainbow about the throne, another allusion to the number seven. The Beast and the False Prophet can never attain to a higher numeral than six; therefore six hundred sixty-six, denoting imperfection of statement and failure to attain to completeness in any direction, is given as the number of all that is doomed in time to pass away. Whoever will study the Christian Scriptures side by side with Sanskrit documents will find a wonderful agreement between them, and it is surely not presumptuous to suggest that the younger have more likely drawn from the elder than that the more ancient have been copied from those of later date. Investigations of Hindu documents reveal the roots of every doctrine which has been set forth as original with Christianity, and though perversions are found in India as well as in Europe, and we should be foolish indeed did we bow slavishly to all the theories we might pick up in India, the venerable sources whence Brahmanical and Buddhistic doctrines and institutions have sprung are truly wells of living water at which thirsty travelers may refresh themselves to-day, even as did the ancient Aryans long before that decadence set in under which degraded India has suffered for so many centuries. Though it is continually asserted by opponents of Hindu philosophy that its inculcations are mainly responsible for India's degradation, we answer emphatically no ! though we admit that a corrupted priesthood has had much to do with the servility and despondency of a large section of India's teeming population. But Christendom cannot boast of freedom from the same blight, seeing that the beautiful teachings of the New Testament have been equally travestied and perverted, and nowhere have people been kept in greater ignorance than during some periods in Christian countries even when a dominant church has had the power in its hands to change conditions at its dictation.

Prophets and priests have always been at variance. It was Buddha the enlightened prophet who revolutionized the religion of India in his day, from 500 to 600 B. C. Not against the Vedas did he utter protest, but only against perverse practices and a falsification of the ancient faith.

The caste system of India can easily be justified and it can as easily be condemned, for there are two diametrically opposite views of caste still extant. The four great castes are all said to proceed from Brahma. The highest or ruling caste proceeds from Brahma's head ; the two intermediary castes from Brahma's body; the lowest caste from Brahma's feet. At first sight it seems that such a classification necessarily leads to the exaltation of some and the humiliation of others, but a deeper study of the statement serves to dispel that illusion, because we are at once reminded that a divine body is equally good in all its parts, therefore to proceed from divine feet is to be intrinsically as holy as though one had issued from the divine head. The four great castes are intended to do distinct kinds of work in the world, and are qualified accordingly; and as all useful work is honorable, no one can be degraded or should any one be despised because he does any portion of it.

Then again, when the doctrine of reincarnation is considered it may be fairly argued that those now in the highest caste have come up through a succession of lives from the very lowest, and those now in the lowest are destined to make their way upward even to the highest. Such a doctrine is consistent with the claim of universal brotherhood, and has no connection whatever with Calvin's misconceptions of election which made the teaching of Paul hideous through such gross perversions of its meaning. We hear much of the inferior place assigned to women in India, and we are told that the Hindu Scriptures sanction female degradation. Here again we protest that only degraded notions and practices have obscured the primitive faith and practice, for if we but remember that the same soul is said to live alternately on earth in male and female bodies, it is ridiculous to assume that either man or woman can be the higher of the two. Sir Monier Williams has told us that all the gods of India have wives, and that goddesses hold equal rank with gods in Hindu mythology. This is so, and it is equally the case with Egyptian, Greek and all other mythologic systems, though, as in the history of Judaism and Christianity, there have been times when an exclusively male priesthood has monopolized all religious functions, and never without introducing barbarity and bloodshed. There are no venerable Scriptures extant which do not give abundant evidence that men and women, in days of pristine purity, were regarded as of equal rank and dignity in the eyes of heaven and earth; we therefore rejoice in every effort made in India, as in other lands, to reinstate woman in her rightful place as man's coequal, neither higher nor lower than her brother. If we find practices in India which are revolting to our sense of equity, let us protest against them, but let us not fall into the foolish popular error of confounding decadent beliefs and customs with the original sublimities of Vedanta philosophy.

It is a noteworthy fact that the Theosophical Society, which soon after its formation in New York, in 1875, established its headquarters in India, depended more upon a woman (H. P. Blavatsky) than upon any man for the introduction of Eastern philosophy to the West, and to-day another remarkable woman (Annie Besant) is unveiling the ancient Hindu doctrines to the Occident. We are quite well aware that there are Hindus who resent and oppose the work of a woman, born in another land, who gathers disciples around her in ancient India and unfolds to them some of the mysteries of their own most venerated books; but it has never occurred in the history of any renaissance and reform that some self-interested and ultra-conservative element has not arisen to put obstacles in the path of the reformer. We must not judge Hindu philosophy in its original purity by the encrustations which have long obscured it; and considering the attitude of the average Briton to the native population of India, we need not wonder that suspicion is aroused in some quarters whenever a member of the invading and conquering race appears as a friend of the ancient religion which Christian missionaries have sought in vain to overthrow. To purify from foul accretions is a noble work, and one in which enlightened people of all nations can unitedly engage; but to substitute orthodox Christianity for Hinduism will prove an impossible attempt, as the philosophic Hindu mind can never be induced to accept it. In Ceylon, where the Theosophical Society long ago established an excellent school for Buddhist girls at Colombo, the same kindly feeling has been spreading between the British and the Cinghalese which was largely promoted by Sir Edwin Arnold, whose "Light of Asia" was accepted by the chief representatives of Southern Buddhism as a truthful exposition of the Buddhist faith. To the Western intellect that well-known and greatly admired poem fails to make quite clear what Buddhists really believe concerning the destiny of the soul; but this at least is clear that they have a distinct conception of an ever-ascending life, and though there are agnostics and pessimists among them, their real faith is quite in harmony with the Unitarian declaration concerning the progress of humanity onward and upward forever. Tradition declares that Gautama reached Nirvana while yet he lived on earth, and as Nirvana only means conquest over every selfish appetite and personal desire apart from the life of others, we can readily see how easily one may believe that a true Master may have entered a state of serene blessedness, at one with all life, and still retain individual self-consciousness in this or in any other sphere of Spiritual activity.

In the next chapter we present the views of one of the Hindu delegates to the World's Parliament of Religions, expressed in a lecture presented to us by its author, the genial Swami Vivekananda, who after returning to his native India soon peacefully quitted his earthly condition and passed into the ranks of those unseen ministers who keep faithful watch over the progress of incarnate humanity and, oftener than any of us think, inspire our efforts to reach the goal that they, with us, are still pursuing.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY

THE following lecture on "The Atman," by the Swami Vivekananda, delegate to the Parliament of Religions, Chicago, 1893, was originally delivered under the auspices of the Brooklyn Ethical Association, February 2, 1896, and presented to the author of this volume by the gifted lecturer, who has since departed to spirit life. In 1899 at Greenacre, a charming resort on the border line between New Hampshire and Maine, conducted by Miss Sarah Farmer (a true philanthropist) we were privileged to sit under the trees and listen to the following philosophy:

(1) The Differentiated: Personal God.
(2) The Partially Differentiated: Immanent God.
(3) The Undifferentiated: Impersonal God.

MANY of you have read Max Müller's celebrated book, "Three lectures on the Vedanta Philosophy," and some of you may, perhaps, have read in German, Professor Deussen's book on the same philosophy. In much that is written and taught in the West about the religious thought of India one school of Indian thought is principally represented, that which is called "Advaitism," the monistic side of Indian religion; and sometimes it is thought that all the teachings of the Vedas are comprised in that one system of philosophy. There have, however, been various phases of Indian thought, and perhaps this non-dualistic form is in the minority as compared with the other phases. From the most ancient times there have been various sects of thought in India, and, as there never was a formulated or recognized church or any body of men to designate the doctrines which should be believed by each school, people were very free to choose their own form, make their own philosophy and establish their own sects. We, therefore, find that from the most ancient times India was full of religious sects. At the present time I do not know how many hundreds of sects we have in India, and several fresh ones are coming into existence every year. It seems that the religious activity of that nation is simply inexhaustible.

Of these various sects, in the first place, there can be made two main divisions, the orthodox and the unorthodox. Those that believe in the Hindu Scriptures, the Vedas, as eternal revelations of truth are called orthodox, and those that stand on other authority, rejecting the Vedas, are the heterodox in India. The chief modern unorthodox Hindu sects are the Jains and the Buddhists. Excepting these, the orthodox Hindu sects comprise nearly the whole of the Hindu population of India at the present time, and all admit the authority of the Hindu Scriptures, the Vedas. Some of them declare that the Scriptures are of much higher authority than reason; others, again say that only that portion of the Scriptures which is rational should be taken and the rest rejected.

They, also, form various sects. These sects were divided into three groups—the Sankhyas, the Naiyayikas and the Mimamsakas. Of these three groups two, the Sankhyas and the Naiyayikas, although they existed as philosophical schools, failed to form any sect. The one sect that now really covers India is that of the later Mimamsakas, or the Vedantists. Their philosophy is called Vedantism. All the various philosophies are based on the Vedantas, the Hindu Scriptures, but the monists took the name to themselves as a specialty, because they wanted to base the whole of their theology and philosophy upon the Vedas and nothing else, and in the course of time they prevailed, and all the various sects of India that now exist can be referred to some form of these Vedantists. Yet these Vedantists are not unanimous in their opinions.

We find now that there are three principal variations among the sects. On one point they all agree, and that is that they all believe in God. All these Vedantists also believe the Vedas to be the revealed word of that God, not exactly in the same sense, perhaps, as the Christians or the Mahommedans believe, or the Buddhists, but in a very peculiar sense. Their idea is that the Vedas are an expression of the knowledge of God. and as God is eternal, His knowledge is eternally with Him, and so are the Vedas eternal. There is another common ground of belief; the belief in the creation in cycles; that the whole of this creation is appearing and disappearing; it is projected and becomes grosser and grosser, and that at the end of an incalculable period of time the whole thing becomes finer and dissolves, and subsides, and then comes a period of rest. Again, it begins to appear. They admit one material, which they call "akasa," something like the present ether theory of the scientists, and a power which they call "prana." About this prana they declare that by its vibration all the universe is produced. When a cycle ends, all this manifestation of nature becomes finer and finer and dissolves back to that akasa, that ether, which cannot be seen or felt, yet out of which everything is manufactured. All the forces that we see in nature, either as gravitation, or attraction, or repulsion, or as thought, as feeling, as nervous motion—all these various forces resolve into that prana, and the vibration of that prana ceases; in that state it remains until the beginning of the next cycle. Prana then begins to vibrate, and that vibration acts upon the akasa, and all these forms are thrown out in regular succession.

The first sect about whom I want to speak to you is that which we style in India the "Dualists." The Dualists are those who believe that God, who is the Creator of the universe and its Ruler, is eternally separate from nature, eternally separate from the human soul. The souls, according to all the different theories, are eternal. God is eternal; nature is eternal; so are all souls. Nature and the souls become manifested and change, but God remains the same. According to the Dualists, again, this God is personal, in that He has qualities, not that He has body. No sect believes that God has body, only that He has human attributes; He is merciful; He is just; He is powerful; He is almighty; He can be approached; He can be prayed to; He can be loved; He loves in return, and so forth. In one word, He is a Human God, only infinitely greater than man; He has none of the evil qualities which men have. "He is the repository of an infinite number of blessed qualities"; that is their definition. This God is creating this universe out of nature. He cannot create without materials, and nature is the material out of which He creates this whole universe. Some of the Dualists are what they call the "Atomists," who believe that this nature is nothing but an infinite number of atoms, and God's will, acting upon these atoms, creates. The Vedantists deny the atomic theory; they say this theory is perfectly illogical. Supposing there were atoms, according to the theory atoms must be indivisible. They are like geometrical points, without parts or magnitude, but something without parts or magnitude, if multiplied an infinite number of times, will remain the same. Anything that has no parts will never make something that has parts; any number of zeros added together will not make one single whole number. So, if these atoms are such that they have no parts or magnitude, out of such atoms the creation of the universe is simply impossible. Therefore, according to the Vedantic Dualists, there is this nature, which they call indiscreet or undifferentiated, and out of that God creates this universe. The vast mass of Indian people are Dualists. Human nature ordinarily cannot conceive of anything higher than this. We find ninety per cent. of the population of this earth of ours who believe in any religion are Dualists. All the religions of Europe and Western Asia are Dualistic; they have to be; they cannot think of anything which is not concrete. Man naturally likes to cling to that which his intellect can grasp. That is to say, he can only conceive of higher spiritual ideas by bringing them down to his own level. He can only grasp abstract thoughts by making them concrete. This is the religion of the mass of mankind all over the world. They believe in a God who is entirely separate from them, as it were, a great king, a high, mighty monarch. At the same time they make Him purer than the monarchs of the earth; they give Him all good qualities and remove the evil qualities from Him. As if it were ever possible for good to exist without evil; as if there could be any conception of light without a conception of darkness!

With all Dualistic theories the first difficulty to present itself would be, How is it possible that, under the rule of a just and merciful God, the repository of an infinite number of good qualities, there can be so many evils in this world? This question has arisen in all Dualistic religions, but the Hindus never invented a Satan as an answer to it. All of these sects, with one accord, lay the blame on man himself, and it was easy for them to do this. How? Because, as I have just now told you, they do not believe that souls were created out of nothing. We see in this life that we shape and can form all our own future; every one of us, every day, is trying to shape to-morrow. To-day we fix the fate of to-morrow; to-morrow we will fix the fate of the day after to-morrow, and so on. It is quite logical that this reasoning can be pushed backward, too. If, by our own deeds, we shape our destiny in the future, why not apply the same rule to the past? If, in an infinite chain, a certain number of links, repeated alternately, eternally recur, then, if one of these groups be explained, we can explain the whole chain. So, in this infinite length of time, if we can cut off one portion and explain that portion and understand it, then, if it be true that nature is uniform, the same explanation must apply to the whole chain of time. If it be true that we are working out our own destiny here within this short space of time, if it be true that everything must have a cause as we see it now, it must also be true that that which we are now is the effect of the whole of the past; therefore, no other person is necessary to shape the destiny of mankind but man himself. The evils that are in this world are caused by none else but ourselves. We have caused all this evil; and, just as we constantly see misery resulting from evil actions, so we can also see that much of the existing misery in the world is the effect of past wickedness in man. Man alone, therefore, according to this theory, is responsible; God is not to blame; He the eternally merciful Father is not to blame at all. "We reap that we sow."

Another peculiar doctrine is that every soul must eventually come to salvation. No one will be left. Through various vicissitudes, through various sufferings and enjoyments, in the end, each one of them will come out. Come out of what? The one common idea of all Hindu sects is that all souls have to get out of this universe. Neither that universe which we now see and feel or even that which we can imagine, is the right, the real one, because both are mixed up with good and evil. According to the Dualists, there is beyond this universe one where there is only happiness and only good and, what is much dearer to them, where there will be no more necessity of being born and reborn, of living and dying. No more death there; no more disease. It will be eternal happiness, where they will be in the presence of God for all time and enjoy God forever. They believe that all beings, from the lowest worm up to the highest angels and gods, will all, sooner or later, come to that world where there will be no more misery. But this world will never stop; it goes on infinitely, although moving in waves and falls. Although moving in cycles, it never ends. The number of souls that are to be saved, that are to be perfected, is infinite. Some are in plants; some are in lower animals; some are in men; some are in gods, but all of them, even the highest gods, are imperfect, are in bondage. What is the bondage? The necessity of being born and the necessity of dying. Even the highest gods die. What are these gods, again? They mean certain states, certain offices.

For instance, Indra, the king of gods, means a certain office; some soul which was very high has gone to fill that post in this cycle, and after this cycle he will be born again as man and come down, and the man who is very good in this cycle will go and fill that post in the next cycle. So with all these gods; they are certain offices which have been filled alternately by millions and millions of souls, who, after filling that office, all came down and became men. Those who do good works in this world, help others, but with an eye to reward, hoping to reach heaven or to get praise of their fellow men, must, when they die, have the benefit, the reward of these good works, so they become these gods. But that is not salvation; salvation never will come through this hope of reward. Whatever man desires the Lord gives him that. Men desire power; they desire prestige; they desire enjoyments as gods, and they get these desires fulfilled, but no effect of work can be eternal; the power of any work will be finished after a certain length of time; it may be eons, but after that it will be finished, and these gods must fall down again and become men and will be given one more chance for liberation. The lower animals will come up and become men, become gods, perhaps, again become men, or go back to animals, until will come the time when they will get rid of all this desire for enjoyment, this thirst for life, this clinging on to the "me and mine." This "me and mine," according to the Hindu sects, is the very root of all the evil in this world. If you ask a Dualist whose child this will be if it is not mine, he will say, "It is God's"; if my property is not mine, "It is God's." Everything should be held as God's.

Now, these Dualistic sects in India are great vegetarians, great preachers of non-killing of animals. But their idea about it is quite different from that of the Buddhist. If you ask a Buddhist, "Why do you preach against killing any animal?" he says, "We have no right to take any life," and if you ask a Dualist, "Why do you not kill any animal?" he says, "Because it is the Lord's." So the Dualist says that this "me and mine" is to be applied to God and God alone; He is the only "me," and everything is His. When a man has come to that state that he has no "me and mine," when everything is given up to the Lord, when he loves everybody and is ready even to give up his life for a little animal, without any desire for reward, then his heart will be purified, and when the heart has been purified then into that heart will come the love of God, which is inherent in every soul. This God is the very centre of attraction for every soul, and the Dualist says, "If you take a needle and cover it up with clay that needle will not be attracted by a magnet, but as soon as the clay has been washed off, the needle will be attracted by the magnet." God is the magnet, and the human soul is the needle, and his evil works the dirt and dust that cover it. As soon as the soul is clear it will come by its natural attraction to God and remain with Him forever, but will remain eternally separate from God. Each soul, if it wishes, can take any form; will be able to make a hundred bodies if it wishes or to have no body at all, if it so desires. It will be almost almighty, except that it will be unable to create; that belongs to God alone. None, however perfect, can manage the affairs of this universe; that belongs to God. But all souls, when they become perfect, become happy forever and live eternally with God. This is the Dualistic statement.

One other idea the Dualists preach. They protest against the idea of praying to God, "Lord, give me this and give me that." They think that should not be done. If man must ask some material gift he should ask inferior beings for that; ask one of these gods, or the angels, or a perfected being for such things. God is only to be loved. It is almost a blasphemy to pray to God, "Lord, give me this and give me that." According to the Dualists, therefore, what a man wants sooner or later he will get, by praying to one of the gods, but if he wants salvation he must worship God. This is the religion of the masses of India.

Above them are what we call the qualified non-Dualists, with whom the real Vedanta philosophy begins. They make the statement that the effect is never different from the cause; the effect is but the cause reproduced in another form. If this universe is the effect and God the cause, it must be God Himself—it cannot be anything but that. If any nature exists separate from God Himself, it also will be infinite; so will be time and space. Thus multiplied, there will be millions of infinite and independent existences, which is not reasonable. They start, therefore, with the assertion that God is both the efficient and material cause of this universe; that He Himself is the Creator, and He Himself is the material out of which the whole of nature is projected. The word which is "creation" in your language is, in Sanskrit, exactly "projection," because there is no sect in India which believes in creation, as it is regarded in the West, a something coming out of nothing. It seems at one time there were a few that had some such idea, but they were very quickly silenced. At the present time I do not know of any sect that believes this. What we mean by creation is projection of that which already existed. Now, this whole universe, according to this sect, is God Himself. He is the material of this universe. We read from the Vedas, "As the uranabha spider takes the thread out of his own body and draws it in, even so this whole universe has come out of that Being."

If the effect is the cause reproduced, the question is, how do we find this material, dull, unintelligent universe produced as the manifestation of God, who is not material, who is eternal intelligence? How, if the cause is pure and perfect, is the effect quite different? What do these qualified non-Dualists say? Theirs is a very peculiar theory. They say that these three existencies, God, and nature, and the soul, are One. God, is, as it were, the soul; and nature and souls are the body of God. Just as I have a body and I have a soul, so this whole universe and my soul also are the body of God, and God is the soul of my soul. Thus God is the material cause of the universe. The body may be changed—may be young or old, strong or weak—but that does not change the soul at all. It is the same eternal existence, manifesting through the body. Bodies fall off one after another, but the soul does not change. Even so this whole universe is the body of God, and in that sense it is God. But the change in this universe does not affect God. Out of this material He creates this universe, and at the end of a cycle His body becomes finer, it contracts, and at the beginning of another cycle it becomes expanded again, and out of it evolve all these different worlds.

Now, both the Dualists and the qualified non-Dualists admit that the soul is by its nature pure, but through its own deeds it is made impure. The qualified non-Dualists express it more beautifully than the Dualists, by saying that the soul's purity and perfection become contracted and again become manifest, and that what we are now trying to do is to manfest the intelligence, the purity, the power which is natural to the soul. Souls have a multitude of qualities, but not that of almightiness or all-knowingness. This is the nature of the soul. It has become contracted through past misdeeds, every wicked deed contracts the nature of the soul, and every good deed expands the nature of the soul, and these souls are all part of God. "As from a mass of fire millions of sparks fly, of the same nature, the same ingredients, yet not the same, so even from this infinite Being, God, these souls have come. Each has the same nature, yet not the same." Each has the same goal. The God of the qualified non-Dualists is also the Personal God, the repository of an infinite number of blessed qualities, only He is interpenetrating everything in the universe. He is immanent in everything and everywhere, and where the Scriptures say that God is everything they say that that means that God is interpenetrating everything, not that God has become the wall, but that God is in the wall. There is not a particle, not an atom in the universe where He is not, both internal and external. The souls are all limited; they are not omnipresent; each soul is very, very limited, but they get expansion of their powers and become perfect. No more is there birth and death for these souls; they live with God forever.

Now we come to the Advaitist, the last, and what we think the fairest flower of philosophy and religion that any country in any age has produced, where human thought attains its highest expression and even goes beyond the mystery which seems to be impenetrable. This is the non-

Dualistic Vedantism. It is too abstruse, too elevated to be the religion of the masses. Even in India, its birthplace, where it has been ruling supreme for the last three thousand years, it is not able to permeate the masses. As we go on we will find that it is difficult for even the most thinking man and woman in any country to understand Advaitism. We have made ourselves so weak; we have made ourselves so low. We may make great claims, but we naturally want to lean on somebody else. We are like little, weak plants, always wanting a support. How many times I am asked for a "comfortable religion"; very few ask for the truth. Fewer still dare to learn the truth, and fewest of all dare follow truth in its practical bearings. It is not their fault; it is all the weakness in the brain. Any new thought, especially of a high kind, creates a disturbance, wants to make a new channel, as it were, in the brain matter, and that unhinges the system, throws men off their balance. Then come a hundred sorts of surroundings, a huge mass of ancient superstitions, paternal superstition, class superstition, city superstition, country superstition, and beyond this all the vast mass of superstition that is innate in the human being. Yet there are a few brave souls in this world who dare conceive the truth, who dare take it up, and who dare follow it up to the last end.

What does the Advaitist declare? He says, if there is a God, that God must be both the material and the efficient cause of the universe. Not only is He the Creator, but He is also the created. He Himself is this universe. How can that be? God, the pure, the spirit, has become this universe? Yes; apparently. That which all ignorant people see, this universe, does not exist. You and I and all these things we see, what are these? Mere self-hypno-tions; there is but One Existence, the Infinite, the ever existing One. In that Existence we dream all these various dreams. It is the Atman, beyond all, the Infinite, beyond the known, beyond the knowable; in and through That we see this universe. It is the only reality. It is this table; It is the audience before me; It is the wall; It is everything, minus the name and form. Take the form of the table, take away the name; what remains is that It. The Vedantist does not call It either He or She; these are fictions, delusions of the human brain; there is no sex in the soul. People who are under illusion, who have become like animals, see a woman or a man; living gods do not see men or women. How can they who are beyond everything have any sex idea? Every one and everything is the Atman—the Self—the sexless, the pure, the ever blessed. It is name and form that makes the difference. It is the name, the form, the body, which are material, and they make all this difference. If you take off these two differences of name and form, the whole universe is One; there are no two, no three, but One everywhere. You and I are one. There is neither nature, nor God, nor the universe, only that One Infinite Existence, out of which, through name and form, all these are manufactured. How to know the Knower? It cannot be known. How can you see your own Self? You can only reflect yourself. So all this universe is the reflection of that One Eternal Being, the Atman, and, as the reflection falls upon good or bad reflectors, good or bad images are cast up. So, in the murderer, the reflector is bad and not the Self. In the saint the reflector is pure. The Self—the Atman—is by its own nature pure. It is the same that is reflecting itself from the lowest worm to the highest and most perfect beings, the one Existence of the universe. The whole of this universe is One Unity, One Existence, physically, mentally, morally and spiritually. We are looking upon this One Existence in different forms and creating all these images upon it. To the being who has limited himself to the condition of man this world is what he sees. To the being who is on a higher plane of existence it may become like heaven. There is but one Soul in the universe, not two. It neither comes nor goes. It neither reincarnates nor dies, nor is born. How can it? How to die? Where to go? All these heavens and all these earths, and all these places are vain imaginations of the mind. They do not exist; never existed in the past and never will exist in the future.

I am standing here, omnipresent, eternal. Where can I go? Where am I not already? I am reading this book of nature. Page after page I am finishing and turning over, and one dream of life goes away. Another page of life is turned over; another dream of life comes, and it goes away, rolling and rolling, and when I have finished my play I let it go and stand aside, throw away the book, and the whole thing is finished. What does the Advaitist preach? He dethrones all the gods that ever existed, or ever will exist in the universe and places on that throne the Self of man, the Atman, higher than the sun and moon, higher than the heavens, more infinite than this infinite universe itself. No books, no Scriptures, no science can ever imagine the glory of that Self, that appears as man, the most glorious God that ever was, the only God that ever existed, ever exists, or ever will exist. I am to worship, therefore, none but my Self. "I worship my Self," says the Advaitist. Whom to bow down to? I salute my Self. Whom to go to for help? Who can help me, the Infinite Being of the universe? These are fools' dreams, brain hallucinations; who ever helped any one? Never. Wherever you see a weak man, a Dualist, weeping and wailing for help from somewhere above the skies it is because he does not know that the skies also are in him. He wants help from the skies, and the help comes. We see that it comes; but it comes from within, and he mistakes it as coming from without. Sometimes a sick man is lying on his bed, and he hears a tap on the door. He gets up and opens the door. Nobody. He goes back to his bed, and again he hears the tap. He gets up and opens the door. Nobody. At last he finds that it was his own heart beating, which he interpreted as a knock at the door. Thus all this vain search after the gods above, gods of the skies, gods of the water, after it has completed the circle, comes back to the point from which it started—the human soul—and man finds that the God for whom he was searching in every hill and dale, for whom he was seeking in every little brook of water, in every temple, in little churches, in worse heavens, that God whom he was even imagining as sitting in heaven and ruling the world, is his own Self. I am He, and He is I. None but I was the God, and this little I never existed.

Yet, how could that perfect God have been in this delusion? It never was. How could a perfect God have been dreaming? He never dreamed. Truth never dreams. One cloud is there; another comes and pushes it aside and takes its place. Another comes and pushes that one out. The very question where did this illusion arise is absurd. Illusion arises from illusion alone. There will be no illusion as soon as the truth is seen. Illusion always rests upon illusion; it never rested upon God, the Truth, the Atman. You are never in the illusion; it is illusion that is in you, before you. "As before the eternal blue sky clouds of various hue and color come; they remain there for a short time and again disappear, leaving it the same blue, eternally standing, even so are you, eternally pure, eternally perfect; you are the veritable gods of the universe; nay, there are not two; there is but One." It is a mistake to say you and I; say "I." It is I who am eating in millions of mouths; how can I be hungry? It is I who am working in an infinite number of hands; how can I be inactive? It is I who am living the life of the whole universe; where is death for me? I am beyond all life, beyond all death. Where to seek for freedom, for I am free by my nature? Who can make me bound, the God of this universe? What are these books for me? These Scriptures of the world are but little maps, wanting to delineate my glory, who am the only existence of the universe. Thus says the Advaitist.

"Know the truth and be free in a moment." All the darkness will vanish. When man has seen himself as one with the infinite Being of the universe, when all separateness has ceased, when all men, all women, all angels, all gods, all animals, all plants, the whole universe has been melted into that oneness, then all fear disappears. Whom to fear? Can I hurt myself? Can I kill myself? Can I injure myself? Do you fear yourself? Then will all sorrow disappear. What can cause me sorrow? I am the One Existence of the universe. Then all jealousies will disappear; of whom to be jealous? Of myself? Then all bad feelings disappear. Against whom will I have this bad feeling? Against myself? There is none in the universe but me. And this is the way, says the Vedantist, to this knowledge. Kill out this differentiation, kill out this superstition that there are many. "He who, in this world of many, sees that One; he who in this mass of insentiency sees that One Sentient Being; he who in this world of shadow catches that Reality, unto him belongs eternal peace, unto none else, unto none else."

These are the salient points of the three steps which Indian religious thought has taken in regard to God. We have seen that it began with the Personal, the extra cosmic God. It went from the external to the internal cosmic body, God immanent in the universe, and ended in identifying the Soul itself with that God, and making one unit Soul of all these various manifestations in the universe. This is the last word of the Vedas. It begins with Dualism, goes through the qualified monism and ends in the perfect monism. We have seen, also, how very few in this world can come to the last, dare believe in it, and fewer still dare act according to it. Yet we know that therein lies the explanation of all ethics, of morality and all spirituality of the universe. Why is it that every one says, "Do good to all others"? Where is the explanation? Why is it that all great men have preached the brotherhood of mankind, and greater men have preached the brotherhood of all lives? Why is it so? Because, whether they were conscious of it or not, behind all that, through all their irrational and personal superstitions, was peering forth the eternal light of the Self, denying all manifoldness, denying that there are two existences in the universe and asserting that the whole universe is but One.

Again, the last word gave us one universe, which, through the senses we see as matter, through the intellect as souls and through the spirit as God. To the man who throws upon himself evils, which the world calls wickedness and evil, this very universe will change and become a hideous place; to another man, who wants enjoyments, this very universe will change its appearance and become a heaven, and to the perfect man the whole thing will vanish and become his own Self.

Now, as society exists at the present time, all these three stages are necessary; the one does not deny the other; one is simply the fulfilment of the other. The Advaitist, the qualified Advaitist, does not say that Dualism is wrong; it is a right view, but a lower view. It is not wrong. It is on the way to truth; therefore, hurt none; let everybody work out his own vision of this universe, according to his own ideas. Hurt none, injure none, deny the position of none; take man where he stands, and, if you can, lend him a helping hand and put him on a higher platform, but do not injure and do not destroy. All will come to truth in the long run, "when all the desires of the heart will be vanquished, then this very mortal will become immortal"; then the very man will become God.

Comment is unnecessary. The Swami has spoken for India as well as for himself. This is a first-hand utterance of a native Hindu who has uttered faithfully the tenets of his faith. We offer as a supplement to this setting forth of Oriental philosophy some beautiful verses by a Western poet, Richard Realf, which impress us as a beautiful connecting link between the best thought of the Occident and the best thought of the Orient.

SPIRIT AND ITS EXPRESSION

Fair are the flowers and the children, but their subtle suggestion is fairer;
Rare is the roseburst of dawn, but the secret that clasps it is rarer,
Sweet the exultance of song, but the strain that precedes it is sweeter;
And never was poem yet writ, but the meaning outmastered the meter.

Never a daisy that grows, but a mystery guideth the growing;
Never a river that flows, but a majesty sceptres the flowing;
Never a Shakespeare that soared, but a stronger than he did enfold him,
Nor ever a prophet foretells, but a mightier seer hath foretold him.

Back of the canvas that throbs the painter is hinted and hidden;
Into the statue that breathes the soul of the sculptor is bidden;
Under the joy that is felt lie the infinite issues of feeling;
Crowning the glory revealed is the glory that crowns the revealing.

Great are the symbols of being, but that which is symboled is greater;
Vast the create and beheld, but vaster the inward creator;
Back of the sound broods the silence, back of the gift stands the giving;
Back of the hand that receives thrill the sensitive nerves of receiving.

Space is as nothing to spirit, the deed is outdone by the doing;
The heart of the wooer is warm, but warmer the heart of the wooing;
And up from the pits where these shiver, and up from the heights where those shine,
Twin voices and shadows swim starward, and the essence of life is divine.

SCANDINAVIAN BELIEFS CONCERNING THE SPIRITUAL UNIVERSE

THOUGH the old Norse mythology has become largely familiar to frequenters of modern opera,—thanks to the mighty genius of Richard Wagner, who has drawn freely from mythologic sources and endowed the old heroic tales with new life and vigor,—it was not till Marie Corelli gave us her fascinating Norwegian story "Thelma" that the people of England and America came to realize that the race of Vikings may not be yet extinct in rugged picturesque Norway, where the majestic fjords and the general sublimity of natural scenery form an appropriate background for those splendid, but tragic, beliefs and ceremonies to which Olaf and his clan still cling with undying tenacity.

We cannot study the religion and philosophy of India without becoming soon convinced that the warm, and often depressing, climate of the peninsula and its adjacent islands has had much to do with the introspective tendencies of the inhabitants. The temperature is usually high, the heat often intense, and in such conditions external existence often seems a bore rather than a blessing. Amid such surroundings has grown up a profound theosophy and also a sense of indifference to all external things, which, when carried to its extreme, has begotten distaste for all physical exertion.

In Greece, one of the loveliest countries of the earth and blessed with a charming climate, grew up an æsthetic cult, heroic on the one hand (as in Sparta), effeminate on the other. Love of life reached its maximum point in the Greece of classic days, and this led to a distaste for the idea of any cessation of physical existence.

Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, the ancient homes of Norse mythology, differ very widely in all respects from the placid Orient and from beauteous Greece and the lovely islands of the Mediterranean; and, as Professor Tyndall was wont to declare, climate has very much to do with religious sentiment and all phases of its expression, we are not surprised to find that Scandinavia has proved the seat of a war-like faith, which, though hard and tempestuous, like the physical aspects of the country, in many of its details is by no means destitute of sterling heroic qualities which may profitably be incorporated as a much-needed backbone for many modern creeds.

Though at root all religions and philosophies are one,—for all start from the same point, viz., human endeavor to decipher the hieroglyphics and solve the riddle of the universe,—the multifarious endeavors of humanity to accomplish this herculean, and always unfinished, task have given birth to the innumerable speculations which divide the world into sects and parties, which can never be harmonized except on the basis of a truly synthetic philosophy.

Taking, as we do, a sympathetic rather than a harshly critical view of the world's many creeds and doctrines, we see good in all, but the whole of truth in none; therefore do we consider it irrational and impious to seek to convince the whole earth that one form of religious doctrine and worship is entirely true, while all other cults are dangerous and false. When Christianity began to make headway in northern Europe it freely incorporated Norse traditions, which still prevail to some appreciable extent, even as in southern Europe this same eclectic Christianity took to itself the temples of paganism and gave the names of saints to the older gods and goddesses. The Christian church has proved extremely flexible and adaptable whenever it has been ruled by an accommodating priesthood, though whenever some few men of stern prophetic temper have held for a while the reins of command, no temporizing or conciliatory policy has been tolerated. The genial side of Christianity is soft as butter and smooth as oil, but its relentless, persecuting aspect is sharp as steel and remorseless as flame. We cannot understand so complex a system as the Christian, ranging as it does from simple Theism to revolting phases of idolatry, without tracing its many origins to the manifold earlier systems from which it freely borrowed and out of which its hybrid aspects grew.

But, protest as we may against inconsistencies, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that human nature itself, as well as the elements all around us, are extremely inconsistent in behavior, giving rise to a belief in many conflicting deities, even though all may originally proceed from one ineffably good source and eventually make manifest the goodness of their origin. Those are not wanting who claim that Norse mythology is of Atlantean origin, and that it closely resembles the mythologies of Greece and Rome, which were derived from the same source. Those of our readers who wish to pursue this interesting question are advised to peruse "Atlantis" by Ignatius Donnelly, and also a work on the same subject of profound archæological interest by Scott Eliott (Theosophical Publishing Society). It is not our immediate purpose to peer into such remote and necessarily dim origins, but simply to briefly map out a few of the leading features of the ancient Scandinavian religion which has left many a trace in those popular parts of northern Europe which afford delightful summer camping-grounds and opportunity to gaze upon the wondrous glory of the midnight sun. Dr. Alger says that "many considerations combine to make it seem likely that at an early period a migration took place from southern Asia to northern Europe, which constituted the commencement of what afterwards grew to be the great Gothic family. The correspondence of many of the leading doctrines and symbols of the Scandinavian mythology with well-known Persian and Buddhist notions, —notions of a purely fanciful and arbitrary character,— is too peculiar, apparently, to admit of any other explanation.

"But, the germs of thought and imagination transplanted thus from the warm and gorgeous climes of the East to the snowy mountains of Norway and the howling ridges of Iceland, obtained a fresh development, with numerous modifications and strange additions, from the new life, climate, scenery, and customs to which they were then exposed. The temptation to predatory habits and strife, the necessity for an intense though fitful activity arising from their geographical situation, the forceful spirit nourished in them by their actual life, the tremendous phenomena of the Arctic world around them,—all these influences break out to our view in the poetry, and are reflected by their results in the religion of the Northmen." Following this telling quotation, may we not add also that as the spirit-world with which we are all in closest touch is the temporary home of those of our own race and kin who have recently laid off their mortal robes, we do actually receive impressions from this surrounding psychic zone which builds up still further a system of belief and practice congenial to the immediate condition of ourselves and our unseen coadjutors? That one consideration, estimated at its due worth, would almost suffice to answer the innumerable queries constantly propounded concerning the diversity of views expressed by communicating intelligences, who, in every land and to every race, have some special message to deliver which does not altogether tally with what is elsewhere received from the denizens of the world of spirits. Again and yet again are we compelled to insist that communications may be thoroughly genuine and yet at variance with each other, because the act of dropping a material body neither transforms character nor introduces the freed spirit to any greater possession of knowledge than is warranted by previous growth and aspiration.

A war-like people enter into close communion with departed warriors with whom they are in intimate affinity, and just as the Japanese now declare that warrior spirits assist them on the battle-field, and that these are often their former comrades, so did the hardy Norsemen in days of old declare the same. Valhalla, the hall of Odin, chief of Norse divinities, is pictured in the Eddas as a place of judgment as well as of glory. Some of the descriptions are martial and terrific in the extreme; spears and all instruments of war figure plenteously in Odin's magnificent, though barbarous, abode. Valiant souls, who while on earth were the heroes in distinguished battles, are received with great honor at the celestial court; these are the elect of Odin, who causes the Valkyrs, white-clad virgins with flowing ringlets, to wait on them as cup-bearers. Every morning at cock-crow these heroes go forth to battle, and are often seriously wounded in their desperate encounters, but every evening their wounds are completely healed and they are furnished with a luxurious banquet. Such, no doubt, was regarded by the ferocious Norsemen as a blissful life in Paradise, and as they loved fighting on earth, so they conceive that they would fight in heaven.

It was from Sweden, a land in which such vivid mythologic ideas had taken abiding root, that Swedenborg came forth to give to the astonished peoples of Europe in the torpid eighteenth century his graphic delineations of many heavens and many hells all constructed upon the plan of dominant affection at their base. Valhalla contains no women, only the most valiant among heroic men; but it is by no means the whole of heaven. Vingolf, the Hall of Friendship, stands beside the Hall of the Slain, and here are troops of noble women, for there are goddesses as well as gods in Norse mythology. Then there are the still higher and far more beautiful heavens, the abode of the rarely-named Omnipresent One, the true All-Father, who will finally come forth when this manifested universe shall cease to exist, and build a new and yet more glorious one.

Concerning terms of admission to any heaven or banishment to any hell, we are told that the path to glory is only through cultivation of all the heroic virtues, while the road to infernal states is always through the practice of deceit and falsehood. Not unreasonably did those hardy people associate strength with goodness and feebleness with vice, and in so doing they taught a doctrine in complete accord with our common word virtue, which is but a translation of the Latin virtus, which certainly implies both strength and courage. Those who die in arms are called the "Chosen of Odin"; all who pass from earth after lives of "despicable ease" or who die of sickness have no bright future immediately awaiting them; such souls find themselves in Hela, a gloomy cavern where there seems to be but little active misery, though there is no active joy. Perjury, adultery and murder are considered hateful crimes, and for these offenses penalties of a severe character are meted out in the future state. Stern morality, though consistent with a barbarous code, is proclaimed in Norse mythology.

As in the Zoroastrian faith, so in the Scandinavian also do we find one supreme note triumphing above all others—the ultimate destruction of evil and the everlasting perpetuity of good. There is to be a universal battle, and at the end of the "Twilight of the Gods," a term applied to the present divided creation in which light and darkness are constantly at strife, all discord will cease and harmony prevail forever.

With the quaint and peculiar superstitions of the Norsemen regarding their finger and toe nails and other minute particulars, we need not greatly concern ourselves; there is doubtless a symbolic meaning to be attached to the statement that no one should die with unpaired nails,—this probably means that no slightest duty should be neglected, for the entire life produces its result even in minutest matters.

The beautiful story of "Baldur the Good" reminds us of many other tales of self-sacrificing heroes who willingly die that others may enjoy a larger and more glorious life. In Bohn's Antiquarian Library we find a masterly edition of Percy's translation of Mallet's "Northern Antiquities," in which the scholarly editor, Blackwell, argues with conclusive force in favor of the view we strenuously hold that the Norsemen looked forward to the ultimate glorification of the entire human race, though the virtuous in "Gimle" and the vicious in "Nastrond" would respectively experience joys and sorrows of indefinite duration previous to the glorious age of unmarred felicity which awaits the whole creation.

No writer has better described the funeral customs of the Vikings than has Marie Corelli, who shows us Thelma's father sailing out to sea in his burning ship, departing from his robe of flesh triumphantly, as his ancestors had gone before him, while the vessel burns around him, and when he has expired the ship he had loved so well sinks at once into the waves. No suicide, no thought of self-destruction mars the heroic splendor of this awe-inspiring scene. The aged warrior has grown feeble and knows that his earthly end has come. Not till it is evident that his moments are rapidly nearing their close does he call upon his ever faithful attendants to bear him to his ship; then, when the life within his frame flickers so feebly that at any instant it may expire, he gives the order that the ship put out to sea and be ignited, and the brave soul has left its earthly tenement before it is possible that the blazing vessel can sink into the ocean. Cremation, rather than burial, has always been the choice of heroic peoples. To bury the dead into the ground is to pollute the earth, and endanger the health of the living, and it seems to encourage and perpetuate materialistic and gruesome practices which encourage mental morbidity as well as physical disease. The crematories of to-day in all civilized countries, which are rapidly supplanting burial grounds or cemeteries, are not only highly sanitary and therefore most commendable, they are also calculated to do much to end the necromantic rites, and the hideous beliefs connected with them, which invariably cluster around a place of interment. Not every one would like to see a beloved parent go out to sea in a ship of flame, knowing that his flesh had descended into the depths of the ocean, whether buried or otherwise; but so romantic an ending of the earthly career was only intended for the naval warriors even in the old Norse days. The sea-kings were not the only heroes, and amid the snows of Norway many another type of warrior was buried with his splendid horse and all the accoutrements of battle. Thomas Carlyle summed up his glowing description of the old Vikings in these majestic words: "Worthily bury the old hero at once in the sky and in the ocean." No doubts were entertained by their survivors that these men of valor and renown entered upon a glorious life beyond and still took interest in the affairs of earth, a faith which has persisted through all ages and lives to-day unquenchably in the inmost heart of our humanity.

CHAPTER XII

ETRUSCAN VIEWS OF THE FUTURE LIFE

Among ancient peoples who have long since ceased to figure among the active nations of the earth, the inhabitants of old Etruria have left the most copious monumental records of their spiritual faith behind them. Written annals we cannot consult, for these have not been discovered; but Etruscan sepulchres remain, and from these we can gather an immense amount of curious and satisfactory information. Monuments are often far older than documents, and frequently much more reliable, as they are not so subject to transcription and interpolation, a fate which has befallen a large portion of the comparatively ancient manuscripts now placed at our disposal.

The Etruscan tombs are hewn out of the living rock of cliffs and hills: they therefore bid long defiance to the ravages of time and storm; and though many millennia old, still remain in so good a state of preservation that they are easily deciphered by any visitors provided with the necessary scholarly equipment.

Etruscan burial places were invariably outside of city limits, and often beyond a city's walls existed another city of tombs. Stone-hewn sepulchres, of massive and imposing design, are not infrequently discovered; but the ordinary "house of the departed" was built on the plan of the abodes of the living, though on a smaller scale.

All sorts of clothing, ornaments, and implements were taken to these reposing places of vacated earthly forms, and much of this accessory material has long outlived the pulverization of the body to which it was once considered tributary. Dr. Alger, from whom we again quote, says that "an important element in the religion of the Etruscans was the doctrine of genii, a system of household deities who watched over the fortunes of individuals and families, and who are continually shown on the engravings in the sepulchres as guiding, or actively interested in, all the incidents that happen to those under their care. It was supposed that every person had two genii allotted to him, one inviting him to good deeds, the other to bad, and both accompanying him after death to the judgment to give in their testimony and turn the scales of his fate. This belief, sincerely held, would obviously wield a powerful influence over their feelings in the conduct of life."

Etruscan views of divinities were similar to Egyptian and to Roman concepts, and we may well believe that the latter were largely influenced by the former. A multitude of deities were honored in Etruria, each having some particular station and office, a special form of representation, and a cycle of traditions. The Goddess of Fate was pictured with wings to indicate her swiftness, and with hammer and nails to show that her decrees were unalterably fixed. The supreme divinity Tinia resembles the Roman Jupiter Tonans with thunderbolt in hand. Twelve "consenting gods" compose Tinia's council and bear the august title "Senators of Heaven." These awful beings reside in the innermost recesses of Heaven, and it is not lawful to pronounce their names. They were not considered eternal, but only of very long duration, and beyond them were the yet more mysterious and awe-inspiring "Shrouded Gods," who ruled all things.

These were much like the inscrutable "Necessity" which constituted the dim background of ancient Greek theology.

The Etruscans also indulged in weird conceptions of an Underworld, ruling over which they imagined two mysterious beings, Mantus and Mania.

Animal sacrifices were frequent, and human sacrifices occasional, among these strange ancient people.

We can readily understand many references to the awful heathen rites of many gentile nations which occur in the Psalms and elsewhere in the Bible, when we learn from Macrolius that in Etruria boys were sacrificed at an annual festival in honor of Mania, queen of the Underworld. "They offered their sons and their daughters unto devils,"—thus did Hebrew prophets and minstrels summarily dispose of the abominable orgies against which the seers in Israel waged constant and unrelenting warfare. In later days and milder times these awful propitiatory rites were supplanted by innocent offerings of flowers and vegetables to the divinities; poppies and onions were especially popular in Etruria for the later sacrificial rites.

Belief in future existence unmistakably exercised a dominating influence over the Etruscan mind, and, as with all other peoples, the realms beyond death were pictured as extremely various, ranging from a paradise of bliss to dark and frightful regions where penalties were meted out according to the gravity of the offenses which had called them forth. Death-bed scenes are depicted most vividly on Etruscan tombs; patriarchs are represented surrounded by weeping groups who can scarcely endure the pain of parting from such wise counselors; friends wave mournful farewells to their weeping loved ones; some of the departing are represented as quite resigned to their departure, while others go shrinkingly, as though reluctant to leave the earth and fearful of what may lie beyond. In this respect the experiences of humanity seem to have been about equally varied among all peoples in all ages, so much so that Cardinal Newman in "The Dream of Gerontius" attributes to a dying man—though a devout Catholic calling upon the sacred names of Jesus and Mary in his extremity, —the same feeling of terror at the approach of the disruption of bodily consistency, as has been experienced by pagan peoples on whom the light of the gospel according to Christianity had never shone.

There are but two reasonable interpretations of this world-wide reluctance to leave the material body. First, a natural shrinking from a change which is never fully understood. Second, an unconquerable conviction that the soul will get its just deserts, whatever such may be, in the future world. And as a large percentage of lives are by no means flawless, even in the estimation of the livers, it cannot be wondered at that in the solemn moment of transition, while bidding farewell to the accustomed earth, and often to near and dear friends from whom to part must always be a painful wrench, the soul should tremble somewhat at the mysteriousness of the undiscovered, even though the realms beyond be guided by the same unerring purpose and directed through the changeless operations of the same great law which guides us now and will continue to guide our path forever.

There are no proofs that the Etruscans believed in the translation of human souls to the heavens of the divinities, but they clearly portrayed much that was beautiful and attractive as awaiting the upright in the world to come. Into the realms of bliss many gates are shown surrounded by emblems denoting welcome ideas of deliverance from trial and the enjoyment of rest. While the guilty soul is terror-stricken at the approach of some spectral shape which comes to escort it to a place of darkness and grief, the heroic soul is transported through the "Eighth Gate" into the charming regions of the blessed.

In this brief mention of the Etruscan faith revealed through art, we have but added one more testimony to the numberless array of testimonies everywhere accumulating, all pointing to humanity's world-wide and ineradicable confidence in a life beyond physical transition, and also in many diverse conditions obtaining in the spirit-world.

CHAPTER XIII

SPIRITUAL CONCEPTIONS IN CHINA AND JAPAN

THOUGH the home of Buddhism was originally in India, it is in Thibet, China and Japan that we must now look to find its hundreds of millions of adherents. This form of religion,—though very pure at its fountain-head, and truly philanthropic in its every original sentiment, as it emanated from that great spiritual teacher with whose illustrious career Sir Edwin Arnold has made the entire English-speaking world familiar,—did not long retain its pristine simplicity, but like many older and younger faiths, it soon became overlaid with superstitious doctrines and ceremonies most of which were reversions to old beliefs and practices rather than newly invented acquisitions.

The three chief varieties of Buddhism, which divide it into Northern, Middle and Southern, represent considerable difference of thought as well as of practice. Northern Buddhism seems more inclined to take on a heroic aspect than does Southern, and this is easily explained when we refer simply to geographical situation, for climate always affects, to some degree, the feelings and the conduct of a people.

China, the mysterious "Celestial Empire," and yet more mysterious Thibet,—the enclosed and awful country concerning which we hear much that is startling and forbidding,—are two lands of Asia which seem peculiarly out of touch with Western thoughts and habits, but Japan is a friendly neighbor to America and all English-speaking people are disposed to treat the Japanese as brothers, while they look with suspicion upon "John Chinaman," particularly in the United States, though he is very prominent nearly all over America, particularly as a laundryman and in California as also a cook and general domestic. The Chinaman looks so unlike a European or an American that we are always apt to emphasize the word "foreigner," and the much more disagreeable term "alien," whenever we see his costume, watch his manners and listen to his conversation, and most of all when we gaze upon the curious characters which denote his language. Our Japanese neighbors present no such very unusual appearance, because they readily adopt a western dress and manner, and generally adapt themselves, apparently without much difficulty, to the new state of affairs which at once confronts them when they have left their Flowery Kingdom for lands remote across the seas.

That the Chinese have a religion of their own, partly Buddhistic and partly Confucian,—though Confucianism is an ethical and philosophical rather than a distinctively religious system,—is well known to all who gain their confidence or watch their doings. The gaudy "Joss Houses" which constitute one of the popular sights of "Chinatown" in San Francisco and wherever there is a Chinese colony, represent only the crudest and shallowest expressions of the religion of China, precisely as the tawdry pictures and images in Mexican churches exhibit only the most superficial and uninviting aspects of Roman Catholicism. To the Oriental intellect subtle metaphysical abstractions appeal, even though the surface of Oriental life is often tawdry and squalid in the extreme. Cultivated Chinamen, who may often be met in Washington and other American cities, are frequently Confucians and very often they are rational philosophers entirely free from the superstitious beliefs and customs of the ignorant among their compatriots. Wong Chin Foo and several other highly intellectual and cultured Chinamen who have contributed in the English tongue to many periodicals enjoying world-wide circulation and fame, have presented us with doctrines in the name of Confucius which have proved on examination to be fully as noble morally, and as enlightened spiritually, as any which have proceeded from any other sources. But, as Confucianism does not speak very definitely concerning any future life or communion with the spirit-world, it is not easy to gather precisely the views of educated Confucians on these important themes; we may, however, safely conclude that by far the largest proportion of the Mongolian race not only venerate ancestors, but distinctly believe in their constant presence as guiding, protecting and inspiring influences. In the war between Russia and Japan, which ended with the close of the summer of 1905, news came constantly from Japanese officials confirming more and more the fact that the brave Japanese were greatly sustained in their heroic warfare by their unfaltering spiritual faith, and by faith we do not mean mere traditional belief, but confident certainty that spirit-friends were sustaining them in hours of conflict, and giving unmistakable signs of approval when heroic work was done. Warfare is not the highest human occupation,—and we may all sincerely trust and devoutly work as well as pray, that a happy time may speedily come when war will be unknown,—still we cannot dispute the fact that spirit-helpers are often present on battle-fields where they once fought and, so long as they have not outgrown their belief in the justifiability and even necessity for strife to settle disputes and prevent incursions of tyranny and the loss of national integrity, they will undoubtedly continue to afford efficient aid to those who are nerved to more successful combat when buoyed up by the sublime assurance that they are not fighting alone, but in the presence of their heroic ancestors and with their full approval. Some touching incidents have been related to us by friends who have lived in Japan and entered sympathetically into the life and feelings of its people. At eventide the ancestral spirits and those who have recently departed from the physical frame are said to gather in some appointed place and receive offerings from those who admire and venerate them. No festival domestic or national is kept without this ceremony.

Many of the Chinese and Japanese practices intended to honor the departed are crude externally, but they are often beautiful when stripped of unnecessary accretions and readily commend themselves to our sympathy and esteem. Even the offering of food and libations to the departed, which is a very ancient and almost universal custom, is not reprehensible in the least when we consider that Oriental philosophers have always taught that all external substances are but veils which hide an incorporeal element. As the physical body is sustained by the grosser part, so is the psychical body fed by the inner substance. This teaching accounts for all the sacrificial offerings made to divinities through all ages and in all countries. It is surely not necessary to slay animals, much less to slaughter human beings, to appease hungry divinities: such barbaric orgies have no place in any refined system of thought or practice; but simple offerings of fruits and flowers to the national heroes, and to friends in general, is a gentle poetic custom which serves to keep always before the mental vision of those who make the offerings the thought of the intimate nearness of the spiritual to the material world.

Japan, especially since the marriage of Sir Edwin Arnold to a Japanese lady and her reception as a welcome guest in the highest British society, has seemed quite near to the cultured elements in the English-speaking world, and though many Japanese now profess a modified form of Christianity and express great readiness to assimilate themselves with western life and thought in general, the native of Japan nearly always retains a large amount of his ancestral faith unless he becomes a confessed agnostic, as some students do, in which case he is apt to pride himself upon his lack of knowledge concerning all spiritual questions, a species of extraordinary intellectual pride which characterizes also the pretentious culture of the west during a certain early period in scientific research among too easily self-satisfied investigators.

To obtain as nearly authentic a statement as possible of the actual religious condition of Japan at the time of this writing we refer our readers to an intensely interesting letter written by the well-known American presidential candidate, William Jennings Bryan, sent by him from that charming country and published in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, February 18th, 1906.

Little that could be added to what is already generally known would throw any new light upon the faith or practice of the inhabitants of eastern Asia; they are now freely mingling among us and as we become better acquainted with our interesting brown and yellow neighbors we shall assuredly cease to feel any sentiment of estrangement towards them. The splendid and enormous ships which now cross and recross the Pacific waters with amazing speed and regularity have already brought Japan almost to the door of America. From San Francisco, Seattle and Vancouver we can go in comfort in a very few weeks into the very heart of eastern Asia, and when we get there we shall find very much to interest us and more than a little to admire, though also much which we may not be able to approve.

The glory of true Spiritualism is that it breaks down barriers and unifies humanity wherever its ennobling teachings are accepted and made the guide of life. We cannot, and we do not, profess to believe that spiritual communion is, or ever has been, the exclusive property of any church or sect; it is the common heritage of the entire human race. Though the Occident rather than the Orient is the head-centre of present-day revelations, this is only because during the revolution of the cycles first one country and then another becomes prepared to be the chief enlightener of the world. In days of old Asia was the source whence spiritual light radiated over the globe; then there came a time when Europe, and finally America, took precedence of all other continents as the head-centre of spiritual enlightenment. Now we see unmistakable signs of the rapidly nearing approach of a truly universal illumination in which all continents will participate. Asia will be revivified, Africa will be no longer dark, Europe will be united and pacified; America will be redeemed from Mammon-worship and set truly free; Australia will become a great new seminary for the bringing forth of a truly eclectic spiritual philosophy.

Such are the signs of these stirring and eventful times. Never again can old superstitions enslave humanity as formerly, for the hour has already struck which has awakened humanity from its lethargy and called it, in stentorian tones, to shake off the lethargy in which it has so long been wrapped. If the modern spiritual movement has done no more it has certainly compelled a searching investigation of the foundations upon which faith in immortality must rest. At this late date to endeavor to prove that there is communion with the spirit-world seems in many centres an altogether superfluous task; but though multitudes are fully assured of life's endless continuity, there are very many yet who still sit in the shadow of doubt and some who dwell in the caverns of positive denial. Let those who know proclaim their knowledge, and let those who as yet know not hold themselves ready to be informed.

The following intensely interesting account of Japanese life and spiritual realization is taken from an article from a brilliant contributor to the Banner of Light, who signs himself Mime Inness; his contribution was published February 24, 1906.

Karma and Shintoism in Japan

When Admiral Togo, after his successive victories, took occasion to thank, in the most formal way, the spirits of the dead for their assistance in the war in which they had lain down their earthly lives, to most Americans it seemed an act of Eastern barbarism, strangely injected into modern life.

How could a great naval captain like Togo be so superstitious, so ignorant?

It is, however, not strange that one reared, as is every

Japanese, in the Shinto philosophy, should take occasion, as a thank offering, to recognize one of the most prevalent of Japanese ideas.

The Japanese is reared not only upon the doctrine of Shinto, which is peculiar to his people, but the Buddhistic doctrines of preëxistence and Karma enter equally into the make-up of his religious life. We in the West have but an indistinct idea of preëxistence. Theosophists maintain the doctrine, but ordinary Christians, especially those reared in Calvinism, have spent all their religious lives in an effort to save their own individual souls from a hereafter which is represented to be so horrible that escape from it is the one "consummation devoutly to be wished."

But Oriental philosophy takes care of all this sort of thing in an entirely different way, a way which is almost inexplicable to the self-seeking Occidental.

"In the first place," says the Jap, "my own soul is not a single thing. It is a term of reproach to me when one tells me derisively, 'I can see that you have but one soul.' My soul cannot exist for an eternity hereafter unless it has already existed for an eternity before this life.

"Eternity is an endless thing. Nothing can be endless if it have a beginning. The Occidental talks of a life in the future which has no end. Then it can have had no beginning; for an endless thing with one end is endless. I must, therefore, have existed from all eternity if I am to live to all eternity.

"Therefore, I know that my soul, in its preëxistent states, has passed through many earth-lives, has had all the experiences which those preëxisting lives imply. It is not, cannot be a single thing, one soul. It is a composite of all the experiences of all past ages through which it has lived. In me to-day exist consciously the souls of all my kindred by heredity, and no small part of those other lives with which I have lived and by contact have partaken of. Hence, my ancestors, being those to whom I owe, not my existence alone, but all those attributes which make my soul what it is, are certainly worthy of my highest regard and worship.

"Not only this" (and here comes in the Spiritualistic idea), "but these ancestors, as is natural, take in me and my living, the deepest interest. They surround my daily pathway, seeking in every way they can to enhance for me the good and to ward off the bad. What is more natural for the parent who dies than to maintain his interest in his child? You western Christians believe in a heaven to which a dying father goes and shuts from his knowledge everything in which, two minutes before he breathed his last, he was most deeply concerned; or if you believe that he still has knowledge of the lives of his children, he is yet powerless to affect those lives for good or ill. This is still worse than total ignorance. For what is more devilish, what could be a greater hell, than to be compelled to sit supinely by and see the tortures of a child and be powerless to aid? We know better than this. When we die and slough off the flesh, we do not change. We still love, and love implies aid. We still hover near and help bear the burden or share the joy of our children, making it greater by the sharing.

"So, while we worship our ancestors, we know they are worthy of worship. Do you Occidentals still wish an angry God to punish sin? He does punish it, not as one angry, but as one who is just. Sin is not like the naughtiness of a child, to be punished by a slipper. It is a breaking of God's laws, which breaking always bears its own consequences. If I violate the law of gravitation and walk off the roof of the house, I fall, not as a punishment for violating the law, but because a violation of the law entails its own consequences.

"So if I do wrong, I suffer. No pardon, no repentance avails to wash away the sin. It entails its own punishment, leaves its own scar. Thereby I am taught not to sin.

"But the consequence of my violation of God's law is that the scar remains. I may not work out my own redemption, until death has seized me. The consequences of that wrong go on just the same, and when next my undying soul seeks physical embodiment, the stain of my sin is still on it, the law is still operative and justice still demands of me the working out of my own redemption. The 'sins of the father are visited upon the children' is true, not as a punishment, but as a simple, just working-out of the rule of the law. This is Karma. Evil in my life I know is just, not for what I have done in this embodiment, but for what I did in another body. Joy is mine, not always for my own merits, but for the good I did when here before. Is not this justice? Is not this right? Does not this explain why life is as it is? Is not this a good and sufficient reason for my ancestor worship?"

This is why the Japanese see so little that is attractive in Christianity. This is why they are Spiritualists. This is why Shintoism and Buddhism are to them the living forces that they are.

This is why this life, seeming such a trifling part of the real life, is with so little hesitation thrown away by a Japanese in battling for a good cause.

If Western civilization could take a leaf from the book of the little men of the islands, creeds might suffer, but the real life of Christ would be more purely lived and then indeed would "death be swallowed up in victory," being no longer the "King of Terrors."

Such, in brief outline, is a fair sample of Japanese spiritual conceptions.

CHAPTER XIV

MOHAMMEDAN VIEWS OF THE SOUL AND ITS DESTINY

SALE's widely-circulated version of the Koran having familiarized multitudes with the text of the faith of Islam, it is generally presumed that the fairly educated public is everywhere aware of the leading tenets of the faith professed by the several hundred millions who follow the prophet of Mecca and worship God under the name of Allah. Such, indeed, in barest outline, may be the case; a searching scrutiny of Mohammedanism will, however, reveal an esoteric as well as an exoteric faith. Sir Edwin Arnold's beautiful saying:

> "All is love

strikes a very different note from that harshly sounded by those who see only the literal surface of the Koran, which closely resembles the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures in much of its external form, and from them it was indisputably, in large measure, compiled.

Mohammed's career was a most remarkable one, and no matter from what viewpoint we may attempt to study it, we can only remain convinced that the Arabian camel-driver, who became renowned as the founder of a system of religion which to-day numbers its adherents by hundreds of millions, was a man of no ordinary capacity or common enterprise. Like all personal founders of systems, he who founded the faith of Islam was one who could and did accommodate himself, with extraordinary readiness, to the demands of the age in which he lived and the people whom he sought to influence. There are many discrepancies in the Koran, and many fanciful tales and floating legends, but so there are in all Bibles; therefore, in this respect the Koran and its teachings cannot be regarded as in any sense unique.

Mohammed has been called an impostor, an epileptic, who imagined his distorted ravings to be heaven-sent illumination, a wily schemer who only sought his own aggrandizement, and much else that is uninviting and discreditable. But, though this wonderful "prophet" was by no means an immaculate hero, he was undoubtedly a man of many excellent parts, though vice as well as virtue, and weakness as well as strength, figured in his character and influenced his career.

Upholders of strictly monogamic marriage relations cannot endorse polygamy, even in the restricted sense in which Mohammed taught or, at least, permitted it; but when we remember that in his day polygamy and polyandry ran riot in those very lands in which he sought to spread his influence, we may trace the hand of a shrewd statesman in the teaching of a man who limited the wives of a "true believer" to four, and was perfectly willing that the "faithful" should live in a strictly monogamous relation if they so preferred. Had it been the aim or mission of Mohammed to fashion a restricted cult adapted only to a limited section of humanity, his system would probably have been far less ingenious and complex than we find it to be. James Freeman Clarke, in "Ten Great Religions" classes Mohammedanism among missionary and eclectic systems, in which category he also places Buddhism and Christianity, while Brahmanism he places among the purely ethnic cults which seem indigenous to a certain soil and incapable of successful migration or transplantation.

As Mohammed's period was about six hundred years after the inception of the Christian system, he had much material to work with which had been partly Christianized but had not accepted the authority of the institutionalized Christian church, which, by that time, had grown numerous and powerful, and in many districts oppressive also.

There is a strange fascination attaching to the earlier years of Mohammed's ministry, for it was not till after thirteen years of peaceful endeavor to propagate his system that he had recourse to the sword or even permitted warfare as a means of religious propaganda. It was only —so all reliable historians have declared—after the failure of peaceful measures that Mohammed allowed his band of devoted, though decidedly ambitious, followers to resort to intimidation to convert "unbelievers" to the prophet's creed. At one time Spain was a stronghold for Mohammedanism, and it must be admitted that the Mussulman was often a better civilizer than the Christian, and certainly not more bigoted or fanatical. At present no European nation, except Turkey, is under Mohammed's sway, but large portions of Asia and Africa are completely given over to the faith of Islam, and in many instances that form of religion seems well adapted to the general need.

There are two great Mohammedan sects or parties; one called Sunnees, the other Sheeahs. The former are usually very rigid in their adhesion to the letter of the Koran and the observance of every ceremonial injunction of their faith; the latter are more elastic in their interpretations and applications and are regarded as somewhat heretical by their more strenuously observing brethren. Turks, Arabs and Tartars are nearly all Sunnees; Persians are usually Sheeahs. The most bigoted among both parties lay great stress upon minute ritual practices and indulge in uncharitable comments upon all who differ from them in even the smallest particular; but all highly intelligent Mohammedans, and there are many such, while holding fast to what may be termed the fundamentals of their faith, are by no means rigid in the case of minor details, nor do they condemn everybody whose practice differs from their own.

Mohammedan tenets as expounded in Chicago in 1893 were quite liberal in many respects, indeed, Alexander Russell Webb, who had become a convert to Mohammedanism and was authorized to proclaim its teachings at the Parliament of Religions, said very little that would not be classed as liberal teaching in modern America. It is a great mistake to suppose that the devotees of any system are all narrow-minded or bigoted, or that any religion traced to its foundation is devoid of charitable and reasonable sentiments. The Sufis, who are Mohammedan Theosophists, constitute an esoteric party and put the same sort of symbolic interpretation upon the Koran that Philo of Alexandria placed upon the Pentateuch. Sufism is Gnosticism, and from the Gnostic standpoint every holy saying has an interior meaning which is discoverable by the application of a system similar to Swedenborg's doctrine of Correspondence, which is employed as an all-sufficing key to unlock the inner mystery contained in even the obscurest and the most outwardly revolting statements and commands attributed to Deity or to some of the heavenly messengers who figure as prominently in the Koran as anywhere else in reputedly inspired literature. All Mohammedans believe in angels of various ranks and degrees, ranging from infernal to celestial. Eblis corresponds to Satan, and the story of his fall from heaven agrees well with popular Christian tradition.

Predestination is also a cardinal point in the faith of Islam, and often it is so taught that absolute fatalism is the only conclusion one can draw from the utterances of Mohammedan teachers; there are, however, those among them who greatly modify this doctrine until it comes to bear a close resemblance to the Jewish doctrine as set forth in the Talmud, which declares that everything is regulated by divine providence except human conduct; and, unless this exception be made, it is impossible to see how any idea of vice or virtue, punishment or reward, in this world or any other, can possibly be entertained. It is unthinkable that any soul can be held responsible for purely automatic action, and if Allah has decreed every event so that whatever occurs is divinely necessitated, it is impossible to believe that the Supreme Being, or even any tutelar divinity, can be displeased with the carrying out of his own will and the fulfilment of his own purpose. Calvinism is a Christian phase of the worst features of Mohammedanism as any student of the Koran can readily perceive, and nowhere has a more monstrous absurdity been taught than that God punishes, or is angry with human beings for acting automatically in accordance with divine decrees.

There is, however, a bright side to the doctrine of predestination which Theists and Universalists have often gladly perceived, and that is the idea that the whole universe is subject to the sovereign sway of a perfectly beneficent ruling intelligence, and that in consequence thereof the lot of every individual is divinely appointed and apportioned; therefore, though at present it appears to our dim vision that some are God's beloved and others objects of divine disfavor, when we see more clearly we shall come to know that those conditions we call hells are just as necessary to cosmic harmony as those we call heavens, and that when the purpose of all events is clearly perceived every one will be satisfied with the condition to which he has been assigned.

It is said that Mohammed, in a vision, beheld a mighty tablet whereon was inscribed every event which Allah had decreed must occur before the Day of Judgment. There is no possible reconciliation between God's absolute sovereignty and complete control over every event between the dawn of creation and the end of the world,—a doctrine taught with the greatest possible insistence by Mohammed,—and the other doctrine which is strenuously advocated in the Koran that God rewards obedience and punishes disobedience to his will. Without some degree of freedom to act as one pleases there can be no disobedience: there can be only automatic fulfilment of a predetermined purpose; it stands to reason, therefore, that limited human freedom must have been one of Mohammed's concepts, otherwise he taught what was evidently self-contradictory, and must have been too intellectually blind, as was Calvin, to realize the contradiction in his own most positive assertions. The cruel and foolish statements of Calvinism and Mohammedanism are all of a piece, for they all alike grow out of the monstrous attempt to teach two diametrically opposed doctrines in one breath. This same fatal absurdity mars the theology of the Athanasian Creed, which has long been the source of bitter controversy among members of the Church of England, clergy and laity alike being hopelessly divided in their views concerning it. Augustine fell into the same error as did Mohammed and Calvin, and the great mistake of them all is in seeking to reconcile what is essentially irreconcilable. Predestination can be accepted rationally in one of two ways: we may believe that God is perfectly satisfied with the condition of affairs throughout the universe because it is the divine will that things should be as they are; or we may believe that foreordination only concerns the immutable relation between cause and effect, —therefore that God has not predetermined what exact course any individual shall pursue, but has only so regulated the course of events that our reaping in this, and in every other state of existence, must be in exact accordance with the nature of our sowing, because it is the inevitable outcome thereof. Either of these doctrines can be held by a devout and rational mind, but no one who yields to reason or employs sane logic can possibly hold a fatalistic doctrine to the effect that man is merely a machine for executing God's designs, and though all parts of the machine equally fulfil the divine purpose, the creator of the machine is pleased with one part and rewards it, but is angry with another part and condemns it.

Neither can any reasoning mind believe that we are saved by believing certain doctrines and condemned if we do not believe them, and at the same time hold that those who have done good shall enter heaven, and those who have done evil shall be cast into a hell of fire. Doing good and doing evil, as every observer of human conduct knows, is something totally apart from believing or disbelieving some theological doctrine, even though it be confessed that all beliefs must, to some extent, exert an influence on conduct; and for that reason no belief seriously entertained is altogether unimportant.

To grasp fully Mohammed's doctrine of the spirit-world one must make such allowance for the glowing imagery in which he clothed his speech and the intensely material models on which he founded his descriptions of the bliss of Paradise. Suffice it to say that when denuded of all superfluous accretions Mohammed's detailed accounts of the life to come are founded upon a close acquaintance with the demands of undeveloped human nature, not yet emancipated from the grip of sensationalism; and these accommodations are supplemented by a considerable amount of knowing contact with the "borderland," beyond which, in spite of all his rapturous claims to communion with the highest heavens, we do not believe Mohammed ever really penetrated. Those who have read Swedenborg's "Heaven and Hell" and believe in his seership can readily credit Mohammed's glowing accounts; those, on the other hand, who fully endorse Emerson's essay on Swedenborg will certainly discredit a large amount of Mohammed's particularization. For our own part, we believe the Mohammedan system to be a strange compound of truth and error, enforcing many moral lessons, temperance in particular, with great earnestness, but not presenting as a whole any very edifying views of the spiritual universe, unless we accept a purely esoteric interpretation of all Koranic metaphors.

Concerning the final judgment, we must admit that Mohammed's account of it is not destitute of ethical value, for he evidently, when discoursing on that stupendous theme, has forgotten his fatalism and brought to the front the true and solemn doctrine of each soul's individual responsibility. Allah is pictured as relentless but supremely just. Every soul is rewarded or punished in precise accord with the amount of good or evil done by thought and word and deed, and the Scales of Justice are adjusted to weigh as accurately according to the Koran as according to the Egyptian Book of the Dead.

Mohammedans who are strictly orthodox, profess to believe that on the day of judgment the entire human family will be assembled before the judgment seat. Mohammed will lead the procession, and will appear as intercessor on behalf of all who have professed the faith of Islam. Prophets of other religions will also appear and intercede on behalf of their respective followers. Gabriel, the mighty archangel, who figures with equal prominence in Christian mythology, will hold a balance so stupendous that when suspended one scale will cover heaven and the other scale will cover hell. The Koran declares that at the judgment seat all shall be judged with such exact impartiality that no deed, good or evil, "the weight of an ant," shall be overlooked. No one soul shall be able to obtain anything on behalf of another. There is no vicarious sacrifice to plead, no substituted or imputed righteousness in Mohammed's creed, but every soul is weighed and judged in exact accordance with individual righteousness or demerit. Mohammedanism in this respect teaches a doctrine which certainly has its roots in Judaism rather than in Christianity, and from Jewish sources it was without question largely derived.

soul is utterly without favoritism, though, as it is claimed that "true believers" have lived less wicked lives, for the most part, than unbelievers, they as a rule receive the milder sentences. There is a teaching to the effect that no Mohammedan will remain in hell forever, though idolaters may never escape from a place of suffering if by their wicked lives they have earned the doom of entering it. Idolatry had to be extirpated, so said Mohammed, and he found no surer way for creating a profound horror of it than by declaring that it was the one sin above all others which would receive most awful condemnation at the day of judgment.

So great is the discrepancy among Mohammedans as to the duration of the period of judgment that some have contended that the judgment of the whole human family will be completed in "the twinkling of an eye," while others have stretched it in their imagination to fifty thousand years. All souls must eventually cross the bridge Sirat, which is described as "thinner than a hair and sharper than a razor," and that bridge spans in one frail arch the immeasurable distance over hell from earth to paradise. Curious interpretations are given of Sirat, ranging from the purely metaphysical to the grossly literal, evidencing, in the case of Mohammedanism, as with all other cults, the influence of refinement and barbarity of thought upon the same symbolism.

Once again we acknowledge indebtedness to Dr. Alger for a vivid word-picture which he has drawn in the following sentences taken freely from the Koran. "As soon as the righteous have passed Sirat they obtain the first taste of their approaching felicity by a refreshing draught from 'Mohammed's Pond.' This is a square lake, a month's journey in circuit; its water is whiter than milk or silver and more fragrant than to be comparable to anything known by mortals. As many cups are set around it as there are stars in the firmament; and whoever drinks from it will never thirst more. Then comes paradise an ecstatic dream of pleasure—filled with sparkling streams, flowing fountains, shady groves, precious stones, all flowers and fruits, blooming youths, circulating goblets, black-eyed houris, incense, brilliant birds, delightful music, unbroken peace. A Sheeah tradition makes the prophet promise to Ali twelve palaces built of gold and silver bricks laid in a cement of musk and amber. The pebbles around them are diamonds and rubies, the earth saffron, its hillocks camphor. Rivers of honey, wine, milk and water flow through the court of each palace, their banks adorned with various resplendent trees, interspersed with bowers consisting each of one hollow transparent pearl. In each of these bowers is an emerald throne with a houri upon it arrayed in seventy green robes and seventy yellow robes of so fine a texture, and she herself so transparent, that the narrow of her ankle, notwithstanding robes, flesh and bone, is as distinctly visible as a flame in a glass vessel. Each houri has seventy locks of hair, every one under the care of a maid, who perfumes it with a censer which God has made to smoke with incense without the presence of fire; and no mortal has ever breathed such fragrance as is there exhaled.

"Such a doctrine of the future life as that here set forth, it is plain, was strikingly adapted to win and work fervidly on the minds of the imaginative, voluptuous, indolent, passionate races of the Orient. It possesses a nucleus of just and natural moral conviction and sentiment, around which is grouped a composite of a score of superstitions afloat before the rise of Islam, set off with the arbitrary drapery of a poetic fancy, colored by the peculiar idiosyncrasies of Mohammed emphasized to suit his special ends."

We have no reliable information concerning the attitude of Mohammedans in general as to their views on spirit-communion, though we know that they often lay stress upon the ministry of angels and do not hesitate to aver that the faithful on earth are attended by celestial spirits. There is much to admire and much that is repugnant in Mahommedan theories of the spiritual universe, but sifting out its best elements and discarding what is unworthy of credence and not calculated to advance any ethical purpose, we may well maintain that the prophet of Mecca deserves to be ranked among those intrepid religious leaders who have not been destitute of concern for human welfare, even though swayed by much personal ambition.

When men arise in our own day like Joseph Smith who founded Mormonism, Cyrus Teed, the founder of "Koreshan Science," John Alexander Dowie with his scheme of non-Jewish Zionism, and other powerful and dominating intellects who sway a multitude quite easily, we can understand something of the nature of Mohammed's influence.

CHAPTER XV

ANCIENT JEWISH AND EARLY CHRISTIAN IDEAS OF THE SOUL AND OF SPIRIT-COMMUNION

WITHOUT some knowledge of Jewish beliefs and practices, it must always prove extremely difficult for the average enquirer into primitive Christian doctrines and ceremonies to understand at all clearly what many of them signify or from what sources they have been derived. Far from being opposed to spirit-communion of an elevated type, a very large percentage of orthodox Jews have always affirmed it, though often only to a limited extent, and only in the case of very notable individuals. The much-disputed Bible story of the appearance of Samuel to Saul, which the fine American actor Wright Lorimer has deftly interwoven with the plot of his famous play "The Shepherd King," serves as a good illustration of very ancient Jewish tradition, and the modern playwright who makes the woman of En-dor declare that the apparition is through no art of hers, has interpreted aright the prophetic teaching concerning communion with departed friends and teachers. Jewish seers and sages always protested vehemently against necromantic arts and witchcraft. They condemned every form of sorcery, but this did not effect direct communion with the spirit-world apart from the practice of rites or incantations forbidden in the Law. The much-perverted picture of the soulless witch whom Saul consults, is taken, so far as stage-setting is concerned, far more from Shakespeare's "Macbeth" and from mediæ-

val fancy than from any words contained in the Bible record of Saul and his ultimate downfall. The woman at En-dor told no falsehood and behaved in no unseemly manner, and it is absurd to blacken her reputation, as many preachers have frequently done, in order to force into a narrative statements it does not contain in order to read them forth again as alleged divine warnings against Spiritualism. Such pulling cover over half-opened eyes is a dishonest trick, and has brought into deserved contempt the unfair attitude taken towards Spiritualism by sensational declaimers, notorious rather than famous, who have made capital among the unthinking and the too-easily influenced among their hearers, out of garbled and distorted versions of obscure ancient Biblical incidents. Samuel could not rescue Saul from the inevitable results of his own misdoing; it was therefore useless for the rebellious king to "trouble" the departed prophet when it was already too late to profit by that prophet's warning. But, far from Samuel condemning Saul to everlasting perdition in consequence of his earthly crimes and follies, he contents himself with predicting that both Saul and Jonathan would "be with him" on the following day. No other reference can fairly be gathered from the story, if it be credited at all, than that Samuel in spirit-life could see a little further ahead than could those still on earth, and he knew and did not hesitate to reveal, that David was already appointed Saul's successor, and it would be vain at that late hour to make any attempt to keep the crown on the head of a monarch literally, when it had already fallen psychically.

Two of the most notable instances of undying belief in spirit-communion among Jews who have not relinquished the traditions of their ancestors is the belief that Elijah presides at circumcisions, and a seat is kept vacant at a festive board for Abraham on the first night of Succoth, the feast of Tabernacles or Booths. It is declared that, though unseen by mortal eye, the patriarch is spiritually present in the booth, or wherever the Succoth feast is spread, and if a stranger appears on that occasion he is regarded as sent by Abraham to represent him at the board, a stranger on such an occasion is therefore treated with extraordinary hospitality and his presence is regarded as an omen of good to the family of whose bounty he partakes; Elijah is also believed to spiritually preside at the Seder service on the first and second evening of the feast of Passover. Should modern criticism dispose to a large degree of the personal Abraham or Elijah of pious tradition, the spiritual sense of a guiding presence need be in no degree disturbed, and it is indeed far easier to grasp the thought of many spiritual beings presiding at different festive boards in different parts of the world than to think of but one highly influential spirit presiding at the same time at so many banquets. But, should the personality of Abraham and of Elijah be rigidly adhered to in the most strictly orthodox sense, we are then only called upon to believe that spiritual radiations from a master-mind can be sent forth far and wide, and such is no doubt the case when we are successful in our oft-attempted demonstrations of mental telegraphy or telepathy.

Prayers for the departed enter into every Jewish liturgy and form part of every regular Jewish service, and though the time-honored "Mourner's Kaddish" does little more than express faith in God and offer prayer for blessing on all Israel, it proves convincingly that the departed are not forgotten. "Only the body perishes" is a familiar phrase from a popular introduction to the Kaddish, found in the Union Prayer-book employed by a very large number of congregations in America.

Primitive Christianity owed its origin very largely to the intrepid zeal of Saul of Tarsus, who, as Paul the Apostle, is more widely quoted by doctrinal preachers than are even the Words of Jesus as recorded by the four evangelists, and it is from Paul's epistles that nearly every dogma of the Christian belief has been gradually upbuilt. The two Letters to the Corinthians set forth in general outline the doctrine and practice of those early Christian congregations which,—during the formative period of Christianity being composed as they were partly of Jews and partly of Gentiles,—were often disunited internally and needed a strong disciplinary bond to organize and federate them and prevent their being destroyed by schisms. Paul was unquestionably a strong leader, a man of indomitable perseverance and of decidedly a fiery temper, capable of sustaining enormous burdens, even though handicapped (probably), by a physical constitution far from robust. His was one of those phenomenal careers which serve to demonstrate to a highly exceptional degree, the power of spirit over matter; for, though seemingly weak in frame and afflicted with defective sight (so nearly all traditions tell us) despite his "thorn in the flesh" which he described as "a messenger of the adversary which buffeted him," he performed heroic work of many kinds and in most trying circumstances through that indomitable spiritual energy which he styled "the power of an endless life." No one can read the Paulinian epistles with any sort of penetration without seeing at a glance that their author was an uncompromising Spiritualist and a thoroughgoing

Universalist. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," is a text containing quite enough in itself to prove distinctly where the writer stood who penned such bold and definitely affirmative statements. To the mind of Paul the whole creation was safe in the keeping of the Almighty, and he certainly knew nothing of the nightmares of a false theology which, in later centuries, wrested the teaching in the Epistle to the Romans to the upbuilding of a doctrine of election and reprobation which no Jew would ever have invented, and Paul never forswore Judaism: he merely added to it a Christian supplement. Beginning as an extremely orthodox Pharisee, an ultra-ritualist, this wonderful man went on to a point where he left all matters of ceremonial to the conscience and judgment of individuals. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" was Paul's doctrine; but let him never seek to thrust his personal convictions upon his neighbors.

The story of Saul's conversion, as recorded in the "Acts" is a thrilling spiritualistic narrative. Journeying between Jerusalem and Damascus, he undergoes a spiritual experience which changes the entire current of his thought and life. Some radiant spiritual presence appears to him and asks him why he persecutes the innocent at the instigation of the priests and magistrates. Like many highly emotional sensitives, he is completely overwhelmed with this amazing and altogether unexpected manifestation, and for three days is without sight and in a very precarious condition. On his recovery he is a changed man, and becomes the warm friend and ardent supporter of those whom he aforetime had relentlessly persecuted.

It should always be remembered that Paul was the chief exponent of the resurrection of Jesus, and he never claimed to have seen any risen flesh, but only to have held communion with the Master in a purely spiritual manner. Those highly intelligent English clergymen who are now outspoken in their advocacy of a purely spiritual view of the resurrection are not "heretics"; they are simply reiterating what the New Testament declares, for neither the gospels nor the epistles contain a fragment of evidence sufficient to prove that the primitive Christian church held any carnal doctrine of resuscitation, such as was forced upon it at a later date by those belligerent creed-makers who out-voted the more spiritually-minded in certain famous ecclesiastical councils and foisted upon the church a repulsive and irrational dogma entirely at variance with the earliest Christian faith.

We submit the following propositions to the discomfiture of all who insist upon a carnal instead of a spiritual view of the resurrection. 1st, the gospels tell us that the reappearance of Jesus after his crucifixion occurred within about forty hours after his physical decease, and that the very watchers at the cross who remained to the end on Friday afternoon, did not recognize him in any physical manner when he showed himself to them, near the sepulchre in which his remains had been placed, at daybreak the following Sunday morning, and, moreover, when two disciples walked with him to Emmaus on the same evening, a distance of several miles, they did not recognize him by any physical test, but only as did the women in the morning, by purely subjective or internal evidences; or when he specially made himself known to them by some essentially characteristic word or act.

2d. The solidification of the apparition to Thomas the skeptic was clearly an instance of what, in these days, is termed materialization, and the language of the gospel which records it is such as to prove abundantly to every unprejudiced reader that there was a distinct difference between the grosser nature of that demonstration and the more ethereal character of the appearances vouchsafed to the other disciples whose spiritual perceptions were more open than were those of Didymus.

Spiritualists among the clergy, like Archdeacon Colley and others who have made an earnest investigation of psychic phenomena for several decades of years, emphatically testify to the reality of spirit-materialization as well as all other phases of spirit-manifestation described in the New Testament; and though such men are "thorns in the side" of those literalistic theologians who can see nothing in the scriptural doctrine of resurrection deeper or more spiritual than physical revivification, their influence is continually spreading and that influence is becoming too great to be effectually offset by any endeavors on the part of bishops or any other dignitaries to lead the people back to outworn superstitions. Quite a sensation was created in London during the summer of 1904 by the action of the bishop of the diocese, who refused to permit a clergyman to preside at a lecture delivered by Mrs. Besant on "REINCARNATION," which is the oldest form of the doctrine of resurrection of the flesh, and the only form in which it can reasonably be accepted by thoughtful minds. We can possibly believe that in order to work out a cycle of experiences we may need to take on successive bodies until at length a perfect structure is upreared. This was one of the doctrines preached by some primitive Christians, though there appears never to have been a time when the entire Christian church was unanimous in this regard.

This doctrine, strenuously advocated by modern Theosophists, is at least thinkable and to many minds is highly credible; but the attempted enforcement of an unthinkable dogma of physical resuscitation can only meet with total rejection at the hands of thinking clergymen as well as laymen. Nothing can be more disastrous to the cause of true religion than any endeavor to bolster up incredible assertions in religion's name, and this the wiser among church people are now beginning to see quite clearly. Even if the physical resurrection of Jesus was completely proved, it would throw no light whatever on the question of the raising of ordinary human bodies at the "last great day," and that for two very significant reasons: 1st,—that Jesus is reported to have been in the tomb only forty hours and his body did not see corruption—this is insisted upon by orthodox Christian theologians; 2d—that it is expressly taught by the same expositors that he was not born in the ordinary way; therefore so exceptional a body raised under such exceptional circumstances could offer no proof of the resurrection of ordinary bodies which have already seen corruption.

Physiologists of the old school are wont to claim that the physique changes completely every seven years, and the celebrated French astronomer Camille Flamarion said long ago in his well known treatise "Dieu dans la Nature" that a physical organism can be completely reconstructed by natural physiological processes in less than one year, some parts of the structure changing within thirty days and other portions at different intervals, never extending to much over eleven months. If Marie Corelli's statements in "A Romance of Two Worlds" are to be credited, there is an electric germ at the centre of every organism around which the body is formed and which escapes at the time of physical dissolution, though it never dies. This "germ" may be identical with the "permanent atom" vouched for by many Theosophists who are reincarnationists; and this may be the nucleus of the new body which is to rise at the close of a cycle. The writer heard a very similar idea broached by English clergymen many years ago who, when seeking to expound the creedal phrase "I believe in the resurrection of the body," said that there is undoubtedly some germ at the centre of the organism which never dies and which constitutes the foundation of the "resurrection body." With such doctrines we have no dispute, but they bear no resemblance to the crude fancies of the poet Young, who, when describing the resurrection, uses such grotesque expressions that much of his poetry is often looked upon as satire by thoughtful readers. Take the glowing imagery of Ezekiel 37 in which we can easily detect the prophetic view of the resurrection entertained in ancient Israel. A vision is described, in which description glowing metaphor is introduced. The whole House of Israel is represented under the figure of dry bones in a valley, to which the prophet effectually appeals, urging them in the name of the Most High to come forth "out of their graves,"—a purely symbolical expression, the significance of which is transparent, for the vision is interpreted in the very chapter in which it is described.

It would be quite as reasonable to interpret Peter's vision described in Acts 10 literally as to insist that Ezekiel 37 predicts a corporeal resuscitation, and there are people blind and stupid enough to see nothing grander in Peter's vision at Joppa than permission to eat pork and shellfish and other table "delicacies" forbidden by the Mosaic Law. Peter's vision, however, is explained and applied in the chapter which narrates it, wherein it is shown to teach a valuable and still greatly-needed lesson in universal brotherhood.

The terms death and dead, as well as raised and resurrection, are used frequently in Paul's epistles in a mystical or esoteric, and at the same time truly practical, sense. For example, people are described as "dead unto sin" and "raised to righteousness." Paul himself "dies" daily, and exhortations are given to those who are already "risen with Christ" to walk worthy of the high vocation to which they have been called.

Much salutary spiritual and ethical teaching can be gathered from all such expressions, and we are fully justified in making use of them, but they teach a far different doctrine than the irrational and carnal views which have been foisted upon the world by a secularized church in periods of degeneracy.

As to communion with the spirit-world there seems no doubt on one point, viz., that it was on no other basis than that of conscious spirit-communion that the Christian Church was originally based. Not hearsay evidence, but actual living proof of intercourse with at least one who had actually passed through death and demonstrated immortality. "Because I live ye shall live also"; "I am he that liveth and was dead and behold I am alive forevermore." These and many other passages of similar import may be cited to show that individual immortality conclusively demonstrated was the corner-stone of early Christianity.

In an elaborate work by Crowell, "The Identity of Primitive Christianity with Modern Spiritualism," an enormous array of proofs are marshaled to sustain this proposition; and similar facts are arrayed in an equally conclusive manner in the writings of S. C. Hall and many other cultivated and brilliant writers of the nineteenth century, who did not hesitate to show that only a spiritualistic view of the New Testament explained its reasonableness.

The many instances of spiritual manifestations recorded in the gospels cannot reasonably be explained away unless we are prepared to deny that the so-called "miracles," and many other phenomena, have any other than a purely figurative or subjective meaning; and though such a view may prove acceptable to rationalistic Unitarians, it will always be met with determined opposition by all who seek to uphold traditional Christianity.

Mrs. Besant, in her "Esoteric Christianity," in which she discusses the "Lesser Mysteries," deals largely, but not exclusively, with the symbolic aspects of gospel narratives, and to such a volume many people are now turning who are eager to escape the unsatisfactory alternative which has often been presented, either to endorse the crudest orthodox literalism or else to deny in toto the marvelous tales with which the gospel narratives abound. When Strauss published the first edition of his "Life of Jesus" while a very young man, he satisfied some of his skeptical colleagues, and gave much delight to many people outside of Germany as well as within its borders, by insisting upon an altogether mythical view of the alleged miraculous, but so feeble an interpretation of the origin of several "myths" as Strauss attempted, served to cast serious discredit upon his conclusions, at least among inquiring people who are never likely to rest content with mere dismissal of a difficult problem in an extremely commonplace manner. No better illustration of the defect of Strauss' method can be given than its attempted explanation of the tradition that Jesus walked on the water by deciding that he simply walked on the seashore and from that trivial circumstance,—which could have excited no reasonable wonder, seeing that to walk by the sea is a familiar every-day occurrence,—there arose the legend that Jesus was seen by his disciples walking on the waves. Credulity is heavily taxed to accept so far-fetched a solution, because it is well known that mythical stories are built upon unusual and surprising events which appeal strongly to imagination and for which no scientific explanation has yet been offered; and so simple a fact as a man walking by the sea is utterly inadequate to set a wonderful story floating, as the circumstance is so common that no one would think twice about it seeing that there is no mystery connected with it requiring any explanation whatever.

Far easier is it to credit the romantic theory of Renan than the skeptical theory of Strauss, though Renan's portrait of Jesus is at times so weak as to fall far below the necessary heroic standard. That Jesus stands at least for a Master, and was so regarded at the beginning of the Christian era is a fact beyond reasonable dispute, despite the fact that Dupuis, Gerald Massey, and many other distinguished authors, in their determined endeavors to prove Christianity identical with a far older Solar Cultus, have sought to disprove utterly all historical foundation for the gospels. The three gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark and Luke, commonly styled Synoptic, undoubtedly record historic incidents, so does the mystical Fourth Gospel, though in less pronounced degree; for, unlike its predecessors in the Canon, it commences with a Gnostic dissertation concerning the Logos which Theosophists declare "ensouls" the universe.

In John 14 we have a striking illustration of the continuity of earlier teachings, when the Master says to his disciples "In my Father's house are many mansions (abiding places), if it were not so I would have told you." Such language seems perfectly to confirm an already accepted truth but does not serve to enunciate a new doctrine. "Whither I go ye know and the way ye know" may also be fairly taken as another proof of the complete agreement which subsisted between the primitive Christian gnostic teaching and the more ancient teachings with which primitive Christianity was in complete accord, and of which its distinctive doctrine was a continuation.

Many strange allusions to "baptism for the dead" and other ancient rites, found in the epistles of Paul, show to every student that early Christian practices were in many respects identical with pre-Christian customs which had been long established and which were intended to confer advantages alike upon those yet on earth and their departed brethren. In the Apostle's Creed, Jesus is said to have "descended into hell," which is often translated Hades,—the general abode of departed spirits. Here is an unmistakable evidence that when that early creed was compiled no such ideas as a hell of endless torment had entered the Christian mind, for no Saviour would minister among the irrevocably lost.

The early Christian assemblies were meetings of devout and fraternal persons who exercised their various spiritual gifts one by one in open conference, and it was only after some of these meetings had become disorderly and sober discipline had been relaxed, that it was necessary for Paul, as overseer of many federated congregations, to rebuke disorderly practices and insist that all things be conducted "decently and in order." "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" is a clear reference to the orderly exercise of spiritual gifts in an assembly, and surely not even one who seeks, in these days, to attribute all spirit-communion to "evil" influences will be found ready to concede that the faithful, self-denying early Christians who jeopardized their earthly all by fidelity to their convictions and stood ready to shed their blood, if need arose, for the Christian cause, were possessed with devils. Only the rational view of spirit-communion, which we are taking, explains phenomena recorded in the New Testament, and if it come to comparison between ancient and modern marvels and mysteries little difference can be discerned between the two. Wherever we turn for confirmation we find that orderly and disorderly conditions contemporaneously prevail, and it ever has been and still is intensely necessary that we should uphold the former and not let the latter go unreproved.

To understand at all clearly the attitude of the earliest Christian church towards spirit-communion we must never allow ourselves to forget that the first impetus given to the Christian movement was its claim to have demonstrated human immortality in an age and in countries where faith therein had well nigh expired or where doubt was gaining so great a foothold that the path to the hereafter was so deeply veiled in shadow as to make the hour of dissolution one of impenetrable gloom. Jesus brought life and immortality "to light"—such was the early Christian claim, and this he could not have done unless he had willingly surrendered himself to crucifixion when his opponents desired to crucify him. "Have no fear of those who can kill the body, for that is all that they can do" is a text which announces spiritual, not fleshly, immortality in terms of unmistakable lucidity. It was not a physical but a spiritual body which arose and appeared to many and ultimately ceased to manifest on earth except in such rare instances as that of the appearance to Saul of Tarsus at the time of his conversion.

It is absurd to argue that Jesus did not sanction spiritual communion because he told Thomas that it was more blessed to be endowed with spiritual perception than to be dependent upon tangible external demonstrations, for such it ever must be.

The men and women of nineteen centuries ago who were led to embrace Christianity in its pristine period were human beings like ourselves, with deep affections and yearning aspirations such as we are conscious of. Neither in the established Judaism or Paganism of their day did they find the evidences or the consolation which they sought, any more than people find either to-day in a hard institutionalized ecclesiasticism or in a scientific agnosticism which is always its close companion, though seemingly its direct antagonist.

No amount of bewildering speculation can ever satisfy the cravings of human love, for in hours of bereavement people are not seeking to know whether by some vaguely defined alchemistic process they can eventually "cheat the undertaker," they are striving to receive proof that their beloved friends who have departed are still alive and loving and capable of communing with them still. To the early Christians, who were in constant peril of losing their earthly all, all material things (fleshly bodies included) appeared of very little value. They were in constant danger of underrating rather than of overvaluing the material world and all that it contains. While we cannot find ourselves entirely in accord with all primitive Christian views and practices, any more than we can sympathize entirely with the beliefs and ways of modern Spiritualists, we do affirm that the early Christian religion was founded upon demonstrated individual immortality, and that it taught a progressive continuous life for every human being after dropping the external organism. Mourning for the departed received no sanction in the early Christian church; white robes, not black, were worn on occasions of transition, and at the service of holy communion it was generally believed not only that commemoration of the departed should be made and prayers for their continued progress offered, but also that they were often truly present with their fellow communicants and still took part in the blessings of the united spiritual feast.

Slowly, but surely, is modern Christendom returning to the ancient esoteric faith; one by one clergymen, now branded as heretics by their materialistic and ritualistic confreres, are coming to the front with outspoken declarations which strike the less spiritually-minded but professedly "orthodox" among their brethren with indignation and alarm; but the old fallacy of a fleshly resurrection has to die and it is surely dying, and not slowly, that in its place may rise a spiritual conception of immortality in which science and religion can unite their wedded hands. The following utterance from a distinguished English clergyman is amply sufficient to show the drift of modern religious thought, back to primitive spiritual conceptions and forward to new and nobler definitions of life and its endless continuity. We offer no comment, we agree so perfectly with the quoted words that we prefer to leave them without addition of our own to make their salutary influence felt upon every attentive reader's mind. The author of the following quotation is the Rev. Forbes Phillips, vicar of Gorleston, who has dramatized Guy Thorne's popular book, "When it was Dark."

"For my own part I declare plainly as a high church clergyman, who indeed wears vestments and lights candles on the altar, that I do not consider it an article of Christian faith that his body did rise from the tomb. On the contrary, I believe it did not. I believe if we were to make careful exploration in Palestine to-day we might actually come across the sacred tomb and discover within it the precious body of our Lord; or, at all events, dim remains of it as it was hidden away by Joseph of Arimathea.

"Christ rose in spirit. It was the spirit that appeared to the disciples so constantly after the crucifixion. It was a spirit that ascended into heaven, and it is a glorious spirit that appears and has appeared during the long centuries to thousands of wearied Christians here on earth."

CHAPTER XVI

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH IN MODERN EUROPE

UNDER the name of psychical research the phenomena of Spiritualism are being carefully and cautiously investigated in Great Britain, and also, to a very great extent, in France, so much so, indeed, that in Paris it is almost impossible to avoid meeting talented and influential people who are actively engaged in this important and alluring study. When the writer, in 1895, was the honored guest of Marie, Countess of Caithness, Duchesse of Pomar,—known all over the literary world as a learned and enthusiastic exponent of Spiritualism and Theosophy,—at the magnificent palace in Ave Wagram, named Holyrood in honor of Marie Stuart, Queen of Scots, whom the duchess believed to be her spiritual guardian, all sorts of interesting people gathered in the splendid salon to discuss all conceivable aspects of psychic science. It was then that many of the movements which have now grown to large proportions were in a comparatively incipient stage, though even then Spiritism as set forth by "Allan Kardec" was a well established cult, possessing an extensive literature and represented by many gifted men and women of high social standing and far more than average intelligence. Three of Allan Kardec's works—"The Mediums' Book," "The Spirits' Book," and "Heaven and Hell"—had long been translated into excellent English by the famous Anna Blackwell, and still another—"Genesis"—translated by the present writer, had appeared in America.

These four books constitute the leading text-books of European Spiritists, who nearly all accept the doctrine of reincarnation as well as spirit-communion. The work of the Leymaries has long been widely and favorably known, and at the headquarters of the organization of which P. G. Leymarie (now succeeded by his son) was long the head, every phase of mysterious phenomena is persistently and critically investigated.

The fine premises known as 42 Rue Saint Jacques, are the centre of spiritistic operations participated in by many of the most famous scientists in Europe, for in France and Italy scientific men of recognized high standing are foremost in the ranks of psychical investigation. The works of Flamarion, the world-renowned astronomer, have done very much to popularize enquiry into everything "occult"; his splendid collection of well authenticated facts, published as "L'Inconnu" (an English edition of which bears the title "The Unknown") has served to open the eyes of very many who might never have been led to investigate had it not been for the prestige given to the enquiry by so great a scientist.

Victorien Sardou, the famous playwright, for a great many years has been a prominent advocate of Spiritualism, and it is well known that Victor Hugo and many others among French "immortals" have vouched for the reality of spirit-communion.

The Martinists and various other mystic orders have influential membership in Paris which, despite its frivolity on the surface, has a deep undercurrent of genuine spirituality, which no skepticism or indifference has ever been able effectually to quell.

We hear of "Satanism," which is Black Art and altogether opposed to true Spiritualism, Occultism and Theosophy, but that is but a sad perversion of a mighty and glorious force which, when rightly understood and wisely handled is capable of contributing enormously to human welfare. Despite the constantly reiterated assertion that France is atheistic in its modern tendency, nothing can be further from the truth so far as its most enlightened citizens are concerned. The Republic has indeed exalted State above Church, but, in so doing, though it has completely secularized education, it has cleared the way for a new and perfectly unfettered investigation of the secret forces of Nature which can now be fearlessly conducted, without fear of interruption, unless deeds are performed so much at variance with common rights and liberties that the arm of civil law must be invoked, in which case the wrong-doing of clairvoyants, palmists, astrologers and others must be justly dealt with precisely as similar misdemeanors committed by other classes of society. Clairvoyants in France are numerous and often very reliable, though too many seers and seeresses are unduly given to enlarging upon the dark side of whatever they psychically discern. France is a curiously impressionable country; its very atmosphere seems favorable to psychical development, and the ready impressionability of its inhabitants makes it far less difficult for spiritual views of life to gain a footing there than in lands where the temperament and habits of the people incline to the solid rather than to the volatile.

The influence exerted by the Duchesse de Pomar was exceedingly great, as she combined with ample means and high station a superb intellectual equipment for literary enterprises in which she magnificently excelled. For many years the fine monthly magazine she edited L'Aurore was the paper par excellence in which might always be found the latest and most brilliant utterances of the greatest thinkers in Europe who undertook to treat on psychic themes. When that truly noble lady passed to spirit-life in the autumn of 1895, no one was found to exactly fill the place the good duchess had left vacant; but, though such was literally the sad fact a perfect host of honorable and capable men and women have arisen on all sides to sustain and further develop interest in all that pertains to the psychic side of human nature. That very popular American periodical, Everybody's Magazine, published a finely illustrated article (March, 1906) by Vance Thompson, entitled "The Invisible World," in which the public has been treated to an insight into spiritualistic and occult doings which must have proved a great eye-opener to those belated people who do not know that this scientific twentieth century is most keenly alive to the evidences of life immortal and that European as well as American and Australian capitals are centres of investigation, leading rapidly to results which are completely demolishing materialism and putting to rout at the same instant perverted religious dogmatism. A photograph of Spiritualist Headquarters in London shows a fine building in Hanover Square, a most fashionable West End district, the seat of the famous St. George's Church, famed as the historic fane in which countless aristocratic marriages have been celebrated. The next illustration shows us the interior of the great hall in Rue d' Athènes, Paris, where a highly distinguished company of learned men and women are seen seated at a conference of the Society for psychical Research, of which Professor Charles Richet is president. This body has had in its presidential chair at different times Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and others among the most distinguished scientists of the present age. Such men are neither charlatans nor the dupes of tricksters, and it is they, and others like them, who are now conducting intricate and elaborate investigations which are bearing abundant fruit, though the measures employed seem often unnecessarily slow and laborious to convinced spiritualists, for whom these tedious proceedings appear not to be necessary; but such should never lose sight of the important fact that the scientific world is not made up of lucides or sensitives, and the outside non-sensitive public is demanding a record of scientifically conducted experiments prior to accepting as proven the stupendous, though intrinsically simple, facts for which these learned savants are prepared to vouch.

Another photograph shows Flamarion lecturing on some phase of Spiritualism in which he has been deeply and critically interested from his youth. Celebrities and their endorsement mean much to many minds, and rightly so in some senses, for men who are devoting their lives industriously to the pursuit of any branch of science, provided their researches are being honorably conducted, are justly entitled to our attention and esteem. It takes the trained observer and experimentalist to carefully weigh all minor points in evidence, and if these are neglected, testimony otherwise valuable often remains decidedly inconclusive.

Major Darget's portrait is also presented as one interested in matters occult, and he as discoverer of the "N Ray" has long been one of the brilliant and highly-honored lights in French scientific circles.

A comparatively new word is now in constant use—metapsychical, which undoubtedly means much more than the old metaphysical and it has a congenial companion in supernormal, which has largely driven from the vocabulary of culture the ancient supernatural. Terms are valuable to the extent that they clearly express ideas, but no further, and if the new word metapsychical proves a successful candidate for scientific honors, scientific men who use it must be prepared to define exactly what they mean by psychical, and then go on to define meta, which properly means beyond. That extremely foolish phrase "unconscious mind," which we regret to discover is holding high carnival in reputable literature, conveys no intelligible idea to the average thoughtful reader. Super and sub, meaning respectively higher and lower, may be allowed to stand as expressive prefixes, but un is a negative term, and therefore definable only as an expression of negation. There is no unconscious mind, though the mind may be expressed on various planes in diverse manners.

The savants of Europe who are busy wrestling with occult problems, are certainly on their way to many valuable discoveries, but many of their present positions are purely tentative, and as they honestly and fearlessly admit, they are not afraid to propose hypotheses temporarily and then abandon one hypothesis in favor of another when further knowledge compels the taking of some more advanced position. "Everything is possible; nothing is proved." Such is the introductory statement likely to be made by the scientific researcher who, standing on the threshold of a vast unknown, refuses to pronounce anything unknowable. In like manner are we dropping from our vocabulary, when we seek to be rigidly scientific in our choice of terms, such familiar, but often misleading, words as invisible, inaudible, incurable, incorrigible, and many more of the same family. As substitutes for the terms we are discarding we are bringing rightly into prominent employ such reasonable and useful words as unseen, unheard, uncorrected, and many more of like import which do not close the door upon any sort of investigation, but only describe an immediate and temporary agnostic attitude, which may at any moment yield to a gnostic position as a result of successful new discovery.

Much stress is laid in many quarters upon the dangers to ill-balanced minds resulting from too close attention given to things mysterious; but, though caution is doubtless needed, and there have been some sad catastrophes resulting apparently from unwise dabbling in the "occult," it must not be forgotten that scientific research in general, as well as the pursuit of further application of the principles of mechanics, has never been unattended with some degree of danger as well as difficulty. It is therefore only puerile to cry out against investigation because danger and difficulty, to some extent, surround the gate of the temple of higher knowledge. Where would have been the great railways, canals, electric cables, and a thousand other valuable appliances in the modern world if inventors and explorers had been scared from their work by the parrot-cry of those whom Longfellow well described in his poetic gem "Excelsior," but to whose croakings and warnings the intrepid Alpine climber would pay no heed? Timid people whose nerves are weak and whose hearts are in a pathological condition must move very cautiously in all directions; but the stronger and healthier members of the human race will never content themselves with following directions adapted only to the needs of the weakest specimens. But though there are dangers as well as difficulties along the road of psychical investigation, the uncanny aspects of the question are greatly exaggerated, and in almost all cases where insanity and crime have been attributed to psychic investigation or to the development and exercise of "mediumship," it has been found after more close examination that quite other causes than those alleged by the enemies of Spiritualism had been manifestly working to produce disastrous ends.

Religious revivals and all forms of emotional excitement are very dangerous for some people, and much as we may wish to reform Spiritualistic methods, as we certainly desire also to reform religious propaganda, we cannot do either by holding up to unreasonable execration an entire system because it manifests certain grave faults which greatly need correction. Ella Wheeler Wilcox gave excellent advice to multitudes through the medium of the Hearst newspapers when she counseled astrologers, palmists, clairvoyants and all to whom the public go to "get their fortunes told," to exercise great wisdom in plying their vocation, for her good sense and wide experience in the world had fully assured her that people will enquire into the mysterious, precisely as they will visit doctors, lawyers, and many other classes of people when they are in doubt or trouble. We certainly cannot prevent the exercise of psychic gifts or the investigation of aught that is "occult" in private, even though the law should put down its public practice, we are only reasonable, therefore, in so far as we determine to accept an existing situation and seek to make the best of it in the truly practical way of setting to work to improve and refine what cannot be abolished.

The darker aspects of Parisian Occultism have no connection whatever with scientific research or with Spiritualism, and though they are getting a good deal of advertising they exercise only a very slight influence in any other than the most morally depraved circles of society. Spirit pictures, drawn automatically through the hand of the distinguished etcher Ferdinand Demoulins, have excited much attention among Parisians, and spirit photographs vouched for by the famous Col. de Rochas are also objects of considerable interest.

All these things are very wonderful, and the attention they excite is more than transitory, but even these marvels pale in genuine importance, in the esteem of many, in the presence of the wonderful works of healing which are constantly attested by competent witnesses, who know of the immense benefit derived by many sufferers through the agency of psychic treatment or psycho-therapy, often clumsily designated hypnotism, which is a misleading term unless applied exclusively to methods which induce sleep or are in some way connected with it, as hypnosis from the Greek hypnos must always properly mean a state of somnolence, and very many cases of psychic cure have nothing whatever to do in any sense of the word with any somnambulic condition.

Professor Durville, one of the leaders of the Magnetic School (L'École Magnétique,—25 Rue Saint Merri) has recently achieved much prominence, and there are many others in Paris to whom the suffering public is greatly indebted for relief from distressing maladies. If it be asserted that nervous cases and diseases of the imagination are almost the only types of malady which are successfully treated by psychic methods, then be it so, if such shall prove the case, but even did we make so exaggerated an admission we should still be compelled to gratefully acknowledge that a beneficent agency is at work which is grappling successfully with many of the obscurest and most distressing ailments which baffle at every turn the skill of the most eminent physicians.

Telepathy is pronounced "an acquired certainty" by those who have studiously proved it, and instead of Spiritualists displaying wisdom by fighting shy of it as though it were an offset to spirit-communion, it is found to be exactly the reverse as further researches in psychology are constantly demonstrating with ever-brightening conclusiveness that the telepathic faculty survives physical dissolution, and can be and often is employed by our discarnate as well as by our incarnate friends, when seeking to communicate. Vance Thompson tells us that while accepted Science does not go quite so far as Occultism, it certainly sets forth the following propositions:

1st. There exist in Nature certain unknown forces capable of acting on matter.

2d. We possess other means of knowledge than those of reason or the senses.

This second statement applies to the subjective phenomena of "metaphysics," which includes telepathy, second sight, clairvoyance, and all else that is closely allied with such a broad general classification.

While speaking of French institutions, we must not forget to mention the temple of the Martinists (the cult founded by Claude de Saint-Martin) in the Latin Quarter (13 Rue Sequier), of which Dr. Encasse, generally known as "Papus" is the leader. This society has spread the world over, and has recently established itself quite successfully in America under the leadership of Mrs.

Margaret Peake, whose home is at Sandusky, Ohio. As author of "Born of Flame," "Zenia the Vestal," and other thrilling occult stories, this gifted woman is quite a literary celebrity, and in Boston, a city she often visits and where she is highly esteemed, with the coöperation of Dr. F. J. Miller, a prominent teacher and practitioner of mental and spiritual therapeutics, a Martinist lodge has been established; the opening sessions of which were held in the office of Dr. Miller in the Oxford Hotel, Huntington Avenue, late in 1905. Sardou has done much to popularize Spiritualism by his famous plays, and we see no cause for reasonable doubt that ere long the stage will prove one of the most efficient aids to helping forward a knowledge of psychic forces as the morality and miracle plays in the time of Queen Elizabeth were influential in spreading the religious and ethical opinions of that period, and it cannot be successfully denied that at the present time strong plays which introduce a psychic element are very popular.

In Italy all phases of psychic phenomena are undergoing close examination. The eminent Lombroso and other world-renowned scientific celebrities take prominent part in psychical investigation, and very persistent as well as rigidly analytical investigators do they prove to be.

Fanatical churchmen may howl "devil," and materialists may scoff at every attempt to unseat their favorite fallacies, but Spiritualism has come to stay, and though in many quarters it has been unhappily saddled with excrescences which need removing (and are even now being removed) it is beyond question that a comprehensive spiritual philosophy is the coming philosophy, uniting, as it does, science with religion, and restoring knowledge of a spiritual universe coupled with acceptance of all that experimental science can reveal. Europe is undergoing a spiritual renaissance, and France is heading the advancing hosts which are patiently and industriously marching forward to ever-increasing victory.

CHAPTER XVII

SLEEP AS AN EDUCATOR—ITS SPIRITUAL PURPOSE AND VALUE

THE most thoroughly universal means extant for accomplishing communion with the unseen universe is undoubtedly through sleep, which though commonly regarded as only a physiological necessity, providing opportunity for recuperation through periodic rest for brain and muscles, is in reality a most blessed means for enabling all of us to enjoy fellowship, one with another, regardless of distance or any other material barrier.

The accepted "Masonic" division of time into three periods of eight hours each, in every twenty-four, is certainly wise in the average, for it is found by experience that excellent health and mental vigor can generally be maintained if we devote eight hours every day to our regular business occupation, eight hours to eating, dressing, bathing and all varieties of recreation including active outdoor exercise, and eight hours to sleep.

Sixteen hours by this arrangement are well accounted for as spent in action, and it is easily possible for every one to see how during those two thirds of time, we are receiving instruction or are at least capable of receiving it; but the remaining third, the eight hours spent in sleep, is looked upon by many people as practically wasted so far as education is concerned, consequently many people of active temperament and ambitious nature, grudge the time they devote to sleep, and seek constantly to shorten it, with what disastrous results we are all familiar, but nothing can well be more self-evident than that lack of sleep is a highroad to insanity.

This pitiable contempt for "Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep" is a product of feverish unrest occasioned by an ultra-physical idea of life, into which no spiritual element is allowed to enter as an appreciable benefit. We are not exercising any of our physical senses while we are sleeping, and with those who bind themselves to the sad belief that knowledge can be obtained only while we are wide awake and actively exercising our material senses, there must be a sense of repulsion felt to any phenomenon which takes us away from the active outward life in which we are so greatly interested that we desire to devote to it our every energy.

Were false beliefs concerning the spiritual and intellectual uses of sleep confined to confessed Materialists, there would be no occasion for wonder, but the reputed religious, Bible-reading world is no less astray than any Secularist community in this respect, and it certainly does seem curious that any who credit Bible doctrines should disparage sleep or doubt that dreams are often both significant and prophetic.

Two of the most remarkable Bible characters bear the honored name of Joseph, one in the Old Testament, the other in the New Testament, and though they are introduced to us as having lived many centuries apart, they were equally noteworthy for the wonderful nature of their dreams, and for their marvellous faculty of interpretation.

Joseph who wears the coat of many colors or "long-sleeved" coat as the Polychrome Bible expresses it, to distinguish him from his brothers who were less enlightened than he, was according to Genesis, the only man who in time of scarcity of crops had possessed sufficient insight to so harvest the grain when it grew plenteously, that there was abundance in store to prevent famine in time of dearth.

Pharaoh, the native king of Egypt, could dream as all men can dream, but he could not tell the significance of what he dreamed, consequently his dreams though highly significant in themselves, would have proved useless to him, had it not been for Joseph's interpretations.

Dreams are usually couched in symbols or allegory. Seven years of plenty are represented by seven full ears of corn, and seven well-fed cattle, while seven years of scarcity are represented by seven wasted ears of corn and seven starving cattle.

To see fourteen years ahead seems truly marvelous, but it is not altogether unusual, for even in recent times and before great interest had been reawakened in psychic problems, it has often happened that sensitive people have clearly seen events a long while before they actually occurred. It is not, then, with simple dreaming, but only with interpreting of dreams that highly gifted seers are specially concerned.

There is always some degree of difficulty associated with any prediction of the future, because it may reasonably be asked, how can any seer, no matter how phenomenally gifted, possibly see something which has not occurred?

Ingenious explanations of reading the past may readily occur to us, and it seems quite feasible that Nature keeps a book of remembrance in which all events are faithfully recorded, and to that scroll of record, seers and seeresses enjoy particularly easy access.

"The future lies hidden in the womb of the past."

This is an occult saying worthy of deep consideration. Causes have been already set in motion which are even now bringing forth results which must proceed forth in orderly, inevitable sequence. Admitting this proposition, it is by no means impossible to formulate an intelligent working hypothesis to account for the frequent fact that coming events are constantly being foretold.

Rash guesses and arbitrary statements based on the peculiar views which some people entertain concerning the most highly mystical portions of the Bible, can never be reasonably included in the catalogue of prophecies, because the foolish and decidedly unfulfilled predictions based upon such arbitrary dogmatism display no spiritual insight and such predictions are of no practical value.

All truly prophetic sight has a use and its use is susceptible of demonstration as in the case of the Josephs of both Testaments. The New Testament Joseph is said to have seen an "angel of the Lord" during his sleep, and whilst he was dreaming he received from that celestial messenger information of great importance upon which he could and did successfully act. When we are soundly sleeping, our minds disengaged from all ordinary business activities, we may hold conscious converse with spiritual beings whom, at other times, we do not hear or see.

The angels who appear unto us at certain times are not necessarily nearer to us at those times than on other occasions, but our receptive state enables us to become aware of their presence.

The phrase "unconscious mind" is very nearly unintelligible, though Dr. Schofield and other learned and able men employ it, but while we cannot reasonably speak of mind as unconscious, we can quite fairly claim that mind can function on various planes of consciousness, so much so that when we are wide awake on one plane, we are sound asleep on another.

The two states—waking and sleeping, are so distinct that they are rarely unified, thus, in one sense we are unconscious of what is going on, on one plane of action, when we are completely engrossed with what is occurring on another. Perfectly sound refreshing sleep may be quite unconnected with ordinary dreaming, yet when we wake we find ourselves wiser as well as refreshed in consequence of our profound repose.

Memory soon grows weak and fitful if sleep is broken, and there can be no worse habit than to get in the way of sleeping as people say "with one eye open." Both eyes ought to be completely closed and the mind allowed to betake itself to other regions of contemplation than those in which it moves during the hours of the business day.

Joseph the carpenter, attending to his daily work, might not have been known as a seer in Nazareth; had any visitors met him while he was engaged in his accustomed manual task they would have seen only an industrious workman absorbed in his employment, but after business hours when the shop was closed and Joseph had retired for the night, he was no longer carpenter but prophet. A valuable book, "The Mystery of Sleep," by Dr. John Bigelow (Harper & Bros., New York and London) is prefaced with the following quotation from Psalm 119, "I have remembered thy name, O Lord, in the night, and have observed thy law," and this passage from Iamblichus, "The night-time of the body is the daytime of the soul."

Dr. Bigelow quotes considerably from Swedenborg with whose philosophy he is greatly in accord, and we may well remember that the gifted seer and sage of Sweden declared that the spiritual world is the realm of causation, the material state being only a region of effects, and he distinctly taught that while we are asleep bodily we can be awake spiritually.

Dr. Bigelow insists that "It is not consistent with any rational notion of a Divine Providence that we should pass one third of our lives under conditions in which we could experience no spiritual growth or development, as would be the inevitable result of absolute rest." Then he continues, "Sleep does not represent or imply rest in the sense of inactivity or idleness, psychical or physical" but "the suspension of our consciousness during sleep simply interrupts our relations temporarily with the phenomenal world and shelters us from its distractions and fascinations, without which spiritual growth and development—the divine purpose of our creation—would be impossible."

The foregoing sentences are worthy of deep perusal and we particularly commend them to all those professedly religious persons who accept historically all Bible narratives concerning illumination during sleep, but reject the testimony of present-day seers to the same phenomena.

Dr. Bigelow is consistent with his religious faith and at the same time eminently scientific, when he tells us that "neither the physical nor psychical changes which we are conscious of having undergone during the hours devoted to sleep can be realized or accounted for if the activity of those faculties, respectively, were suspended" and he further states that "the involuntary subjugation of the senses periodically to sleep is one of the vital processes of spiritual regeneration, without which such regeneration would be impossible, as is evidenced by the fact that the most important events in the history of our race were initiated during sleep."

The latter is a bold statement but we believe it to be correct, and were we to devote more study than we do to the origin of great movements which have led to general enlightenment, and also to the testimonies of really influential men and women concerning their own sleep and what it has brought to them, we should revise our judgment concerning the use of this great initiator into spiritual mysteries.

One of Dr. Bigelow's strongest statements is irrefutable, for no one can deny that "all virtues favor sleep, and all vices discourage it." The further declaration that "the difference between sleep and death may be more a difference in duration than condition" receives much confirmation, alike from seers of ancient and of modern time, though it is often strictly denied by people who fail to discern that man is here and now a spiritual entity, and that deprivation of the material body implies no more than absence of a material instrument.

Dreams are certainly only experiences which we encounter while passing from one state of consciousness to another. That is why it is that, when we wake hastily, as when aroused by an alarm, we rarely remember any of our dreams distinctly, but when we awaken gradually we often remember distinctly every detail.

In seeking to cultivate what George du Maurier in "Peter Ibbettson" calls "Dreaming True" we must accustom ourselves to passing into the sleeping state contemplating serenely and assuredly some definite object with which we desire to be related during sleep, or with some friend from whom we should be glad to receive some tidings.

There are many friends who though separated physically are very near together spiritually, and though occasionally they receive some inkling of psychic association, their general feeling is that material circumstances are holding them apart. A very extreme case is that of the two leading characters in Du Maurier's fascinating story which was founded on genuine autobiography. It is not very often that a man like "Peter Ibbettson" is condemned to a life sentence of imprisonment, or that a woman like "The Duchess of Towers" remains so many years completely faithful (even in thought) to a childhood's companion under such exceptionally trying circumstances, but dramatic high lights are necessary to duly enforce the doctrine which Du Maurier has elucidated.

For well on to thirty years this man and woman held nightly communion in their charming fairy palace which fell into ruins when the good woman passed to spirit life; but though in the post-mortem state she could no longer commune with her lonely, sorrow stricken friend, as in days of yore, it was not long before means of communion were established, and spirit-communion in the fullest sense of the term became in their careers a demonstrated reality.

The revised version of the Psalms gives a much clearer idea of the original than does the old translation, which though not necessarily inaccurate is often obscure and unsatisfactory. "He giveth his beloved sleep" is a beautiful motto, but Psalm 127, from which it is taken, really says a great deal more, for it declares "he giveth unto his beloved in their sleep," distinctly teaching education during slumber.

It is often admitted that remarkable enlightenment may come during periods of ecstasy or trance, but true ecstasia or entrancement differs scarcely at all from ordinary profound repose, except, as in the case of Swedenborg and a few other exceptionally phenomenal seers, when the two states of consciousness—waking and sleeping—were enjoyed simultaneously.

Nothing can be more significant to the gospel student than the case related of Jesus soundly sleeping through a storm upon one of the Galilean lakes, while his disciples who were in the boat with him were unable to sleep because they were in dread of shipwreck.

That most unwholesome teaching, which some hysterical people have taken up with, to the effect that as we grow more spiritual we shall do without sleep, is uncanny and untruthful in the extreme, and such doctrine is always associated with a morbid fear of losing or wasting time, as though strenuous external activity were a perpetual necessity—which it decidedly is not.

People who grudge time for rest never retain their waking powers to a ripe age, and the work they accomplish betrays marks of feverish haste or painful lassitude. The more spiritually-minded we become the more tranquil are our slumbers, and no one who is a keen observer need look far afield to trace the origin of that pleasing and popular expression "they are sleeping the sleep of the just."

Wherever there is spiritual destitution there is great need of physical vigilance, therefore, sleep is dreaded as an enemy which puts us off our guard, but so soon as we have grown into a sweet consciousness of spiritual repose our bodies enjoy that calm natural slumber which is always the friend of health and the destroyer of insanity.

To employ artificial aids, such as poisonous drugs, to induce sleep is decidedly erroneous, and the visions which are conjured up during the artificial sleep induced by opium, hasheesh or any other powerful and deadening narcotic are usually unreliable.

Hypnotic treatment which induces artificial somnambulism is a subject of much criticism, and there is but one way to settle its claims intelligently, and that is by discriminating clearly between statements made by professed advocates and also by defamers of all hypnotic methods. The remarkable work accomplished by Dr. John Quackenbos of New York, has brought the word hypnotism into great dispute, largely on account of calling a process hypnotic (sleep-inducing) in cases where the intention and result were entirely in the direction of arousing a patient out of a protracted sleep which, had it continued longer, would have resulted in physical dissolution.

Dr. Quackenbos was largely reported (during February, 1906), as having restored to health by suggestive treatment a young woman who was actually dying, and was summoned back to earthly existence by the doctor's imperative call, to which she responded. This, though wrongly advertised in many papers as a case of successful hypnotism was exactly the reverse, and called forth the following explanatory comment from Miss S. C. Clark, a prominent practitioner of spiritual healing, which, she insists, is something quite distinct from hypnotism, and so it is, for while in some cases spiritual treatment induces needed sleep it never forces it, and the unpleasant feature of hypnotism has always been the idea of more or less mental coercion connected with it.

The following extract from Banner of Light, February

17, 1906, presents the case so fairly that comment upon Miss Clark's explanations would be superfluous :

"In the Banner's issue of February 10th an instance is given by Dr. John D. Quackenbos of the healing of a young woman as the result of hypnotic suggestion, under the heading 'Hypnotism Conquers Death.'

"The writer begs leave to take exception, and emphasize the fact that hypnotism, pure and simple, formed no part of the cure related. Hypnosis—as the word implies—is an artificial sleep, in which state the soul of the subject is only semi-conscious, and obeys the dictation of another and stronger will. In this instance, however, there was simply an appeal from a strong, healthy soul to the sluggish, torpid soul of the patient to arouse, to assert itself, which dormant consciousness then responded to the call and came to the front to resume the control and inspiration of its own organism. The mind awoke instead of being put to sleep, the opposite condition from hypnosis. This is spiritual healing, the power of the regnant soul made manifest, and is exercised constantly by those who do not practice hypnotism, who can 'show you a more excellent way,' those who serve gladly as willing instruments through whom divine agencies can bring a baptism of health and strength.

"A prominent professor of Harvard, himself an advocate of hypnotism, once affirmed that 'the effects of hypnotism are always superficial and temporary.' The worthy Dr. Quackenbos (perhaps unconsciously), possessed doubtless a strong healing gift, an imperative soul ; for the mind, per se, has no healing power, the efficacy of the human will is limited, but the possibilities of the enfranchised spirit, in its at-one-ment with Omnipotence, are boundless."

During natural sleep it is often possible to accomplish great good in the training of children who are often highly amenable to right suggestions when asleep, which appeal directly to their higher consciousness, which is then awake. The methods to be employed are various, but it is never necessary either to waken a sleeping child or to put a waking child to sleep, in order to give a suggestion.

When a child is naturally sleeping, you may approach the bedside and begin talking to the sleeper in a gentle but decided voice. If the child awakes continue your conversation, but do not raise your voice to any excited tone or speak in a high or aggressive key. Speak to the sleeper quietly, kindly, firmly, with assurance in every accent, and as all suggestions, to be effective, must be purely affirmational, mention only those good habits which you desire to aid the child to practice.

The inner consciousness of the sleeper receives willingly the good suggestions you kindly make, and these sink into what some modern psychologists call the "subself" or "subjective mind," and having found lodgment therein, they form a base for future outward conduct.

It cannot be denied that we often enjoy spiritual communion during the night, and it is altogether wrong to deny that when we are soundly sleeping we receive information which we often possess and utilize during our day hours, though we may not recollect when or how we received it.

The chief difficulty with those who postulate unconsciousness during sleep is that they do not realize that we may be temporarily forgetful of experiences which we have enjoyed in sleep, and though for a while unmindful of them still capable of recollecting them. Memory and recollection are not identical. We are all possessed of more memory than recollection and when people study to "improve memory" they are really seeking to gain a fuller mastery over recollection.

We all know how frequently we remember, forget, and remember again. We are all conscious of how completely certain facts have slipped our memories, often for a long time, and then quite unexpectedly these memories revive without apparently any external stimulus. These facts ought to be weighed much more carefully than they generally are, and a careful weighing of them will of necessity result in our accounting for them in one or the other of the following ways—we shall either admit that we contain a receptacle of knowledge far greater than we credit ourselves with possessing, or we shall have recourse to the theory of unseen spiritual prompters who may afford the necessary stimulus to reawaken our dormant consciousness.

A great many interesting and valuable results are obtainable while we are sleeping, and among them we should note the benefit and enlightenment we often gain while sleeping, provided that before going to sleep we have rightly disposed our minds for the reception of knowledge.

A few notable historic cases of truly celebrated individuals may serve to aid the reader in an honest endeavor to verify our main contention. Shakespeare's plays abound in allusions to sleep, and among the most striking passages we may refer to the incident of Brutus in Julius Cæsar, who cannot sleep immediately he begins to entertain the thought that Cæsar must be put to death that Rome be liberated.

Then in Henry VII we have these thrilling words describing the result of mental distress in depriving the King of sleep:

"How many thousand of my poorest subjects
Are at this hour asleep! O gentle Sleep,
Nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down
Nor steep my senses in forgetfulness?"

A prevailing misapprehension is almost universal that we can gain no good in church, at a concert, or while attending a lecture if we are sleeping. Such an error needs to be emphatically denied and all persons truly interested in the cure of nervous ailments should be the very first to protest vigorously against so nerve-wrecking a delusion.

There are many well-meaning people who would greatly enjoy attending evening functions of various kinds, were they not deterred by the fear that they might sleep during public exercises. These misguided folk need to study the literature of classic times and learn how much good sufferers were wont to receive while sleeping in consecrated temples; and as modern churches invite the public to enter for prayer, meditation and rest, church edifices may well be employed for all these uses, separately and collectively.

Working people are often sleepy in the evening but they need a change and recreation, and this cannot be obtained by remaining in the house when a strong desire is felt to go elsewhere. A new atmosphere filled with joyous and vigorous mental currents is often necessary to recuperate the weary, and after two or three hours spent in so vitalizing a surrounding the no longer tired workman or workwoman can return to home or lodging and sleep peacefully throughout the night.

We often hear people exclaim that they are too tired to sleep, and that is precisely the case, but this tiredness can often be speedily overcome in a changed and pleasant environment. Dr. Bigelow very wisely tells us that "it is not uncommon for those who have no habit or inclination to sleep during the morning hours of secular days, to be overcome with somnolency in church, soon after the devotional exercises are begun, and who find it impossible to derive any edification from them until they have lost themselves for a moment or two in absolute unconsciousness.

"Then they have no difficulty, sometimes a lively pleasure in attending to the exercises which follow. The worshiper is then withdrawn from the familiar excitement of customary avocations. It is idle to suppose that in these few moments of repose, upright in his pew, he has rested enough, in the common acceptation of that word, to repair any waste of tissue that would explain the new sense of refreshment that ensues.

"He has received in that brief retirement from the world, some reinforcements which manifestly are not dependent upon time or space for their efficacy—spiritual reinforcements only. He has removed himself, or been removed further away, out of sight or hearing or thinking, so to speak, of his phenomenal life, and nearer to the source of all life."

Strabo referring to Moses, whom he calls an Egyptian priest, speaks of his having led those who followed him out of cities to the open country because there they might more readily commune with Deity, and also speaks of a sanctuary without idols in which great blessings were conferred on those who slept within it.

The famous Greek temple dedicated to Esculapius is said to have healed multitudes who slept in it. On many instances the presiding divinity is said to have revealed to sufferers during sleep the means they should pursue in order to get free from the ailments which oppressed them. One of the most famous instances on record of remarkable enlightenment received in sleep is two thousand years old.

Cicero made the record and Macrobius discovered it after it had been supposed lost for fifteen centuries. The vision of Publius Cornelius Scipio, the second Scipio Africanus, while he was military tribune in Africa and guest of Prince Massanissa, gives striking confirmation of the illumination we may receive while we are spiritually detached from all relation with the phenomenal world in which we spend our waking consciousness.

Scipio relates that after much talk about politics and government, and especially of his illustrious ancestor the first Africanus, a deeper sleep than ordinary came over him in which his ancestor very distinctly appeared to him and told him that the preservation of the country depended entirely upon him; at the same time the younger Scipio was informed by his ancestor that many perils confronted him, but he was assured that if he were faithful in the discharge of his every obligation, a special state of blessedness awaited him after death.

Scipio declares that though terrified, not so much at the prospect of death as at the thought that trusted friends were proving treacherous, he interrogated the spirit concerning his father Paulus, and others whom he thought had died; the spirit answered him in these words "They are alive indeed, for they have escaped from the fetters of the body as from a prison."

Then Scipio enquired why, if the life beyond death was more glorious than this present existence, he should not hasten to it, but he received the faithful reply from Paulus who also appeared to him: "Not so, my son, unless that God, whose temple is all this which you behold, shall free you from this imprisonment in the body you can have no admission to this place: for men have been created under this condition, that they should keep that globe which you see in the middle of this temple, and which is called the earth.

"And a soul has been supplied to them from those supernal fires which you call constellations and stars, and which, being globular, are animated with divine spirit, and complete their cycles and revolutions with amazing rapidity. Therefore you, my Publius, and all good men must preserve your souls in the keeping of your bodies, nor without the order of that Being who bestowed them upon you, are you to depart from mundane life, lest you seem to desert the duty of a man which has been assigned to you by God."

After this exordium against suicide, much good doctrine was given by the father to the son, and as the spirits vanished, Scipio awoke from sleep. We have in this fine old testimony only one out of many striking narrations proving how distinguished men in all ages have enjoyed spiritual enlightenment while asleep, and what has occurred in days of old is occurring now also, and can and will continue to occur whenever opportunity is given for its occurrence.

CHAPTER XVIII

SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP—REASONABLE VIEWS OF MEDIUMSHIP CONTRASTED WITH POPULAR FALLACIES CONCERNING IT

MANY readers of current literature dealing with psychic questions in general must be very much confused on account of the bewilderingly divergent views expressed by different writers who attempt to deal with the intricate question of human sensitiveness by recourse to a single strained hypothesis. These discording hypotheses of different theorists are often gravely set forth as final and authoritative, in consequence whereof many superficial readers, who are easily captivated by pretentious claims, commit themselves without any first-hand investigation to whatever theory is set forth by some author whose opinions they chance to favor. Since the publication of Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena" a number of writers and lecturers have arisen who on the basis of Hudson's famous theory of "Two minds" have undertaken to explain away all spiritualistic evidences by calling upon the "subjective mind" to account for everything that could not be explained by trickery. Given a theory which admits of no limitation, and a resolute determination to explain everything by means of it, the way is at once clear for the demolition of every evidence which may be in conflict with it. Hudson has written many good things and his contribution to the literature of modern psychology is decidedly valuable, but his views on Spiritualism often border upon the absurd and they are certainly not endorsed by any truly scientific men who have conducted independent investigations. Hudson's most ridiculous conclusions, which are certainly not warranted by his original premises, are endorsed by Henry Frank and many other popular speakers who make statements with great enthusiasm in public addresses and through the press which when submitted to impartial examination are found to be so utterly one-sided as to possess very little if any, philosophic value. Suppose we now accept as true the hypothesis of a dual mind, which is by no means unreasonable, even if we use Hudson's terminology and insist upon "objective" and "subjective" as terms to be universally employed, there is still no solid ground whatever for denying spirit-communion or for speaking adversely concerning mediumship. Hudson's second popular book in his series of five, is entitled "A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life." In that volume he has endeavored to prove that the "subjective mind" is the seat of the telepathic faculty and that its chief field of functioning is in the life beyond death. Accepting this statement at its full value it can lend no support to any denial of spirit-communion for no author has vouched for the facts of telepathy more valiantly than Hudson. Granting that two "subjective minds" are so en rapport that one can communicate intelligibly with the other while both are still associated with "objective minds" prior to physical dissolution, there is no reason for supposing that the same "subjective" communion cannot continue after the "objective mind" in the case of one of the communicating parties has passed away with the demise of the physical body.

Though the word "mediumship" is placed under the ban and treated by many authors who indulge in sweeping assertions as allied with insanity and all manner of pathological and even criminal conditions, a sane consideration of its true nature and real import will enable every rational student of psychology to discriminate without much difficulty between healthy and unhealthy symptoms. We will admit that highly sensitive persons are usually of high-strung nervous temperament and if subjected to unpleasant and unwholesome surroundings they are apt to be afflicted with distempers common to their type, but such an admission only counsels to caution, it never logically leads to condemnation of mediumship in its entirety. If we can sift out the kernels of wheat from the mass of chaff and eliminate the wholesome grain from the enormous growth of tare or cockel which we find in such books as "The Great Psychological Crime," which Henry Frank pronounced authoritative (Banner of Light, Boston, January 13, 1906) we shall find that the basis of all outcry against mediumship is that it exposes the medium to control and coercion from an unseen, and often from an unknown source, and that such submission of one will to another is detrimental to health and character. That there is some degree of reason in such a statement no reasonable person will deny, but we are prepared to entirely refute the insinuation that mediumship is necessarily anything other than a voluntary sensitiveness enabling two or more friends to enjoy communion with each other. Accepting the phenomena of telepathy as legitimate, and neither Hudson nor his followers ever seem to condemn it, it logically follows that simple mediumship involves no more than the practice of telepathy extended into the post-mortem state which, if Hudson's theory be correct, is only the survival of a function of the "subjective mind" which is always involved in every telepathic transaction. It seems impossible for some people to get anything like a clear idea of what the so-called "next" or "future" state of man can be, and because a crude theory is invented, which has no foundation in fact or reason, that some marvelous and inconceivable change occurs at the instant of physical transition, we are either told that it is extremely dangerous or positively wrong to commune with our friends who have left their earthly bodies or else that it is impossible for us to do so. Neither F. W. H. Myers in his monumental work "Human Personality, its Survival of Bodily Death," Minot J. Savage in his "Life Beyond Death" and "Can Telepathy Explain?" or Professor Hyslop in his "Science and a Future Life" have fallen into any such error, and we advise a careful perusal of the books mentioned on the part of all who desire to read the sober utterances of unprejudiced men of high intellectual ability who have not allowed prejudice to warp their judgment. That a word of caution should be given to excitable and unreflecting dabblers in psychic experimentation we fully admit, but words of caution need to be cautiously uttered and they must be voiced without prejudice if they are to prove salutary. Mediumship intelligently viewed presents two distant phases or aspects which are, in a sense, diametrically opposed, and we suppose it must be with only one of these that opponents of mediumship are acquainted. The objectionable or undesirable aspect of the question borders upon what Dr. J. M. Peebles and many other influential Spiritualists designate "obsession," which means that one mind is so far under the dominion of another, and that other a very crude or distorted one, that individual mental liberty is impossible until the "obsessing" influence has been removed. Miscellaneous public circles, in which people gather with all sorts of mixed motives and all varieties of moral, mental, and physical conditions, are sources of grave danger to highly sensitive people who are of weak and yielding disposition and have not developed around them a protective aura. We can also conscientiously inveigh against all attempts to exercise any psychic gift or faculty for any other than a noble purpose, and were condemnations of mediumship or mediumistic practices directed solely against pernicious customs we should heartily endorse even an anathema directed against perversions. But we must not permit ourselves to confound the innocent with the vicious, or the helpful with the harmful, though that is exactly what is done by sensational declaimers against mediumship at large. Very much good is often accomplished through clairvoyance and very much more good by means of clairsentience, and oftentimes a spirit-message conveyed through an entranced medium brings comfort to the sorrow-stricken and needed instruction to the perplexed. Home circles properly conducted in a pure atmosphere and where aspirations are noble are productive of excellent results, and it is abundantly shown that mediumship exercised in such surroundings conduces to enlarged health and increased mental and ethical development. The claim has been made that Indian spirits always manifest themselves during early stages of mediumistic development and that this is an evidence that the "subjective mind" is remanifesting some ancestral states, the remains of which are contained with it, and it is further said that this proves retrogression or reversion to some primitive condition. In reply to that stupid and almost foundationless allegation we have but to call attention to the fact that nowhere except in America do Indian spirits usually manifest, unless some American medium travels to another country and introduces her unseen escorts to a foreign audience, and further let it be remembered that a very large percentage of people of American birth are not descended from North American Indians any more than are natives of European countries who rarely, if ever, unearth Indian spirits from their subconsciousness during incipient stages of mediumistic development. Whence then the proof of Atavism? The real distinction which should always be emphasized between a sort of sensitiveness which may be a kind of relic of the past, and a totally different variety which foreglimmers a higher condition for the future, is that the former is always involuntary or sub-volitional, though not invariably harmful, while the latter is always voluntary or volitional. Sensitiveness needs to be regulated and controlled, we should never permit ourselves to be governed by it. It is high time that intelligent Spiritualists take a firm stand on this question, and in view of the immense amount of controversy still waging around the pros and cons of mediumships it ought to be feasible to publish some moderately tempered manual setting forth what is and what is not desirable along the path of mediumship and its development. It seems difficult to reach a happy middle path between two extremes, as most people are influenced by emotion rather than by logic, the work however needs to be done and we must bring to the task of doing it no other spirit than that of utterly impartial open-mindedness. Wherever we witness signs of disease and degeneracy accompanying the exercise of mediumship we should search fearlessly for the cause, but not blindly fling a sweeping accusation against mediumship in its simplicity or entirety because certain aberrant accompaniments are sometimes found attending it.

Had we, as a people at large, less disposition to yield to fashions and submit to customs and conventionalities, no matter how foolish or harmful such may be, we should soon behold a soul-cheering diminution of those abnormalities which do indeed sometimes accompany mediumship, but are in no true sense its legitimate or necessary offspring. Control or coercion may well be warned against, but willing susceptibility to communion with spirit friends and helpers is no sign of degeneracy and constitutes no step in the direction of insanity. Though notes of reasonable warning need often to be raised, warnings must be directed against abuses only; they are senseless and must ever miss their mark when they take the form of wholesale denunciation. Mediumship is good, only its abuse is evil. To the impartial student of the literature of modern Spiritualism, which began to accumulate almost immediately the "Rochester Knockings" created a world-wide sensation in 1845, it must appear that never in any previous period of this planet's history has there been fuller evidence established than was collected and authenticated during the nineteenth century to convince, even the most sceptical among enquirers, that physical dissolution is not the end of our conscious individuality.

CHAPTER XIX

THE SPIRIT WORLD—AS SEEN AND DESCRIBED BY ONE WHO HAS VISITED IT FREQUENTLY

CHARLES W. LEADBEATER serves a highly valuable purpose as a teacher and illustrator of spiritual philosophy, finding much in common between Spiritualism and Theosophy when both are rightly understood. We have introduced this record of wonderful clairvoyance between chapters devoted to our own statements on these and similar great questions to give to our readers independent testimony which agrees very substantially with the views of the author based on closely similar experiences.

The following truly remarkable statements are taken (slightly condensed) from articles published in Chicago during February, 1906, first in the Tribune, then in the Progressive Thinker. We take particular pleasure in presenting these extracts to our readers because they serve to vividly illustrate the kind of visions of the spirit world which modern seers are frequently beholding.

"In my visions and dreams the bright jasper walls I can see," sang the poet of "The Home of the Soul." But C. W. Leadbeater, in full waking consciousness, sees all that eye hath not seen or ear hath heard on earth of the glories of the heaven world. He has seen and known the seventh heaven. And what he has done he says all can do.

It is only our lack of development, affirms Mr. Leadbeater, only the limitation imposed upon us by this robe of flesh, that prevents us from fully realizing that all the glory of the highest heaven is about us here and now, and that influences flowing from that world are ever playing upon us if we only will understand and receive them. "Do not complain and cry," said a great teacher of old, "but open your eyes and see. The light is all about you, if you would only cast the bandage from your eyes and look. It is so wonderful, so beautiful, so far beyond what any man has dreamed of or prayed for, and it is forever and forever."

Mr. Leadbeater, as a trained Occultist, has cultivated his higher senses, his occult faculties, whereby are visible to him the heavenly spiritual regions which are shut out to carnal eyes. These heavenly regions are worlds of subtler substance than the physical world, interpenetrating it, and therefore all about us. Heaven is the world of thought, the mental plane, as Occultists term it, supremely a state of consciousness, the "kingdom of heaven" being "within you." The astral plane is the world of feeling; the physical plane, the familiar earth of the senses, is the world of action. The body of action is the physical body, the body of emotion is the astral body, the body of thought is the mental body. The immortal soul, which lives forever, in the heaven world, communicates with the physical world by means of physical impacts transmitted to the physical brain, thence to the astral, and thence to the mental body. The soul is the immortal thinker and ego.

Scientific Occultism trains the faculties of the higher bodies which enable us to see these heavenly regions lying all about us. It was thus that Mr. Leadbeater learned to journey up through the seven heavens. A radiant sense not only of the welcome absence of all evil and discord but of the insistent, overwhelming presence of universal joy is the first and most striking sensation experienced by him who enters upon the heavenly world, reports the visitor. And it never leaves him so long as he remains there, and the man who has once experienced it in full consciousness will regard the world with widely different eyes forever after.

Let a man imagine himself with these feelings of intense bliss and enormously increased power floating in a sea of living light, surrounded by every conceivable variety of loveliness in color and form—the whole changing with every wave of thought that he sends out from the mind, and being as he presently discovers, only the expression of his thought in the matter of the plane and in its elemental essence. For that matter is of the same order as that of which the mind-body itself is composed, and therefore when that vibration of the particles of the mind-body which we call a thought occurs, it extends itself immediately to this surrounding mental matter and sets up corresponding vibrations in it, while in the elemental essence it images itself with absolute exactitude. Concrete thought naturally takes the shape of its objects, while abstract ideas usually represent themselves by all kinds of perfect and geometrical forms.

If the visitor wishes to observe the plane upon which he finds himself it will be necessary for him carefully to suspend his thought for the time, so that its creations may not influence the readily impressible matter around him and thus alter the entire conditions so far as he is concerned. He begins to realize that all this magnificence is not a mere idle or fortuitous display; he finds that it all has a meaning; a meaning which he himself can understand; and presently he grasps the fact that what he is watching with such ecstasy of delight is simply the glorious color language of the angels—the expression of the thought or the conversation of beings far higher than himself in the scale of evolution.

By experiment and practice he discovers that he also can use this new and beautiful mode of expression, and by this discovery he enters into possession of another great tract of his heritage in this celestial realm—the power to hold converse with and to learn from its loftier inhabitants.

If the visitor wishes to carry his analysis of the plane still further and discover what it would be when entirely undisturbed by the thought or conversation of any of its inhabitants, he can do so by forming round himself a huge shell, through which none of these influences can penetrate, and then, holding his own mind perfectly still, examining the conditions which exist inside his shell. He is now able to perceive another and entirely different series of regular pulsations.

These evidently are universal. They cause no change of color, no assumption of form, but flow with resistless regularity through all the matter of the plane, outward and in again, like the exhalations and inhalations of some great breath beyond our ken.

There are several sets of these, clearly distinguishable from one another by volume, by period of vibration, and by the tone of harmony which they bring, and grander than them all sweeps one great wave which seems the heart-beat of the system, a wave which, welling up from unknown centres on far higher planes, pours out its life through all our world, and then draws back in its tremendous tide to that from which it came. In one long, undulating curve it comes, and the sound of it is like the murmur of the sea; and yet in it and through it all the while there echoes a mighty ringing chant of triumph, the music of the spheres. The man who once has heard that glorious song of nature never quite loses it again; even here on this dreary physical plane of illusion he hears it always as a kind of undertone, keeping ever before his mind the strength and light and splendor of the real life above.

The sense itself by which he is able to cognize all this is not the least of the marvels of this celestial world; no longer does he hear and see and feel by separate and limited organs, as he does down here; instead of these he feels within him a new, strange power, which is not any of them and yet includes them all and much more—a power which enables him the moment any person or thing comes before him not only to see it and feel it and hear it but to know all about it instantly inside and out, its causes, its effects, and its possibilities. He finds that for him to think is to realize; there is never any doubt, hesitation, or delay about this direct action of the higher sense. If he thinks of a place, he is there; if of a friend, that friend is before him. Every thought and feeling of his friend lies open as a book before him. All knowledge is his for the searching —all that does not transcend even this lofty plane; the past of the world is as open to him as the present; the indelible records of the memory of nature are ever at his disposal, and history, whether ancient or modern, unfolds itself before his eyes at will.

Not only can he review at leisure all history with which we are acquainted, correcting, as he examines it, the many errors and misconceptions which have crept into the accounts handed down to us; he also can range at will over the whole story of the world from its beginning, watching the slow development of intellect. Nor is his study confined to the progress of humanity alone; he has before him as in a museum all the strange animal and vegetable forms which occupied the stage in days when the world was young; he can follow all the geological changes which have taken place, and watch the course of the great cataclysms which have altered the face of the earth again and again.

The lowest heaven has for its principal characteristic, affection for family or friends, unselfish but usually somewhat narrow. One of the first persons Mr. Leadbeater encountered in heaven was a mother who had died about twenty years ago and left behind her two sons, to whom she was deeply attached. Naturally they were the most prominent figures in her heaven, and quite naturally, too, she thought of them as she had left them. The love which she thus poured out ceaselessly upon these mental images was thus really acting as a beneficent force showered down upon the grown up men in this physical world.

Along these lines only is conscious communication possible between those still imprisoned in the physical body and those who have passed into this celestial realm. A soul may be shining out gloriously through his image in a friend's heaven life, and yet in his manifestations through the physical body on earth that friend may be entirely unconscious of all this, and so may suppose himself unable to communicate with his departed friend. But if that soul has evolved consciousness to the point of unification and can therefore use his full powers while still in the physical body, he can then realize even during this dull earthly life that he still stands face to face with his friend as of yore, that death has not removed the man he loved, but only opened his eyes to the grander, wider life which ever lies around us all. In appearance the friend would seem much as he did in earth life, yet somehow strangely glorified. There is a reproduction of the physical body.

The dominant characteristic of the second heaven may be said to be anthropomorphic religious devotion. This phase of devotion which consists essentially in the perpetual adoration of a personal deity must be carefully distinguished from those higher forms which find their expression in performing some definite work for the deity's sake. Some of the most characteristic examples of this plane are to be found among women, who indeed form a large majority of its inhabitants. A quaint and pretty example of the heaven life of a child, aged seven, showed him occupied in reënacting in the heaven world the religious stories which his Irish nurse had told him down here, and, best of all, he loved to think of himself as playing with the infant Jesus, helping him to make those clay sparrows which the power of the Christ-child is fabled to have brought to life and caused to fly.

The chief characteristic of the third heaven may be defined as devotion, expressing itself in active work. The Christian on this plane, for example, instead of merely adoring his Saviour, would think of himself as going out into the world to work for him. It is especially the plane for the working out of great schemes and designs unrealized on earth—of great organizations inspired by religious devotion and usually having for their purpose some philanthropic object. On this plane the higher type of sincere and devoted missionary activity finds expression.

The fourth heaven is arranged into four main divisions —unselfish pursuit of spiritual knowledge; high philosophic or scientific thought; literary or artistic ability exercised for unselfish purposes, and service for the sake of service. We find here many of those noble and unselfish thinkers who seek insight and knowledge only for the purpose of enlightening and helping their fellows.

Here we find all our greatest musicians; Mozart, Beethoven, Bach, Wagner, and many others are still flooding the heaven world with harmony far more glorious even than the grandest which they were able to produce when on earth. It seems as if a great stream of divine music poured into them from higher regions and was specialized by them and made their own to be sent forth through all the planes in a great tide of melody which adds to the bliss of all around.

Those who are functioning in full consciousness in the heaven world will clearly hear and fully appreciate this magnificent outpouring.

Here also was one of earth's failures—for the tragedies of earth-life leave strange marks even in heavenly places. In the world where all thoughts of loved ones smile upon man as friends he was thinking of writing a great book and for the sake of it had refused to use his literary power in making mere sustenance from paltry hack work; but none would look at his book, and he walked the streets despairing, till sorrow and starvation closed his eyes to earth. He had been lonely all his life—in his youth friendless and shut out from family ties, and in his manhood unable to work only in his own way, pushing aside hands that would have led him to a wider view of life's possibilities than the earthly paradise he longed to make for all. Now, as he thought and wrote, though there were none whom he had loved as personal or ideal helpers who could make part of this, his mental life, he saw stretching before him the Utopia of which he had dreamed, for which he had tried to live, and the vast thronging impersonal multitudes whom he had longed to serve; and the joy of their joy surged back on him and made his solitude a heaven. When he is born again on earth he surely will return with power to achieve as well as to plan, and this celestial vision will be partially bodied forth in happier terrene lives.

Is it contended that in heaven we make our own surroundings and for that reason see only a part of heaven? Surely down here also the world of which a person is sensible is never the whole of the outer world but only so much of it as his senses, intellect, education, enable him to take in. What does he know as a rule even of the more recondite physical facts which surround him and meet him at every step he takes? The truth is that here as in heaven life he lives in a world which is largely of his own creation. He does not realize it either there or here, but that is only because of his ignorance, because he knows no better.

Is it said that in the heaven world a man takes his thoughts for real things? He is quite right; they are real things and on the thought plane, nothing but thought can be real. There we recognize that great fact; here we do not; on which plane, then, is the delusion the greater? Those thoughts of his are indeed realities, and are capable of producing the most striking results upon living men—results which can never be other than beneficial because upon that high plane there can be none but loving thought. Thus it will be seen that the theory that the heaven life is an illusion is merely the result of a misconception and shows imperfect acquaintance with its conditions and possibilities; the truth is that the higher we rise the nearer we draw to the one reality.

The fifth heaven is the true home of the soul and by far the most populous of all the heavens. Here are present almost all the 60,000,000,000 souls who are said to be engaged in the present human evolution—all, in fact, except the comparatively small number who, by their purity and knowledge, are able to pass into higher heavens. It is the true home of the souls of nearly all mankind, and here lives the soul while the lower mind and body dwell in the coarser physical and astral worlds.

Souls connected with a physical body are distinguishable from those enjoying the disembodied state by a difference in the vibrations set up on the surface of the globes; it is therefore easy on this plane to see at a glance whether an individual is or is not in incarnation at the time. The immense majority, whether in or out of the body, are but dreamily semi-conscious; those who are fully awake are radiant exceptions standing out amid the less brilliant crowds like stars of the first magnitude, and between these and the least developed are ranged every variety of size and beauty of color, each representing the exact stage of evolution at which he has arrived.

Passing from the fifth to the sixth heaven is like going from a great city to a peaceful countryside; for at the present stage of evolution only a small minority of individuals have risen to this loftier level, where even the least advanced is definitely self-conscious and also conscious of his surroundings. The soul on this level is aware of the purpose and method of evolution; he knows that he is engaged in a work of self-development, and recognizes the stages of physical and post-mortem life through which he passes in his lower vehicles. The personality with which he is connected is seen as a part of himself, and he endeavors to guide it, using his knowledge of the past as a storehouse of experience from which he formulates principles of conduct, clear and immutable convictions of right and wrong. These he sends down into his lower mind, superintending and guiding its activities.

The seventh heaven, the most glorious level of the mental world, has but few denizens as yet from our humanity, for on its heights dwell none but "Masters of Compassion and Wisdom" and their initiated pupils. Of the beauty of form and color and sound no words can speak, for mortal language has no terms in which these radiant splendors may find expression. Enough that they are, and that some of our race are wearing them, the earnest of what others shall be, the fruition of which the seed was sown on lowlier planes.

From this highest heaven come down most of the influences poured out by the Masters of Compassion as they work for the evolution of the human race, acting directly on the souls of men, shedding on them inspiring influences and energies which stimulate spiritual growth, which enlighten the intellect, and purify the emotions. Hence genius receives its illuminations; here all upward efforts find their guidance.

As the sun's rays fall everywhere from one centre and each body that receives them uses them after its nature, so from the Elder Brothers of the race fall on souls the light and life which it is their function to dispense, and each uses as much as it can assimilate and thereby grows and evolves. Thus, as everywhere else, the highest glory of the heavenly world is found in the glory of service. They who have accomplished their mental evolution are fountains from which flow strength for those who are still climbing.

TELEPATHY AND CLAIRVOYANCE

THERE are few thinkers and still fewer experimentalists in the field of psychical research who are ready to draw a hard and fast line between one phase of psychical phenomena and another, for so closely interblended are various phases of psychical activity that it seems practically impossible to separate them, so persistently coexistent even through distinct are they. As Telepathy means feeling at a distance, and Clairvoyance means clear sight, we may not incorrectly add that one of the principal meanings of Clairvoyance is seeing at a distance, a distance so much greater than ordinary as to make its range of vision appear decidedly peculiar. In cases of simple Telepathy the general inference is that a message is distinctly conveyed from one place to another, and from one person to another, by some far subtler agent than is recognized in the ordinary affairs of common life. When the factor of Clairvoyance enters, the phenomena becomes complicated, demands further investigation and presents a far more intricate problem for solution. It is sufficiently marvelous for most people to be told that a person, a thousand or more miles distant, can transmit his thought accurately, causing you to understand his meaning as though he were actually by your side physically and conversing with you face to face, but as in the case of our own experiences, with Lady Caithness and others, vision as well as feeling, and mental perception have to be taken into account. Though such experiences have been designated telepathic, they include additional evidence in support of Clairvoyance. G. F. C. Grumbine in his book entitled "Clairvoyance," includes under that single heading almost all that we are accustomed to refer to as illumination, insight, intuition, etc. The use of the word "Clairvoyance" in so broad a sense is probably no violation of etymology, as clear vision is certainly the bulwark of every seer or seeress, and those titles were continually applied to prophets and prophetesses in days of old, as the Bible abundantly testifies. The chief difficulty encountered in any endeavor to demonstrate telepathic communion is the obtuseness of many people to psychic impressions when the limitation is not found on the side of the would-be transmitter of information psychically. Concentration of thought and of gaze are very closely allied; the former is the great essential to success in Telepathy, the latter is equally necessary for the culture of Clairvoyance.

The successful telepathist is one who can and does definitely fix his mind on one object to the exclusion of all others; he has acquired the excellent all-important habit of thinking of just one thing at a time, never permitting two thoughts to become entangled. The seer or clairvoyant is one who as resolutely gazes upon one thing at a time, never allowing his vision to be confused, or his attention distracted, no matter how great the provocation or temptation to eye-wandering may be. Though there certainly are authentic instances on record of children whose Clairvoyance has been wonderful, though they have undergone no training whatever, these little ones seem not to be subject to the need of those mental exercises which the majority of adults find necessary, first to get them out of bad habits and then to get them into good ones. In the case of the remarkable children we refer to, there are no obstacles to be overcome and they are by nature of a quiet contemplative turn of mind or else so extremely alert that we may safely decide that their extremely transparent mental organization furnishes exactly the instrument needed for demonstrating to less enlightened people the reality of a spiritual universe. Grown people are for the most part anxious and fussy, and to the extent that they have allowed themselves to become apprehensive or careworn they have unconsciously built a wall or barrier around them psychically, so that they have become opaque or obtuse instead of transparent or diaphanous as to their auric envelope. Theosophists dwell much upon auras and a consideration of what affects the human aura is always an important study. The aura of a human being resembles closely the atmosphere of a planet. No less an astronomer than Dorman Steele undertook to suggest an interpretation of the first chapter of Genesis based on astronomical considerations, tending to the thought that the work of the fourth creative day—viewed from the terrestrial or geocentric standpoint, from which the author of the Pentateuch was viewing the universe—had no reference to the creation of the sun or the starry hosts, but only to the clearing of the earth's atmosphere to such an extent that during the fourth great geologic period the sun's rays began to penetrate and dissipate the dense fogs and vapors which had long encircled this planet, and thus the star-bespangled firmament became visible from an earthly viewpoint. Whether any of us are interested or not in the essentially historical question raised by the foregoing opinion on a much disputed document, the illustration serves remarkably well to enforce a true and reasonable view of how the clairvoyant faculty can be developed or, we may say, how it often presents itself as already actively existent.

The auric belt or zone which surrounds an individual is dense or bright in proportion to the mental clearness or fogginess of the one who generates the aura. People who live mentally in the cellars of their nature, never rising in thought above the contemplation of material foibles may develop a very crude sort of clairvoyance, scarcely worthy of so dignified a name, but the higher and distinctly ennobling aspects of the faculty are entirely beyond them, beyond their experience because far above their interest. Clairvoyance is by no means an unmixed blessing though it is capable of being so used as to prove always and only an advantage to its possessor and to all who are privileged to share in its revelations. The wise prophets of ancient Israel, who were themselves seers of the highest rank, knew enough of Chaldean and Babylonian psychism to be able to warn the people to whom they preached against a misdirected agent, which because of misdirection occasioned untold and inestimable misery.

Narrow, prejudiced commentators are very apt to exercise no discrimination whatever when expounding the letter of biblical text, but thoughtful unbiased students never fall into the error of supposing that invectives hurled against witchcraft and necromancy had any reference to simple and profitable Clairvoyance. Every great and accepted prophet has been renowned as a clairvoyant, but when unscrupulous people desecrated a noble faculty, not only for money, but to serve the ends of malice, there arose an outcry against the very gift itself which had been thus prostituted. It was nothing but shameless sensuality, often of the most revolting types, which drove many well-meaning teachers to proclaim asceticism as the highest good; in like manner abuse of psychic endowments has led to a blind, ignorant terror-stricken denunciation of those noble and beneficent psychic endowments which have ever characterized by their high presence the greatest moral teachers of our race.

Sir Wm. Crookes, one of England's most illustrious scientific men, has on several occasions given publicity to his theory of brain-waves and to a kindred conception of an ether-substance, along which intelligence can be transmitted at an almost incalculable rate of speed to practically interminable distances. The sensitive man or animal who can feel the quivering or vibrating of this ether is "mediumistic" to an unusual extent in the estimation of investigators in the psychic field who are not personally so susceptible to impressions.

Animal worship as indulged in by the ancient Egyptians and many other historic peoples is largely to be explained on the basis of their great admiration for psychic demonstrations and their wish to unfold psychically themselves. Witnessing the extraordinary sensitiveness of dogs, cats and other familiar animals they supposed these creatures to be in close and favored communion with divinities with whom they hoped to curry favor by showing honor to the animals who were the recipients of their singular esteem. It is well worth any student's while to read such portions of the Egyptian Book of the Dead as have been translated into English for the sake of understanding the probable origin and certain animus of several peculiar religious cults which are attracting great attention now that the world seems on the lookout for a new religion, and while searching for an acceptable one is devoting much time and thought to a reëxamination of the oldest as well as the youngest which can be offered for contemplation. A study of animal life is always entertaining and instructive, and as in some directions certain animals excel us in our present stage of development, we should not be too proud to observe our four-footed companions with a view to learning all they are able to suggest to us. It is noticeable everywhere that those animals which display the most remarkable sagacity, evince ability to discover lost children, and render other services of priceless value, are very thorough in all they undertake and enter into whatever they do with zest and earnestness. They take a great interest in life; they are thoroughly on the alert when anything is going on which in any way interests them, and at the same time they are fond of periodic ease and can be just as lazy when they are resting as they are active when engaged in some pursuit. An excellent rule for everybody is: Do whatever you do with all your heart; throw yourself unreservedly into all your undertakings one after the other; make yourselves completely at home, wherever you may be at present. When you eat enjoy your food thoroughly, cultivate a due appreciation of the pleasures of the table, give the organ of alimentiveness an opportunity to expand normally; then when a meal is over go to your business or study, whatever that may be, and throw your whole energy and interest into the work in which you are then engaging. When you retire for the night, give yourself up wholly to sleep; appreciate the boon of slumber, never permit yourself to think contemptuously of repose or wish it were unnecessary. Such brief, concise directions as the foregoing must be mastered and lived up to before any one is found ready to normally or healthfully pursue the path of psychical ascension into the upper realms where Clairvoyance is as normal as our ordinary lesser sight, common to every-day people, is normal on its lower plane of expression. Saul was sent to seek his father's asses which had strayed; Samuel set Saul's mind at rest, through Clairvoyance, concerning the asses and then immediately proceeded to unfold matters of immeasurably higher moment than the whereabouts of a few donkeys. Clairvoyance includes the lower as it rises to embrace the higher. It is doubtful whether public professional clairvoyants are generally accurate in their visions, not because they are other than honest men and women, but by reason of the impossibility of complying with necessary conditions in the surroundings in which most of them live and work. There may be a few people in every community who have arrived so near to the stage of adepts that they can afford to snap their fingers at such conditions as most sensitives find necessary for the exercise of their gift, and should we encounter one of these exceptionally developed people we should no doubt be greatly astonished at the revelation made to us in a surrounding apparently incompatible with the exercise of lucidity. When, however, the clairvoyant is only a tyro it is highly essential that the mental as well as the physical atmosphere during a "sitting" should be held as quiet as possible. Mental pictures are often projected on the screen of ether which we ordinarily speak of simply as the air of the room. The atmosphere is like the screen at a stereopticon exhibition and must be held steady if the pictures displayed upon it are to appear with sufficient distinctness to make the exhibition a success. Crystal-gazing, or even looking quietly into a glass of clear water, is an introductory help to many embryo sensitives. Any practice, indeed, which serves to induce comfortable passivity of mind and body is favorable to the display of Clairvoyance, but by passivity we do not mean what a great many people suppose is intended by that much abused word. Activity of desire and expectancy must precede passivity in action. There must be an end or object in view or there is little reason in the attitude of the clairvoyant. It is not usually very profitable to simply sit gazing into vacancy, ready to see anything which may present itself in a crystal; there should certainly be some definite end in view or object to be gained if the exercise is likely to prove profitable in any determinable direction. There are a great many things we wish to know which transcend the scope of material discovery, and if our quest for this additional knowledge is legitimate it is perfectly reasonable to believe that we are endowed with some means or faculty whereby we can make these discoveries. Once let the idea of Clairvoyance be brought down from the clouds of mysticism in which it has so long dwelt and psychical investigation will be so far simplified and rationalized that the exercise of Clairvoyance will be as natural and regular as the employment of physical eyesight. Cleared or clarified vision is necessarily extended vision and the thought of extension applies quite as much to insight as to farsight or foresight. Science is now rapidly demonstrating the presence of myriads of objects unseen by the average eye yet capable of being discerned with the aid of a microscope and often photographed without the employment of other or more delicate apparatus than that in constant use among photographers. If a clairvoyant says, "I see a form or object beside you which you do not see because you are not equal to discerning it," there is nothing more wonderful in that augmented vision of the human seer than in the proof afforded by photography or microscopy of the presence of the same objects. The present age is happily one in which man is coming to believe in himself as well as in something external to himself and in consequence of this ever enlarging view of man universally the old glamour of supernaturalism is waning, while a lawful recognition of psychic phenomena is gaining ground continually. Culture of the psychic faculty is not so difficult, neither is it so very easy, as some suppose. It requires persistent attention rather than laborious effort just as the close attention we pay to anything often rewards us far more than toilsome attempts to force ourselves to acquire knowledge. Night and darkness have been frequently associated with Clairvoyance, because night and shade do not afford opportunity or invitation to excessive physical exercise and we cannot as a rule do two things well at once. One by one our tasks must be fulfilled; one by one our occupations must be dealt with, and as it seems impossible to be awake and asleep at the same instant, so does it seem almost incredible that we can be seriously occupied with material cares and at the same time keenly alive to what lies beyond external ken. Another consideration of the means whereby Clairvoyance can be developed, occurs to us as we call to mind a narrative concerning some good people on the Pacific coast to whom the Klondike excitement brought spiritual development.

A happily married couple who had long been interested in psychical matters, but had registered no personal evidence of their own susceptibility to unseen influences, were for several months completely separated in body as the husband went to Alaska and the wife remained in Seattle with her mother. When the man had reached the gold fields he could not communicate with his wife in any material way as neither telegraph, telephone nor post-office was available, and though he had no cause to be anxious on her account, as she was a healthy woman living at home in a comfortable house among friends, she was greatly concerned for his welfare as many alarming accounts of the dangers and sufferings of miners in a district near where she believed her husband to be working had reached her ears. Determined to put to a practical test the statement often made to her by "sensitives" of her acquaintance, that she was an excellent clairvoyant potentially though actually she had never cultivated her endowment, she resolved upon devoting some time late every evening just before retiring for the night to the liberation of her psychic faculty. For three or four nights she sat quietly in an easy chair in her sleeping room for over an hour but received no evidence of seership. However before a week was over she felt herself capable of discerning the dim outlines of a mining camp, and shortly the form of her husband distinctly appeared to her. Describing her experiences to friends (she was always willing to relate them), she declared many times in the most positive terms that she had no sensation at all akin to traveling in an "astral body" or of being transported through space; on the contrary she felt thoroughly at home in her own organism, but her vision pierced all intervening space and

Alaska was as near as an adjoining dressing-room. When her husband returned well and strong and with a larger pile of treasure than many miners brought with them, he was, to use his own words, "literally dumbfounded" with the contents of his wife's diary which she had kept faithfully and which contained minute records of his own experiences in Alaska while she was in Seattle, and the most satisfying and at the same time amazing portions of her entries were thoughts of his which had clearly amounted to perfect mental messages.

After closely inspecting the diary and noting the dates of the different entries he discovered that whenever he had particularly wished to communicate some piece of information to his wife to ease her mind concerning his health and safety she had received a specially clear and strong picture of himself and of his whereabouts, while at other times when he had been thinking less intently of his home and its inmates her sight of him and his surroundings had been far less distinct. Evidences are everywhere multiplying which go far to prove that even so wildly romantic a tale as George du Maurier's "Peter Ibbettson" may have been built on actual fact, for it does occur that when two people are devotedly attached to each other and circumstances hold their bodies rigidly apart, the soul-sense we may well call Clairvoyance, in company with a train of kindred senses beyond our common ken, assert themselves right vigorously and afford a present day explanation of the telling words of Lovelace, "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage."

We are now on the very verge of Spiritualism proper and we have only to say that though a mass of error has been mixed up with its history during the past half century and more, there is so much of truth in it as a demonstrable philosophy that through the steady and rapid advance of scientific study of all psychic problems now in progress, there are arising new and noble phases of mediumship convincing the inquiring multitude that physical dissolution is in no sense death in the old blind barbaric meaning attached to that ancient word. We are here and now spiritual beings and we remain such hereafter. "Death hath no power to part the fond, they are together still," is a perfectly true statement, and equally true is it that no possible terrestrial barriers can separate effectually those who are truly linked in the bonds of sincere affection, and are therefore united one to the other in spiritual ways, which earthly changes can never have power to rupture. There are other aspects of clairvoyance apart from those we have been touching upon, which are less easily dealt with, because they are often mistaken for something they certainly are not. We allude to the sight of what are often termed "astral pictures" which inexperienced sensitives cannot very readily explain, but which deeper students of clairvoyance find no difficulty in accounting for. Nothing can be more unreasonable and unkind than stamping with the brand of falsehood visions which we have not yet learned to interpret scientifically. Clairvoyants often claim to know nothing of the real nature of what they see, consequently they are not justly chargeable with even making mistakes if they describe scenes which seem to us incongruous and which we may misinterpret in our present ignorance of what such visions truly signify. We are often greatly pleased with descriptions of absent or departed friends which strike us at first as extremely accurate, but when we look more deeply into the question, we are beset with grave difficulties. A good clairvoyant once gave exactly the following description of a departed brother to a gentleman in London who was then beginning to seriously investigate the claims of Spiritualism: "I see a young man with you; he is very much attached to you, and is constantly with you; he appears about twenty-eight years of age, certainly not over thirty; he is dressed in a gray tweed suit with a blue cravat; his hair is light brown, rather thin and parted in the middle; he has a moustache but no beard or whiskers." The gentleman in question went to another clairvoyant in another part of London two or three days later, and received an almost identical description which he declares answers exactly to the appearance of his younger brother who passed away quite suddenly while on a summer tour in Norway rather less than two years previously. The facts in the case are, that these two young men were greatly attached to each other and that the survivor keeps in his room on the mantelpiece a picture of his departed brother very differently dressed, so that had either clairvoyant seen the photograph she would have described a black suit and a white necktie. When the surviving brother last saw the one who has passed over, that young man was attired exactly as the two clairvoyants have described, but no material portrait has been taken of him in that dress. Now comes in the investigator's difficulty. Do we on passing into spirit life (he inquires) permanently retain the exact appearance, even to details of apparel, which we presented just before leaving the mortal frame, and if not why are we told that our friends present just such appearances? There are but two rational answers to this most natural question, and they are as follows: 1. Many clairvoyants see into our surrounding aura and behold imprinted thereon the pictures of events and circumstances which have greatly impressed us and which we carry about with us quite unknowingly, it may be, as a relatively permanent portion of the contents of our psychic picture gallery. 2. Our friends in spirit-life when seeking to make known to us the reality of their continued interest in us and in our welfare, often show themselves to clairvoyant vision in a manner most sure to strike us with a conviction of their identity. In the former instance we are very unlikely to receive any definite information and are apt to feel perplexed and saddened because, though our friends are thus accurately described as being with us, we never seem to derive a glimmer of intelligence as to their condition or to enjoy any comforting assurance that they are truly in communion with us. In the latter instance we invariably either receive some characteristic message, or we feel in some subtle spiritual way that we are truly in communion with one whom we love and by whom we are loved. All phases of psychic phenomena are now being considered both critically and sympathetically by large numbers of intelligent people to an extent utterly unprecedented in comparatively recent times, and as it is always desirable to be cautious ere we admit too much, though we should be ever ready to accept the logic of evidence from whatever direction it may come without the slightest prejudice, we feel properly thankful for all attempted definitions of so wonderful and far-reaching a faculty as clairvoyance which help in any way to afford a basis for a rational interpretation of its true nature. The public is indebted to that fascinating author, C. W. Leadbeater, for the following summarization of Clairvoyance which we quote from his very popular work, "Man Visible and Invisible," the sub-title of which is "Examples of Different Types of Men as Seen by Means of Trained Clairvoyance." Chapter three, entitled "Clairvoyant Sight," ends with these words,—"The clairvoyant is simply a man who develops within himself the power to respond to another octave out of the stupendous gamut of possible vibrations, and so enables himself to see more of the world around him than those of more limited perception." That statement surely applies with equal force to the telepathist who feels rather than sees, and to the clairaudient also whose especial sensitiveness is in the field of hearing. Increased sensitiveness is the key to the mystery in all cases and this can be successfully induced by living a quiet, wholesome life, free from undue excitement, subsisting upon simple nutritious food, taking a good amount of outdoor exercise, and above all by determining to live a life of untarnished truthfulness, so that the "auric envelope" may be kept unsullied as a reflecting medium.

CHAPTER XXI

SPIRITUALISM IN ALL LANDS AND TIMES

Selected from the Writings of Dr. J. M. Peebles.

"I exist as I am, that is enough.
If no other in the world be aware, I sit content.
And if each and all be aware, I sit content."

—WALT WHITMAN.

CONSCIOUSLY do I feel that this life, with all its shadows and struggles, is really worth the living. And such, I think, is the general testimony of human experience. During many wanderings in savage, semi-civilized, and enlightened lands, I have seen a thousand smiles for a single tear, and I have heard ten thousand merry peals of laughter for a single groan of suffering. Surely, God is good.

But if death, as the atheist contends, "ends all," then this life is a little more than a tempest-tossed, tantalizing dream. If men rich in possibilities become, in dying, only dust and drifting gases, then hope, sympathy, aspiration for immortality, and all the soul's transcendent attributes, are nothing but heartless, pitiless mockeries.

This world is of very little importance unless there is another and a higher with equal opportunities and vastly better facilities for unfoldment; another world or worlds to look forward to in the future. And the word "future" implies faith. The inspired soul feeds in a measure upon faith. It is faith in Infinite Wisdom, in Nature's laws and faith in man, that moves the wheels of enterprise. And it is faith in a future existence that, during all the ancient ages, gave energy and public spirit to earth's teeming millions.

Navigators sailing, Columbus-like, under the inspiration of a lofty faith, have discovered new islands and continents. Hardy toilers plow and sow and plant in a trusting faith that the sun will shine and the harvests come in due season. Tradesmen transact business with a confiding faith in their fellow-men. Faith is an all-inspiring force in the international relations of foreign commerce and in all the higher walks of social and intellectual life. Faith in the great, throbbing heart of humanity is sublime, and faith in God—the tender, loving, "Our Father who art in heaven,"—is the divinest, most restful, satisfying emotion of the human soul.

But man cannot live by faith alone any more than by bread alone. Faith, while the substance of things hoped for, looks towards the mountain top of the ideal and cries for light—more light. "Add," said the apostle, "to your faith knowledge." This he himself personally did, exclaiming, "For we know that if this our earthly house were dissolved, we have a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens." With the true Spiritualist, as with the great apostle, faith buds and blossoms, and has its fruition in the absolute knowledge of a future conscious existence.

How did Paul know of "a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens," or of those higher spheres of immortality? He knew because he had visions; because he was caught up to the third heaven, and because, when entranced, he heard a voice—a spirit—speaking to him out of the unseen. In brief, he knew of a future existence in the heavens because he was a Spiritualist—a spiritualistic medium. The disciples were all mediums. That is the reason why Jesus selected them. His clairvoyant eye saw in them the outputting potencies of marvelous spiritual gifts. This period in Jewish history was the opening of a new cycle—a new and more spiritual dispensation.

> "God sends his teachers unto every age,
> To every clime and race of men."

Spiritualism, in some form, has obtained through all the ages and among all races. When a maiden died among the Senecas of the North American Indians, the heart-stricken mourners imprisoned a young bird until it began to sing; then, loading it with caresses and loving messages, they released it over the maiden's grave, bidding it not to fold its wings nor close its eyes until it had reached "the happy hunting grounds" of heaven; and then, feasting in silence under some mossy rock or moaning pine for three days, these sad-hearted Indians expected responses from the loved one by dreams or visions or in the low murmuring songs of the night-bird of the forest.

If Spiritualism means simply converse with departed mortals, then it is as ancient as remotest antiquity. Professor Boscowen, the noted archæologist, says in his "Records of the Monuments": "In dream and visions the primitive Akkadians no doubt saw, as they declared, the shadowy forms of departed human beings, which led them to regard them not as simply vanished, but still existing as shades in some dark, far distant, subterranean place." He further adds: "The inscriptions, as early as B. C. 3800, on the tablets show belief in ghosts and a worship of a ghost god, ancestral ghosts, the nisi, or spirits, the anunas, the friends they once knew, sitting upon their thrones as master spirits, or traversing the vaporous underworld, hailing each newcomer with the cry, "Didst thou become weak as we, and dost thou realize life as now do we? Welcome—welcome to our abodes." This is almost the exact phraseology of one of the lately discovered Babylonian tablets.

I repeat, if Spiritualism means simply belief in converse with departed mortals, then India's throbbing three hundred millions of to-day are Spiritualists. Their whole religious literature abounds in communications with gods, devas and pitris—their departed ancestors. These latter they propitiate. Every household has its familiars. The voluminous Sanskrit manuscripts, the Vedas and the Upanishads, frequently mention the Bhutas, Pritas, and Pisachas —especially the Pritas—as familiar ancestral spirits. Their sacred books describe their abodes, their obsessing influences, their general characteristics, and how to avert their control by mantras and invocations.

During my several visits to India, I never conversed with an intelligent Hindoo Pundit who did not believe that the invisible regions were filled with different gradations of conscious intelligence, and that certain classes of spirits had the power to communicate with and infest humanity. They do not encourage spirit communications —they fear them. I spent days in Southern India in casting out demons—that is, in demagnetizing the Hindoo mediums who were obsessed by undeveloped spirits.

In Ancient Egypt, Spiritualism was the very foundation for the national religion. Their hierophants taught the initiated that the soul is immortal; that during several lives it passed through several zœther zones, all of which were processes of purification. Hermes taught that the visible is but a picture of the invisible world—that this earth was surrounded by circles of ether, and that in these ether circles the souls of the dead lived and guarded mortals. Strabo states that in the temple of Serapis at Canopus, "great worship was performed and many miraculous works wrought, which the most eminent men believed and practiced, while others devoted themselves to the sacred sleep" that is, the unconscious trance. The consecrated temple at Alexandria was still more famous for its oracles, consecrated sleep, and the healing of invalids.

Berosus, in transcribing the early legends of Babylonia and Chaldea, describes the gods of heaven and the lower elementaries who were in sympathy with them, and often influenced the inhabitants of earth both for good and ill. They had magical directions for dispossessing disturbing demons and for inviting the protection of the good genii —in other words, the more exalted spirits.

A tablet in the library at Nineveh describes seven supreme gods, fifty great gods of heaven and earth, three hundred spirits of the lower heavens, and six hundred of the earth. These latter were invoked to bring messages from the invisible shores of immortality.

The master minds of Greece, such as Thales, who lived some six hundred years B. C., thought that the universe was peopled with daimons, who were the spiritual guides of human beings and the invisible witnesses of all their thoughts and actions.

Epimenides, the cotemporary of Solon, frequently received divine revelations from the spiritual heavens.

Zeno declared that tutelary, or guardian, spirits inspired his speech and directed his actions.

Socrates was constantly attended, as every reader of history knows, by his demon guide, with whom he conversed, and whose advice he was proud to receive and acknowledge.

Apuleius, the Roman historian, assured the people that the souls of men, when detached from their bodies and freed from their physical functions, became a species of daimon, or lemurs, who gratified their beneficence in watchfully guarding individuals, families, and cities.

Homer, in the twenty-third book of the Iliad, describes the spirit of Patroclus as appearing to Achilles, and adjuring him to bestow the last funeral rites upon the body of his friend, that he might the sooner commence his spiritual advancement.

In the eleventh book of the Odyssey, Ulysses is depicted as visiting the underworld regions of the Cimmerians, and as conversing with the spirit of Tyresius Elpenor and his own mother, from whom he received most encouraging tidings.

The poet Hesiod, whose verses were so prized by the old Greeks that they committed them to memory, believed that each conscious soul was a potential portion of God, the "Oversoul." Recognizing the conscious existence of these souls, or spirits, he thought they were drawn earthward from the higher regions by the desires of their friends.

Plutarch informs us that those who aspired to be brought into sympathetic communion with the higher intelligences of the shadowlands were expected to renounce the follies of the world and to practice self-denial, and to bring the lower functions and faculties of their natures into complete subjection to the spiritual.

Cicero tells us that the mysteries, which were symbolically allied to spiritual invisible presences, enkindled and inspired a knowledge of the future life, and made this life more pleasant by filling the mind of the dying with beautiful ideas of cheerfulness and resignation.

Pythagoras, who visited India, Persia, and Egypt, and who had been initiated into the inner court of Isis, was one of the most astonishing mediums of antiquity. His psychic powers were attested by Claudius Æian, Porphyry of Tyre, and Jamblichus, the Neo-Platonist.

Plato, the favorite pupil of Socrates, and prince of philosophers, held precisely the same ideas in regard to spirits and their communion with mortals as did his great teacher. "There are," he said, "daimons, the souls of those who have died; and each human being has a particular spirit with him, to be his tutelary and guiding genius during his mortal lifetime; and when the physical life is ended this spirit receives and accompanies the enfranchised one to its future destiny, the Elysian Fields of immortality.

The Old and New Testaments, the Apocrypha, and the Talmudic writings—all abound, more or less, in angel ministries, spirit communications, trances, visions, and apparitions.

Origen, a celebrated bishop, and one of the most learned and illustrious that graced the early Christian centuries, wrote thus in his "De Principiis": "What shall we say of the Diviners, from whom—by the working of those spirits (demons) who have the mastery over them—answers are given (to those who consult them) in carefully-constructed verses? Those persons, too, whom they term Magi (magicians) frequently, by invoking demons over boys of tender years, have made them repeat poetical compositions and give poetical improvisations which were the admiration and amazement of all. Now these effects, we suppose, are brought about in the following manner: As holy and immaculate souls after devoting themselves to God with all perfection and purity, and preserving themselves from the contagion of evil spirits, and purifying themselves by long abstinence, by these means they assume a portion of divinity and earn the grace of prophecy and other divine gifts. The result of this is that they are filled with the working of those spirits to whose service they have subjected themselves."

This erudite Christian Father, Origen, in writing against his atheist antagonist, Celsus (200 A. D.), says: "Celsus has compared the miracles (spiritual manifestations) of Jesus to the tricks of jugglers and the magic of Egyptians, and there would indeed be a resemblance between them if Jesus, like the practitioners of magic arts, had performed his works only for show or worldly gain."

In his celebrated work, "De Anima," Tertullian says: "We had a right to anticipate prophecies and the continuance of spiritual gifts, and we are now permitted to enjoy the gift of a prophetess. There is a sister among us who possesses the faculty of revelation. Commonly, during religious service, she falls into a trance, holding then communion with angels, beholding Jesus himself, hearing divine mysteries explained, reading the hearts of some persons, and administering to such as require it. When the Scriptures are read, or psalms sung, spiritual beings minister visions to her. We were speaking of the soul once when our sister was in the spirit (entranced), and, the people departing, she then communicated to us what she had seen in her ecstasy, which was afterwards closely inquired into and tested. She declared she 'had seen a soul in bodily shape, which appeared to be a spirit, neither empty nor formless, but so real and substantial that it might be touched. It was tender, shining, of the color of the air, but in everything resembling the human form.' "

For three hundred years after the apostles, visions, apparitions, healing gifts and spiritual marvels abounded in all Christian countries. Believers, in the name of Christ, cast out demons, made the lame to walk and the blind to see. And all along down the centuries to the Reformation there were rifts in the clouds, lights from above, and messages from the invisible world.

The Roman Catholic Church has never denied the miracles—the spiritual manifestations of the ages. All the religious movements of the past originated in spiritual manifestations. Take as a sample, George Fox, the founder of Quakerism; Ann Lee, the founder of Shakerism; the Wesleys, founders of Methodism, and Swedenborg, the founder of the Swedenborgian or New Church. Swedenborg held open intercourse with the spiritual world during a period of twenty-seven years. The world's religious epoch-builders were all possessed of marvelous spiritual gifts. Elder Frederick Evans, a distinguished American Shaker preacher, used to often say, "Quakerism began in the spirit, but is ending in the flesh and in the worldliness of the world." Sir James Macintosh says of Fox's Journal: "It is one of the most extraordinary and instructive narratives in the world—which no reader of competent judgment can peruse without revering the eminent virtue of the writer."

This Journal reminds us of, and is a fitting companion to, Swedenborg's Diary. The following statements are condensed from it:

Born in July, 1624, Fox was naturally, when young, of a rather grave deportment. When about nineteen he became annoyed by the frivolous and profane conversation of the young, and spending a night in prayer, he heard a voice saying: "Thou seest how young people go together in vanity and old people into their graves; thou must forsake, be a stranger to, all, and be guided by the spirit."

Traveling to London, and listening by the way to many preachers, he remarks: "I was afraid of them, for I was sensible that they did not possess what they professed." After relating to the clergymen that at times he "heard voices and felt the presence of spirits," one of these jolly old clergymen of the Anglican Church told him to "smoke tobacco and sing psalms." Another advised him to "go to a surgeon and lose some blood." Turning to the Dissenters, he "found them also blind guides."

Wandering often in quiet places; fasting frequently with Bible in hand; meditating and battling with doubts and temptations, he at last "fell into a trance that lasted fourteen days, and many who came to see him during that time wondered to see his countenance so changed, for he not only had the appearance of a dead man, but seemed to them to be really dead. But after this his mind was relieved of its sorrows, so that he could have wept night and day with tears of joy, in humility and brokenness of heart. In this state," he says, "I saw into that which is without end, and things which cannot be uttered; and of the greatness and infiniteness of the love of God."

When at Mansfield he "was struck blind," so that he could not see, after which, he says, "I went to a village and many people accompanied me. And as I was sitting in a house full of people, I cast my eyes upon a woman and discerned in her an unclean (undeveloped) spirit. Moved to speak sharply, I told her she was under the influence of an unclean spirit. Having the gift of discerning spirits, I many times saw the states and conditions of people, and could try their spirits."

He frequently healed the sick by laying on of hands. To Richard Myer, who had long had a very lame, rheumatic arm, he said: "Stand upon thy legs and stretch out thine arm." He did so, and Fox exclaimed: "Be it known unto you and to all people that this day you are healed." Although Macaulay sneers at Fox's casting out devils and performing miracles, many remarkable cases of this kind are recorded in his Journal, and were witnessed by thousands of people. In his "Life Sketches" he uses "Lord," "angels," and "spirits" interchangeably, as do the old biblical writers.

"Coming to within a mile of Litchfield, where shepherds were keeping their sheep, I was commanded," he says, "by the Lord to put off my shoes. I stood still, for it was winter, and the word of the Lord was like a fire in me. So I put off my shoes and left them with the shepherds, and the poor shepherds trembled and were astonished. Then I walked on about a mile, and as soon as I was within the city the word of the Lord came to me again, saying, 'Cry, Woe unto the bloody city of Litchfield!' So I went up and down the streets, crying with a loud voice, 'Woe to the bloody city of Litchfield!' It being market day, I went into the market-place, and to and fro in the several parts of it, and made stands, crying as before, 'Woe to the bloody city of Litchfield!' And no one laid hands on me; but as I went thus crying through the streets, there seemed to be a channel of blood running down the streets, and the market-place appeared like a pool of blood. When I had declared what the spirit put upon me, I felt myself clear. I went out of the town in peace, and, returning to the shepherds, gave them some money and took my shoes of them.

"After this a deep consideration came upon me. Why, or for what reason, should I be sent against that city and call it 'the bloody city'? But afterwards I came to understand that in the Emperor Diocletian's time a thousand Christians were martyred here in Litchfield. So I was to go without my shoes, through the channel of their blood in the market-place, that I might raise up the memorial of the blood of those martyrs which had been shed a thousand years before. The sense of their blood was upon me."

These were among the common sayings of the inspired George Fox while preaching: "Verily, I heard a voice;" "The spirit was upon me;" "I saw in visions;" "The prophecies were open to me." "When, at a meeting of Friends in Derby, there was such a mighty power of spirit felt," says Fox, "that the people were shaken and many mouths were opened to testify that the angels of God do minister unto mortal men."

The original Quakers, like the post-Apostolic Christians, were Spiritualists; but our latter-day Quakers, denying or deadening their spiritual gifts by selfishness and worldliness, have crystallized, and so are a dying religious sect.

In the old Wesley residence, Epworth, England, marked spiritual manifestations occurred for years. An account of these was written by the Rev. Mr. Hooley, of Haxey, by Dr. Adam Clarke, by a writer in the Arminian Magazine and others. It is pitiable that modern Methodist preachers do not mention them as among the present demonstrations of a future existence. From a large volume by John Wesley, entitled "The Invisible World," published over a hundred years ago, I make the following quotations:

"It is true that the English in general indeed, most of the men of learning in Europe, have given up all accounts of witches and apparitions as mere old wives' fables. I am sorry for it, and I willingly take this opportunity of entering my solemn protest against this violent compliment which so many that believe the Bible pay to those who do not believe it. I owe them no such service. I take knowledge these are at the bottom of the outcry which has been raised, and with such insolence spread throughout the nation; and in direct opposition, not only to the Bible, but to the suffrage of the wisest and best of men in all ages and nations. They well know (whether Christians know it or not) that the giving up of witchcraft (the control of undeveloped spirits) is in effect giving up the Bible. And they know, on the other hand, that if but one account of men with separate spirits be admitted, their whole castle in the air (deism, atheism, and materialism) falls to the ground. One of the capital objections to all the accounts, which I have known urged over and over, is this, 'Did you ever see an apparition yourself?' No, nor did I ever see a murder, yet I believe there is such a thing. Yea, and in one place or another murder is committed every day. Therefore I cannot, as a reasonable being, deny the fact, though I never saw it, and perhaps never may. The testimony of unexceptionable witnesses fully convinces me of both the one and the other."

"Elizabeth Hobson was born in Sunderland in 1774. Her father dying when she was three or four years old, her uncle, Thomas Rea, a pious man, brought her up as his daughter. She was a serious child and grew up in the fear of God; yet she had a deep and sharp conviction of sin until she was about sixteen years of age, when she found peace with God, and from that time the whole tenor of her behavior was suitable to her profession. On Wednesday, May 23d, 1788, and the three following days, I talked with her at large. But it was with difficulty that I could prevail upon her to speak. The substance of what she said was as follows:

"'From my childhood, when any of my neighbors died, whether men, women, or children, I used to see them just before, or when they died, and I was not at all frightened, it was so common; indeed, I did not then know they were dead. I saw many of them by day and many of them by night. Those that came when it was dark brought light with them. I observed that little children and many grown persons had a bright, glorious light around them, but many had a gloomy, dismal light and a dusky cloud over them.'"

"'Perhaps the glorified spirits of just men made perfect, may, like the angels, be employed in carrying on the purposes of God in the world. It is said of them, 'His servants shall serve him.'" (Heb. 22.)

"Possibly, as ministering spirits, they may minister unto the heirs of salvation, and watch over the interests of those who on earth were dear to them, either by the ties of nature or religion. One of them was employed to converse with the Apostle John and explain to him the wonderful things he saw in his visions." (Rev. 22.)

"The sentiment for which we are pleading has the sanction of the highest antiquity. Philo speaks of it as a received notion of the Jews that the souls of good men officiate as ministering spirits. The Pagans, in the earliest ages, imagined that the spirits of their deceased friends continued near them, and were frequently engaged in performing acts of kindness, hence the deification of their kings and heroes, and the custom of invoking the names of those who were dear to them."

"Cicero makes a better use of the doctrine, when he endeavors to comfort a father for the loss of a son by the thought that he might still be engaged in performing kind offices for him. And it is not improbable that the idea, though perverted by the heathen for the purpose of idolatry, might, like the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, be derived from a divine source."

"A few years ago, a gentleman of most correct character and serious carriage, who resided near St. James and lived very happily with his wife, was taken sick and died, which so effected his dear left companion that she sickened also and kept her bed.

"In about ten days after her husband's death, as she was sitting upright in bed, and a friend and near relation sitting near her, she looked steadfastly towards the foot of the bed, and said with a cheerful voice, 'My dear, I will be with you in two hours.' The gentlewoman that was with her (and who firmly attested the same as most true) said to her, 'Child, whom do you speak to?' (for she saw nobody). She answered, 'It is my husband, who came to call me hence, and I am going to him;' which surprised her friend very much, who, thinking she was a little light headed, called in some one else, to whom she spoke very cheerfully and told the same story; but before the two hours were expired she went on and up to her dear companion, to be happy together forever, to the great surprise of all present.

"The soul receives not its perfections or activity from the body, but can live and act out of the body; yea, much better, having then its perfect liberty, divested of that heavy incumbrance which only clogged and fettered it. 'Doubtless,' saith Tertullian, 'when the soul is separated from the body it comes out of darkness into its own pure and perfect light, and quickly finds itself a substantial being, able to act freely in that light and participate in heavenly joys.'"

The former historical references prove that the facts and the fundamental truths of Spiritualism were in remotest antiquity similar to those of to-day. And why not?—since there is but one God, one law, one Divine purpose, one historical continuity, one brotherhood, "one spirit," with, as Paul says, "a diversity of gifts."

A traveler in nearly all latitudes 'neath the northern star, or summering under the Southern Cross, I have seen neither races nor tribes, white, brown-skinned, or black, without sympathy for their kindred—without cemeteries for their dead—without altars, however rude, for their worship, and without dreams, apparitions, visions, and methods of some sort for communicating with the dead. Uncouth, vague, if not rude and vulgar to us, they may have been; yet, they foreshadowed the soul's immortality, and brought to sorrowing, trusting souls, that piece of mind that passeth understanding.

These spiritual marvels, natural to the plane from which they proceeded, have, through all periods of time, appeared as echoing openings from the silence, as lights from the mountain-tops, necessarily assuming various forms, according to the period, the temperament, and racial development of a people. They were, and are, all in the line of evolution. They were, and are, God's living witnesses of a future existence. To deny them, to destroy them, is to plunge the world into the thickest darkness of materialism.

The Spiritualism of this age was no modern invention of either spirits or mortals, but rather a discovery—the re-discovery, of a fact, or range of facts, in perfect accord with natural law. It did not spring into birth full grown, like Minerva from Jupiter's brain. It was seemingly feeble at first. It is youthful yet, when compared with Protestantism and its swarming sects. And yet, it is a-fire with truth, and a-flame with infinite possibilities. Atheistic materialists and sectarian priests might quite as well think of dethroning Divinity as of checking the onward march of Spiritualism.

Christianity started from a dream (Matt. 1 : 20); Spiritualism from a mystic rap. Angels and spirits were the potent powers behind them both. The mightiest results often follow from the minutest causes. Newton's falling apple pointed to that hidden law that holds suns and stars in their circling orbits. That little puff of steam from Watts' boiling kettle foretold of railways and steamers girdling the globe. How insignificant to proud, imperial Rome was that Babe cradled in a Bethlehem manger. And yet, there lay concealed mighty causes that in less than three hundred years shook the whole Roman Empire to its very foundations; and later planted the Cross, symbol of life, upon the hills and mountains of every civilized land. So, those little half-muffled sounds, those gentle, telegraphic tickings that came to Hydesville like messengers from the tear lands of the tombs, came to bring messages—messages of holiest memories. This was the Epiphany, the Easter morning of the thinking, stirring nineteenth century! It was the golden dawn, the opening cycle of a newer and higher dispensation, ringing the death knell of a dreary materialism and a creedal, soul crushing sectarianism.

In the Judæan dust-buried past, women were last at the cross and first at the grave; so, in this age, women —the Fox sisters—after hearing the sounds, were the first to discover the new alphabet—the first to translate those rappings into intelligent language, thus cabling the ocean of doubt, and bridging the chilling river of death, thereby enabling mortals and immortals to stand consciously face to face, re-clasping hands—the white hands of their dead—and reaffirming their undying loves and affections. As God is the soul, the spirit, interpermeating all nature, Spiritualism is necessarily naturalism. Nature is a divine unity. The chain of causes has no missing links. Law is as continuous as it is immutable. All the good of the old times remains. Principles never die; and so of human beings—there are no dead. The Spiritualism of to-day has absolutely demonstrated this to be a fact. Shout, then, O ye nations, the song of triumph; for Death, the King of Terrors, is conquered! Creeds are doomed. The devil of mythology is defeated, and the fiery scarecrow, hell, is transfigured into lovely Gehenna gardens and vineyards, where purpling grapes grow in richest luxuriance just outside the walls of Jerusalem.

A few years since I was in the Judæa of the ancient Scriptures—in old Bethlehem, near Jerusalem: and recently, on March 31, 1898, I was in the new Bethlehem, at Hydesville, near Rochester, N. Y. This has now become consecrated ground—consecrated and sacred to moral, mental, and spiritual science, to the brotherhood of races, to the immortality of divine truth, to the matchless grandeur and glories of a present angel ministry, and to a sweet converse with those higher, heavenly intelligencies that make radiant the highlands of immortality. Hydesville is America's Mecca.

The philosophy of modern Spiritualism and the philosophy of Christianity during the first three centuries are in perfect accord. Spiritualists believe in God—a personal God, basing that personality, not upon form, or shape, or mere avoirdupois, but upon consciousness, intelligence, will and purpose. They believe in Jesus Christ, accepting Peter's definition—" Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by wonders, and miracles and signs, which God did by him." Jesus' sympathetic character was certainly sweeter, diviner, than that of the masses of men. Angels daily walked and talked with him. Subordinating the earthly to the spiritual, fraternal love with him soon bloomed out into the universal. Quick to feel the sorrows of others, the sensitive tendrils of his loving heart, constantly attuned and tremulously responsive, vibrated to every sound of human suffering. He identified himself with sorrow and disgrace, with humanity in its lowest estate, that he might the more successfully exert the healing, saving, love power of his soul in the redemption of the erring.

Considered with reference to religious cycles, Jesus stood upon the pinnacle of Hebrew Spiritualism, the great Judæan Spiritualist of that era. As God is Spirit—that is, the Infinite Spirit-presence acting by the law of mediation—an apostle, with a singular clearness of perception, pronounced the Nazarene a "Mediator"—that is, a "medium"—between God and men. The persecuted and martyred mediums of one age become gods in succeeding ages. Such manifest the world's lack of both justice and wisdom.

But if Jesus was only divine man, elder brother, wherein, then, you will perhaps inquire, consisted his moral superiority over others of that era? If I rightly understand his essential and peculiar characteristics, his preëminent greatness consisted in his fine harmonial organization; in a constant overshadowing of angelic influences; in the depth of his spirituality and love; in the keenness of his moral perceptions; in the expansiveness and warmth of his sympathies; in his unshadowed sincerity of heart; in his deep schooling into the spiritual gifts of Essenian circles; in his soul-pervading spirit of obedience to the mandates of right manifest in himself; in his unwearied, self-forgetting, self-sacrificing devotion to the welfare of universal humanity, and his perfect trust in God.

The leading thoughts ever burning in his being for acceptance and actualization were in the divine Fatherhood of God, the universal brotherhood of man, the perpetual ministry of angels and spirits, and the absolute necessity of toleration, charity, forgiveness, love—in a word, good works. These, crystalizing into action as a reform-force for human education and redemption, I denominate the positive religion, and consider it perfectly synonymous with Spiritualism—Spiritualism as a definition and practical power in its best and highest estate. This pure religion and undefiled, established in men's hearts and lives, and not on "sacred" parchments, would soon be felt in states and kingdoms, promoting peace, justice and charity; rendering legal enactments wise and humanitarian, and causing the sweet waters of concord and good-will to flow over all the earth for the spiritual healing and moral uplifting of the nations.

Few Spiritualists have yet reached the sublime altitudes of that positive or universal religion whose co-assistant is science, whose creed is freedom, whose psalm is love, and whose only prayer is holy work for human good. The best have not yet entered the vestibule of perfection. The ideal stretches afar in the golden distance. That there are extravagances, frauds, wild theories, and moral excrescences sheltering themselves under the wide-spread wing of Spiritualism, is freely admitted. This is common in all new movements involving the activities of the emotional nature. Let only the sinless stone the erring. "Jesus," says the record, "came into the world not to condemn, but to save the world." Because the millennium has not dawned during this first phenomenal cycle of modern Spiritualism; because the temple with its inner glories is as yet only seen in vision; because our fondest hopes are not realized, nor our lofty ideas attained, shall we go back to the beggarly elements of the world, and seek spiritual nourishment from rechewing old sectarian husks? Only in weakness and blindness does human nature seek a return to the flesh-pots of the past. If Spiritualists are not free, generous, tolerant, and prosperous; if they are not above the level of the age in good works in order and fitness, in reform effort and general culture; if they are not the ready recipients of the freshest fruits of science and philosophy; if they are not full-grown, harmonial men and women, the fault is not in Spiritualism, but in themselves. "Examine yourselves," was a good old apostolic injunction. Spiritualism can gain nothing by aping the ecclesiastical customs of other denominations. Awkward combinations are ever to be avoided. While it is true that master-builders are constructionists, Spiritualism must never adopt any measures for cramping the unfolding intellect, nor strive to utter the shibboleth of any man-made form of faith; for, in the introduction of this modern wave of Spiritualism upon earth, the angels of heaven purposed the formation of no new sect. Their aim, higher and holier, was to educate, enlighten, and spiritualize God's dear humanity.

These are among the divine enunciations of that positive religion, based upon the immutable principles of justice, goodness, and human rights:

God immanent and active in all things;

Man above all institutions;

The strict equality of the sexes.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

"Blessed are the pure in heart."

"By this shall men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have loved one another."

Self-abnegation being the first law of life, the highest good consists in aiding and doing good to others.

"Inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was an hungered and ye gave me meat; thirsty, and ye gave me drink; a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; sick, and ye visited me; in prison, and ye came unto me. . . . Inasmuch as ye have done these things to the least of one of these my servants, ye have done them unto me."

This is the religion of Jesus, the religion of the soul, the inborn religion of all men. Its witnesses have been the luminous suns and stars along the ages. When J. G. Whittier, accompanied by an English philanthropist, visited that eminent Unitarian, the Rev. Dr. Channing, for the last time in Rhode Island, their themes of conversation were reform, progress, peace, toleration, and human sympathy. Whittier, referring to it afterwards, wrote these tender lines:

> "No bars of sect or clime were felt —
> The Babel strife of tongues had ceased —
> And at one common altar knelt
> The Quaker and the Priest."

Thus may, thus do, the hearts of the good and erudite ever blend in union. Such fellowship constitutes heaven upon earth. When the white feet of the venerable William Howitt pressed the sunny slopes of the summerland, the angels that make radiant the upper kingdoms of God did not inquire, "Were you on earth Catholic, Protestant, Spiritualist, Materialistic Spiritualist, or Christian Spiritualist?" but "Were you a true man, a lover of humanity, and a brother of mercy?" "Then shall the King say, Come ye blessed of my Father." Love was the test of discipleship in Christ's time. Purity was and is the test of heavenly acceptance in all spheres of existence. Listen:

"Lovest thou me?"

"Love is the fulfilling of the law."

"Love worketh no ill to its neighbor."

"If ye love me keep my commandments."

"Not every one that saith Lord, Lord! shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."

If you cannot walk peaceably and religiously with your brother, good reader, go your own way, kindly leaving the road. Heaven, as London, may be reached from different directions.

Made subject to vanity, experimenting and journeying through the world of shadows, all need the staff of prayer and the lamp of faith—need to feel that God is a constant presence; that Christ is the light of truth; and that loving angels are waiting to minister to our spiritual wants. A life without love and trust, even if it be of the strictest morality, or of a continual ascetic struggle after Divine communion, will never bring the individual really into the Inner Temple. Little children symbolize the receptivities of the heavenly life. The humble heart, sheltered from the storms of passion, and all vestured with the fragrant blossoms of sweet human affections, is often nearer in spirit to the angels than the cold philosopher. Love inspires, wisdom guides, faith opens the gate, and self-sacrifice leads the way into the City of Peace—the City of God. Oh, come, let us worship in this temple of Spiritualism—this temple of eternal religion—a temple whose foundations are deep and wide as the nature of man, and whose dome, reaching into the heaven of heavens, shall shelter and overshadow the races with millennial glory.

When genuine Spiritualism—the universal religion of love—shadowed in twilight by Indian sages, seen in increasing sunlight by Syrian seers, and consciously felt to-day by the more highly-inspired—becomes actualized in and outwrought through the personal lives of earth's surging millions, it will no longer be selfishly said, "Mine, mine," but "Ours, yours, all who appropriate it for holy uses." Then our country will be the universe, our home the world, and our rest wherever a human heart beats in sympathy with our own, and the highest happiness of each will be found to consist in aiding and blessing others. Then will the soil be as free for all to cultivate as the air they breathe; gardens will blossom and bear fruit for the most humble; orphans will find homes of tenderest sympathy in all houses; the tanned brows of toiling millions will be wreathed with the white roses of peace; and the great family of humanity will be obedient to and trust in love, law, liberty—God! In holiest fellowship with Jesus and the angels, with loved and loving spirits, and upon the tender bosom of the Infinite, is my soul's rest forever!

Probably the best medium that graced the nineteenth century was W. Stainton Moses. Educated at Oxford, and for a time connected with London University College, he was a clairvoyant, trance, clairaudient, automatic-writing medium. His mediumistic superiority consisted largely in living a good life and adding to his mediumship culture and scholarship. He was for years editor of London Light, pages of his automatic writings appearing in its columns. Honored by his friendship, I take pleasure in presenting the following communications from his spirit-friend "Imperator":

"It is part of our mission to teach the religion of the body as well as of the soul. We proclaim to you and to all that due care of the body is an essential prerequisite to the progress of the soul. Jesus was a physician to both body and soul. Man has gradually built around the teachings of Jesus a wall of deduction, speculation, and material comment similar to that with which the Pharisees had surrounded the Mosaic law. It is our task to do for Christianity what Jesus did for Judaism. We would take the old forms and spiritualize their meanings and infuse into them new life. Resurrection rather than abolition is what we desire. We say again that we would not abolish one jot or tittle of the teachings which the Christ gave to the world. We do but wipe away man's material gloss and show you the hidden spiritual meaning which he has missed.

"This was the mission of Christ. He claimed for himself that fulfilment of the law, not its abolition or abrogation, was his intent. He pointed out the truth which was at the root of the Mosaic commandment. He stripped off the rags of pharisaical ritual, the glosses of rabbinical speculation, and laid bare the divine truth which was beneath all, the grand principles divinely inspired which man has nearly buried. He was not only a religious but a social reformer, and the grand business of his life was to elevate the people, spirit and body; to expose pretenders, and to strip off the mask of hypocrisy; to take the foot of the despot from the neck of the struggling slave, and make man free by virtue of that truth which he came from God to declare. 'Ye shall know the truth,' he told his followers, 'and the truth shall make you free; and ye shall be free indeed.'

"He reasoned of life and death and eternity; of the true nobility and dignity of man's nature; of the way to progressive knowledge of God. He came as the Great Fulfiller of the law; the man who showed, as never man showed before, the end for which the law was given—the amelioration of humanity. He taught men to look into the depths of their hearts, to test their lives, to try their motives and to weigh all they did by one ascertained balance—the fruits of life as the test of religion. He told men to be humble, merciful, truthful, pure, self-denying, honest in heart and intent; and he set before them a living example of the life which he preached.

"He was the great social reformer, whose object was at least as much to benefit man corporeally, and to reveal to him a salvation from bigotry, selfishness, and narrow-mindedness in this life, as it was to reveal glimpses of a better life in the hereafter. He preached the religion of daily life, the moral progress of the spirit in the path of daily duty forward to a higher knowledge. Repentance for the past, amendment and progress in the future, summed up most of his teaching. He found a world buried in ignorance, at the mercy of an unscrupulous priesthood in matters religious; under the absolute sway of a tryant in matters political. He taught liberty in both. He labored to show the dignity of man. He would elevate him to the true dignity of the truth—the truth which should make him free. He was no respecter of persons. He chose his apostles and associates from the mean and poor. He lived among the common people; of them, with them, in their homes, teaching the simple lessons of truth which they needed, and which they could receive. He went but little among those whose eyes were blinded by the mists of orthodoxy, respectability, or so-called human wisdom. He fired the hearts of his listeners with a yearning for something nobler, better, higher, than they yet possessed, and he told them how to get it.

"The gospel of humanity is the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is the only gospel that man needs; the only one that can reach his wants and minister to his necessities."

We continue to preach the same evangel. By commission from the same God, by authority from the same source, do we come now as apostles of this heaven-sent gospel. We declare truths, the same as Jesus taught. We preach, through this medium, his gospel, purified from the glosses and misinterpretations which man has gathered around it. We would spiritualize that which man has hidden under the heap of materialism.

"I inquired," said Stainton Moses, "whether I rightly understood that the work of teaching, a section of which is under the direction of Imperator, derived its mission from Christ."

"You understand aright. I have before said that I derive my mission, and am influenced in my work, by a spirit who has passed beyond the spheres of work into the higher heaven of contemplation. . . . Jesus Christ is now arranging his plans for the gathering of his people, for the further revelation of the truth as well as for the purging away of the erroneous beliefs which have accumulated in the past.

"This is the second coming—a coming in power and glory—a coming of ministering angels and spirits—a coming to morally and spiritually enlighten all conscious intelligences. It is the overshadowing return of the living Christ. There will be no such personal return as theologians have taught. This will be, and is, the spiritual return to his people, by the voice of his messengers speaking to those whose ears are open; even as he said, 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear; and he that is able to receive it, let him receive it.'"

Spiritualism is the opposite of, and strongly antagonistic to, materialism. When scientists talk of the potencies in matter, of co-relations and polarities, they are talking all unwittingly of spirit; for all potency as a finality belongs to the almost incomprehensible realm of Spirit, which is a factor in every phenomenon of nature, and is essential to the ascertainment and record of every natural law; and the knightly champions of science are just beginning to understand it.

The Kosmos is a unity, threefold in manifestation. Substance is the One, the All Spirit, Soul, matter! We are spirits now—spirits vestured in material, everchanging substances. We are spirits with souls vibrating in touch with the Universal Soul—with Immortality. A man can no more help being immortal than the buds can help unfolding and blowing beneath spring's refreshing showers and the sun's genial rays. Who that has drunk from this fountain of eternal life—who that has held an hour's communion with departed loved ones does not say to the world, "I am glad, oh! so glad, that I am a Spiritualist!" And who does not say, "Blessed, ever blessed be this divine truth of Spiritualism!"

Spiritualists! the eyes of the civilized world and of the angels above are upon you! Conduct yourselves, then, like men. So guide your barques that, though they flounder in the tempestuous seas of temptation, they may soon right themselves for a better, safer, voyage. Live to-day for to-morrow, for eternity. Be above the commission of an unworthy act; indulge in no ignoble insinuations; take no selfish advantages of the weaknesses of your fellow men; sacrifice coveted comforts for the good of others; seek no praise nor fulsome flattery; intrigue for no office; partake of the bread of honest labor only; administer reproof in gentleness and love; forgive as you would be forgiven; be kind to the poor, the unfortunate, the sick, the dying; live to lift them to higher planes of health and happiness; live to brighten the chain of human friendships; live to educate mind, heart, and soul for the realization of a heaven on earth; plant gardens of love in unhappy bosoms; scatter gems of good will and roses of kindness along your daily walks of life; think only good thoughts, and ever welcome the angels to your hearts and to your souls as the loved messengers of God. These are the teachings and principles of practical Spiritualism.

The above magnificent address is presented to our readers as a splendid example of the attitude taken to life in general by the most widely traveled of all American Spiritualists, the venerable and gracious "Spiritual Pilgrim."

During Dr. Peebles' third trip around the world, he studied and noted the laws, customs and religions of nations and peoples, giving special attention to Spiritualism, Magic, Theosophy, and reform movements. He visited Ceylon, India, Persia, Egypt, Syria, and the continent of Europe, and secured much material, which has been embodied in a large octavo volume, containing thirty-five chapters, and treating on the following subjects: Home Life in California; My third Voyage; The Sandwich Islands; The Pacific Island Races; Ocean bound towards Aukland, New Zealand, Melbourne, Australia; From New Zealand Onward; A series of Spiritual Seances upon the Ocean; The Chinese Orient; Chinese Religions and Institutions; Cochin China to Singapore; Malacca to India; Spiritual Seances on the Indian Ocean; India: Its History and Treasures; India's Religions, Morals, and Social Characteristics; The Rise of Buddhism in India; The Brahmo-Somaj and Parsees; Spiritualism in India; From India to Arabia; Aden and the Arabs; The City of Cairo, Egypt; Egypt's Catacombs and Pyramids; Appearance of the Egyptians; Study of the Pyramids; Sight of the Great Pyramids; Ancient Science in Egypt; Astronomy of the Egyptians; From Alexandria to Joppa and Jerusalem; the City of Joppa; City of Prophets and Apostles; Jesus and Jerusalem; Present Gospels; the Christianity of the Ages; Plato and Jesus in contrast; Turkey in Asia; Ionia and the Greeks; Athens; Europe and its Cities; Ceylon and its Buddhists; the India of To-day; Hindoo Doctrines of the Dead; the Mediterranean Sea; Egypt and Antiquity. Price, $1.50.

Dr. Peebles' address is Battle Creek, Michigan, where his highly valuable works are published.

CHAPTER XXII

DR. J. M. PEEBLES ON THE NATURE AND PREEXISTENCE OF THE SOUL

Non Mi Ricordo. "I do not remember." Granted—but that does not disprove an eternal past existence. You do not remember your past fœtal life, nor your nine months placenta life; nor do you remember your baby life, nor your early childhood life. But this counts for nothing against your existence during all these periods. You nevertheless have access to an ample amount of evidence that your existence traversed all these stages—evidence that your personality was prior to your conscious memory of it. Because this inmost spirit cannot project itself through its clumsy, clayish environment into the external with sufficient vividness to remember the past and express it, is no evidence that the individualized spirit did not exist. Non-existence is unthinkable. And yet thinking is as natural as breathing. Only circles are endless. All beginnings in time and space necessarily have their endings. A creature which has its beginning in time is incapable of perpetuating itself or being perpetuated through eternity. A line projected from a point in space has a further limit which no logic can carry to infinitude. Whether or not "God geometrizes," that cannot be morally and physiologically false which is mathematically true. Though on different planes of thought morals and mathematics harmonize. The universe is not a dual-verse of infinite inharmonies.

I may here remark that two fundamental assumptions lie at the threshold of man's introduction into this world. The first is, that his subjective existence antedates his objective appearance. That as an ego he is coexistent with the universe, and participates in that universal and eternal life which is perpetually manifest in the kosmos.

The second assumption, is that man as to his essential form or personality is derivative; that his earliest introduction into the world and the universe is when he is born of a physical mother; that his conscious entity is dependent upon and dates its beginning with the visible appearance of the physical organism. According to this assumption the material atoms and forces which have transiently converged in the human organism, with no promise of anything more than a limited persistence, were once conglomerated with the cosmic mass as a portion of its undifferentiated substance. And this derivative hypothesis further assumes that the purpose of this single birth is to specialize a portion of the organizable pabulum of the general kosmos into human shape, that it may manifest the attributes of self-consciousness. The personality is coexistent with this body organism, commenced its existence with it, and must have its share in its vicissitudes and final destruction. Is it surprising that such a materialistic philosophy should yield its abundant crop of atheists?

With the wisest of the Greek philosophers, diversity, individuality, was as fundamental as unity; but with our modern scientists, individuality is purely derivative. The Darwinian school of writers assume that our world and solar system, together with the kingdoms of life, nay, even the genius of Homer, Raphael and Shakespeare were once latent in a fiery cloud. All specific forms, say they, came by development, they arose by insensible modifications wrought in an originally homogeneous substance. That also was the philosophy of certain ancient Hindoos. That was the philosophy of Spinoza. That, too, is the philosophy of Herbert Spencer and of Darwin's disciples. Darwin's qualification to the effect that God originally, and, I may add, miraculously, created a few germs, as a basis from which to evolve future distinctions and organic formations, does not redeem his theory from that pantheistic conception which is its very root and essence. And what is more, it is the pantheism of materialism.

Spinoza and the pantheistic philosophers of India taught in harmony with the logical implications of their philosophy. They were materialists. Inasmuch as types, or essential forms, with them, were not coexistent with substance, but effects, or derivative results, consequent upon the differentiation and integration of substance; so these beginnings necessitated endings. Forms were ephemeral. Their destiny was to suffer resolution into the primitive substance.

Future immortality implies a preëxistent, or past immortality. And the attempt to reconcile man's future immortality with Darwinism is much like Hugh Miller's effort to reconcile geology and Genesis. It seems clear to me, that if a protoplastic formation originated, evolved and built up essential man, involving the personal identity, it may, and necessarily must, by the law of involution, return again to protoplasm.

It was precisely upon this point that Agassiz took issue with Darwin. The former held with Plato that ideas and ultimate forms were coexistent with substance. He taught that they had a spiritual basis, antedating their material embodiments. It is not sufficient to say that man existed in essence before he became a personal identity. If that identity was produced, if it be a result, an effect, consequent upon molecular action, or material change, then no "key-stone" in the arch-way of organization will insure that identity from final resolution into that "fiery cloud" in which Tyndal informs us the genius of Raphael and Shakespeare were once latent.

Individuals favoring the Darwinian school of materialism and believing derivative personality ask for facts in proof of preëxistence, by which they doubtless mean facts addressed to the perceptive intellect. But I submit that facts of the sensuous order are quite incompetent to prove or disprove truths which address themselves to the highest reason. To me the facts of consciousness and intuition are more authoritative and imperial than those appealing to the fallible senses.

Scholars, thinkers and metaphysicians of all schools recognize three orders of evidence which may be competent to influence the judgment.

1. Evidence addressed to the senses.
2. Evidence addressed to the conscious understanding.
3. Evidence addressed to the higher reason in the form of axioms and intuitions.

The demand for facts of external observation in proof of those higher truths of relation and of consciousness which can only be apprehended by the higher reason, will not be gratified, at least, in the present condition of humanity. The problem of preëxistence is included in the provinces of mental science, metaphysics and religion, rather than in that of the physical sciences. Science may afford important aid by revealing the laws of movement; but its sphere being limited to the order and sequence of phenomena, it can never reveal the nature of things in themselves. I have no expectation that the problem of man's first estate will ever have any clear light thrown upon it by recourse to such data as material science will be able to furnish, for it involves an ultimate ground that lies beyond the pale of experimental research. A strong presumptive evidence in favor of the truth of a proposition is to be found in the extent of its diffusion and in the degree of its persistence. This is an axiomatic truth with Herbert Spencer. Now the belief in the soul's preëxistence—the belief in God and the immortality of man have survived the rise and fall of empires, thrones and races. Nor has modern enlightenment succeeded in driving them into the dreamy haunts of superstition, but it has welcomed, extended and fortified these beliefs. They may be accepted, therefore, as foreshadowing, or rather, as the synonyms of ultimate verities.

I believe the Soul to be an eternal entity, or unit from eternity. The Soul is immortal and has its state of being within God. The Soul is absolute. Nothing can be taken from it or added to it. Its manifestations in time proceed from sources that are within. The Soul in its quality is like unto God. It is a Ray which proceeds from God as a central sun. Its being is in God, yet it is not God. The essential nature of God cannot be communicated through the medium of human speech, for it is only known within the Soul. Knowledge proceeds from the known to the unknown. Revelation proceeds from the unknown to the known. The consciousness of the universe is God; the consciousness of man is the soul. The soul is the only preëxisting entity except God, having its being in eternity and its existence in time.

Existing in time the soul is subject to limitations, but God is the Absolute Being transcending all limitations. The soul is a complete circle, having neither beginning nor ending. God is the sphere in which the circle is repeated to infinity. But while the soul abides in the Infinite it is never lost therein. There are no new souls added to the universe; none taken therefrom. The soul in its primal nature does not exist in time or space, but in eternity. Only its movements or manifestations fall within the province of time and space.

It will hence be seen that the soul in its first estate is a purely subjective being in the human form. In this primal state it embodies all the attributes and qualities which we can conceive of as embraced in the kosmos. It "is in little all the sphere." It is Plato's "One and Many"—a unity in which is embraced a multitude. All numbers, forms and series inhere in this microcosmic entity. Love and Wisdom are the substance and form of its existence. Love is its substance and the subjective ground of its being. Wisdom is its form of existence and quality of limitation that distinguishes it from all other human entities. Viewed in one aspect the infinite multitude of souls in the universe form one complex and unitary body, each sharing the same divine qualities with his fellow, which is the ground of their sociality. But viewed in another aspect, souls present an infinite diversity, no two being alike, no two predestined to perform identical offices. Thus all souls cohere in one social solidarity by virtue of the principle of Love which inheres alike in each. And then again each soul is a Form per se, distinguished from all other souls by virtue of its principle of Wisdom or quality of limitation. Hence each soul is endowed with a specialty of genius which qualifies it for a particular function and form of service, as a unit in an affiliated series of the Societary Man. But before the soul can become equipped to consciously serve in its predestined place in the universe, it must perfect for itself a Body Form through which it can fully express its subjective wealth of faculty. This Body Form will be the final summing-up of the Soul's pilgrimages in matter. But this branch of the subject I will leave for discussion in my second paper of this series.

"A keel grated on the sand,
Then a step was on the shore —
Life awoke and heard it,
A hand was laid upon her,
And a great shudder passed through her.
She looked up, and saw over her
The strange, wide eyes of Love, And Life knew for whom
She had been waiting,
And Love drew Life up to him,
And of that meeting was born
A thing rare and beautiful — Joy, First Joy was it called."

—Olive Schreinrer.

Identity has a deeper ground than the material shape which we associate with the human body. It is far deeper than the trend given to character through the laws of heredity, having its basis in the self-conscious ego. True, the body to some extent is a mirror or reflection of the real identity, but is neither its cause nor ground of permanence. The body is an aggregation of ever fluctuating molecules. Its entire structure is changed at least once in seven years, and the brain, nerves and glands are changed several times within that period. I repeat, our identity is in the soul and not in the organic structure. It is in the realm of mind and not in the realm of matter. Hence our identity is not a residuum—a something left over when the material body is cast aside. It is not a ghost or shadow which the organism has bequeathed to the man, but a persistent form having only a temporary residence in the body which body is the real shadow or ephemeral appearance.

Individuality in its primal meaning is monadic existence. The Latin Individuus is the opposite of Dividuus. It embraces that which cannot be further dissected. It signifies the being a one. We are here brought back to what I said above regarding the nature of the soul, namely: That by virtue of its wisdom-principle the soul is a form per se, and distinguished from all other souls by its quality of limitation. Individuality is single—the unit distinguished from all other units and from the total aggregate of units. Therefore each individual soul, in its primal estate is endowed with a specialty of genius which qualifies it for a particular place and function in the universe.

Personality in its common and outward acceptation is usually associated with appearance and outward character; but with such writers as Emerson, James Freeman Clarke, Frohschammer, Elisha Mulford, Lotze, etc., Personality has a far deeper meaning. The Latins used Persona to signify personating, counterfeiting, or wearing a mask. But Personality in the sense in which Emerson employs it, signifies true being, both concrete and spiritual. It alone is original being. It is not limited. Personality is that universal element that pervades every human soul and which is at once its continent and ground of being. Distinction from others and limitations by them results from Individuality, not Personality.

Elisha Mulford says: "There is in personality the highest that is within the knowledge of man. It is the steepest, loftiest summit towards which we move in our attainment."

Emerson says: "The personal within man is the soul of the whole; the wise silence; the universal beauty, to which every part and particle is equally related. . . . The personal is not an organ, not a function, not a faculty, it is the background of our being—an immensity not possessed and that cannot be possessed."

We are here again brought back to what was said above, that all souls cohere in one social solidarity by virtue of the principle of Love which inheres alike in each. Personality therefore pertains to the substance of the soul and individuality to its form.

The magi of Persia, the priests of Egypt, the Brahmans of India, and Buddhists of the East, each and all held to some form of the general doctrine. Jesus recognized his own preëxistence when he spoke of the "glory he had with the Father before the world was." Again he said: "Before Abraham was I am."

Ammonius Saccas, founder of that school of eclectic philosophy known as New Platonism, and among whose disciples were Longinus, and Origen, was a believer of preexistence.

Plotinus, an eminent Greek philosopher, an adept in the doctrines of the Oriental sages, and a teacher of philosophy at Rome from 645 A. D., until his death, was an advocate of preëxistence.

Proclus, a student of Olympiodorus at Alexandria, and of Plutarchus at Athens, and for a time at the head of the New Platonic schools, believed in preëxistence.

Apollonius of Tyanna, a Pythagorean philosopher of the first century, venerated for his wisdom by his contemporaries, and whose thrillingly interesting life was written by Flavius Philostratus, was a believer in and teacher of preexistence.

Many of the most enlightened minds of all countries have taught that man's conscious self-hood is as much a matter of the past as it is to be of the future. Pythagoras, the founder of the Italic school of Greek philosophy, professed to have a distinct remembrance of a previous life or lives.

Plato believed that all the knowledge of laws and principles we seem to acquire in this world is simply a recovery or reminiscence of knowledge which the soul possessed in a previous state of existence. Readers of Plato will remember the reference to "Meno," where Plato introduces Socrates as making an experiment, by way of putting a series of questions to a slave of Meno, eliciting from the uneducated youth a geometrical truth. This done, Socrates triumphantly observed to Meno, "I have not taught the youth anything; but simply interrogating him, he recalled the knowledge he had in a previous existence." Plato further taught that all ideas, types and ultimate forms both precede and succeed their material embodiments.

"Our soul," says Plato, "is a particle of the Divine Breath, and therefore we are related to God. Our soul's divine ideas are natural, and are created by the contemplation of divine things. Before it was associated with the body, it existed in God; even now, though enveloped by the body, it may participate in that divine contemplation through the subjection of the passions, and through a contemplative life."

In the song of Amosis we read: "Lord thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations; before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world."

The most learned among the Christian fathers, such as Origen, added to the doctrine of preëxistence, the doctrine of Brahminical reincarnation, contending that souls having sinned in their previous lives were condemned to reënter human bodies in this mortal life to expiate their former guilt.

Jerome (340 A. D.) said of the above dogma which prevailed in India and Egypt: "This impious and wicked doctrine was anciently diffused through Egypt and the East, and now prevails in the secret, as in vipers' nests, among most, and pollutes the purity of those regions; and as by a hereditary disease glides in the few to pervade the many."

Clemens of Alexandria, in his Eclogues, advocated the soul's preëxistence, but stoutly denied the doctrine of re-incarnation—and re-reincarnation of human souls. He contended that the passage: "There was a man sent from God" meant that the soul of John the Baptist was older than his body, and was sent from his former state.

Clement of the second century, educated in the Platonic philosophy, and afterwards a disciple of Pantenus in Alexandria, said: "Do we not love God this first, that we exist, that we are said to be men? That descending from the regions of light, or sent by Him, we are held in these corporeal bodies."

Pamphilas, who established a flourishing school in Cæsarea, who vindicated Origen in five books, and was martyred 309 A. D., was a strong advocate of the soul's preëxistence.

"Does matter create the soul?" he asked. "The house resembles the idea that preceded it, and the entrance by a path from the mountains resembles the descent of souls from heaven to their lodgment in bodies."

Synesius, a Neo-Platonic philosopher and disciple of Hypatia at Alexandria, wrote largely in favor of preëxistence. When the citizens of Ptolemais had invited him to the bishopric among them, he declined that dignity, in a letter to his brother on the subject, for this reason among others, that he cherished certain opinions which perhaps all would not approve, but which he could in no wise abjure, as after mature reflection they had struck their roots deep in his mind. First among these he mentioned the doctrine of preëxistence. "Assuredly I can never think it right to believe the soul an after-birth of the body." Vestiges of this belief are openly discernible in his writings, as, for example, in the hymn of which the following is a paraphrase:

"Eternal Mind, thy seedling spark
Through this thin vase of clay,
Athwart the waves of chaos dark Emits a timorous ray!

"Far forth from thee, thou central fire,
To earth's sad bondage cast,
Let not the trembling spark expire—Absorb thine own at last!"

The doctrine of the soul's preëxistence was held by the Jews, both before and cotemporary with the Apostolic period. It was certainly held by the later Jews living after the times of the Babylonish captivity. Among their proofs they quote this from the Book of Wisdom:

"I was an ingenuous child, and received a good soul; nay more, being good, I came into a body undefiled."

Writing of the Essenes, Josephus says: "For the opinion obtains among them (the Essenes) that bodies indeed are corruptible, and the matter of them not permanent; but that souls continue exempt from death forever; and that, emanating from the most subtle ether, they are enfolded in bodies, as prisons, to which they are drawn by some natural spell. But, when loosened from the bonds of the flesh, as if released from a long captivity, they rejoice, and are borne upward. . . . This company of disembodied souls is distributed in different orders. The law of some of them is to enter mortal bodies, and, after certain prescribed periods, be again set free. But those possessed of a diviner structure are absolved from all local bonds of earth."

Leibnitz, the most profound philosopher of the seventeenth century, held the doctrine of preëxistence as one of his cardinal beliefs. And to-day, in the full blaze of scientific discovery, there are hosts of men famous for their knowledge of the sciences, and eminent in religious culture, who believe in a preëxistent state of conscious existence. Among these are Prof. Redfield, the author and distinguished physiognomist; Charles and Edward Beecher, lately departed to the higher life; G. Groom Napier and Sir Thompson of England.

Nearly the whole body of French Spiritualists, including such men as Figuer and Camille Flamarion, the astronomer, hold to the doctrine. The great Fourier taught it. The Spiritualists of the Orient, and, to a very large extent of Continental Europe, accept it.

Conscious communion with spirits, not proving immortality in the sense of endless existence, does prove a conscious existence after death. And then, those long inhabiting the better land of angelic blessedness, that is to say, ancient spirits almost uniformly teach preëxistence. I cannot this moment call to mind a case to the contrary. It is admitted that spirits of the spirit world differ upon this subject; and further, that the testimony of spirits is authoritative only so far as it corresponds with intuition and the highest reason. Still, the persistence of an idea and the potency of intelligent majorities necessarily influence convictions. And I am certain that the general tenor of the teachings of wise and highly intelligent spirits upon this subject favors a preëxistent state of being. Aaron Knight, two hundred years in spirit life, and whose identity I took the pains to establish when in England several years since, teaches, with the "brotherhood of ancient sages," preëxistence in the most positive manner.

It is very clear to profound thinkers that once in existence as divine man, always in existence. The converse is equally true; once absolutely out of existence never in existence! This logical bulwark has never been successfully assailed.

In the phrase, once in existence, always in existence, I am referring to conscious, or rather to divine man, and not to sticks and stones, nor to growling animals and stinging insects. These are fragments—imperfect structures—unfinished temples. And no one gifted with intelligence speaks of a conscious rock—a divine wolf, or a righteous dog. These are not, and never were in existence as consciously rational and morally progressive beings. They have not the Spiritual Keystone. They are not religious; neither are they conscious of their subordinate consciousness! And certainly, no logician ever affirms of a part, what he does of a whole. A slice, slashed from a golden orange, thin, irregular, ill-shaped and seedless, is not equal to, nor should it be compared with the well-rounded orange. Animals, serpents, and noxious insects, are but parts, bearing the same relation to man that passing thoughts bear to ideas, or shadows to substances. Animals and insects were never in existence, as perfect structures, as divine entities; but rather as fleeting organisms serving temporary uses.

Divinity is eternal. An essential man is constituted according to Plato, of divine substance, form and germ; and further, with this prince of thinkers, essential forms, types and ideas, were the same. Types, or ideas, in fact, were subjective realities. Outworked they became partially visible. Still, the type preceded and succeeded the visible appearance. The material contents of form as in the oak or animal, are fleeting, changing; but the hidden essential form, which is the type, or idea is enduring and immortal.

Every argument against preëxistence, is so far as entitled to the name, an argument against the immortality of the soul, and a help to cold combative materialists. And materialism, in its last analysis amounts to this—a sprawling puppy and a royal souled sage—a beefsteak, a prayer-book, and a divine soul, are all the same originally—atoms—protoplastic atoms, adjusted and arranged for specific aims and ends by non-designed and non-intelligent molecular force. And so all conscious life—all noble aspirations for eternal unfoldment—begin and necessarily end in matter. A stream cannot rise above its fountain. Thank God and the good angels, Spiritualism, in connection with the rational doctrine of preëxistence, saves from the slough of despond.

If the sum total constituting J. M. Peebles were once absolutely out of existence, putting him into existence would be equivalent to creating something from nothing. I am a firm believer in the soul's eternal preëxistence. The theory is the rational stronghold of the soul's immortality. But preëxistence and reincarnation are by no means identical. They are not predicated on the same philosophical basis. And any writer who confounds these exhibits either his ignorance, or his pitiable impudence.

Of the doctrine of reincarnation I am not convinced—and yet, am open to investigation and arguments in its favor.

Only a few can clearly recall events and experiences occurring in a preëxistent state of being. Many did, however, in the more meditative past. And some in the present can do this; and their testimony upon the point is direct and positive. I have space to name but a few.

Judge Boardman, well known in Wisconsin for many years as a thoughtful, influential Spiritualist, repeatedly assured me that he could distinctly remember many things that transpired in his preëxistent life.

Judge Elliott, quite as much of a mathematician as jurist, used to interest his friends by similar direct statements.

Harold Harring, the Polish scholar, author and personal friend of Dr. Redfield, the New York physiognomist, often affirmed in the most positive manner, that he could remember many acts and events occurring in his preëxistent home in the heavens. Others testify to the same facts. Preëxistence is to them positive knowledge. Negative testimony upon this subject is of little account. That blind men do not see the sun is their misfortune—nothing more.

Theodore Parker said in Music Hall, Boston, in 1857: "We thank thee, oh, Father, for this atom of spirit, a particle from thine own flame of eternity which thou hast lodged in this clay." ("Bible of the Ages," p. 322.)

"A strain of gentle music," says Charles Dickens—"or the rippling of water in a silent place, or the odor of a flower, or even the mention of a familiar word, will sometimes call up sudden dim remembrances of scenes that never were in this life; which vanish like a breath; which some brief memory of a happier existence, long gone by, seemed to have awakened."

Poets in their more inspired moments often sing of pre-existence:

"I have dreamed
Of sinless men and maids, mated in heaven
Ere yet their souls had sought for beauteous forms
To give them human sense and residence."

—HOLLAND.

"And in the spheral chime they listening heard
The soul's high destiny, which, being sunk
Into this fleeting life, through obscure paths Must wander, fighting still a Godlike fight—Victor, through death!"

—SCHELLING.

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Has had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar,
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come From God, who is our home."

—WORDSWORTH.

As a fitting close to this essay, I quote from Schiller's "Mystery of Reminiscence," which is a surpassing poem of the soul's recognition:

"Were once our beings blent and intertwining
And for that glory still my heart is pining;
Knew we the light of some refulgent sun
When once our souls were one?

"Round us in waters of delight forever
Ravishingly flowed the heavenly nectar river;
We were the masters of the seal of things
And where truth in her ever living springs
Quivered our glancing wings.

* * * * * * *

"Weep for the godlike life we lost afar
That thou and I its scattered fragments are:
And still the unconquered yearning we retain,
Sigh to renew the long and vanished reign
And grow divine again."

The foregoing was placed in W. J. Colville's hands by Dr. J. M. Peebles March 6, 1906, during a delightful visit to Battle Creek in the course of which W. J. Colville expressed an earnest desire to embody in this volume some statement of conviction or confession of faith from one of the most highly venerated, widely traveled, richly educated and generous-hearted Spiritualists in the world. The career of Dr. J. M. Peebles is known and honored the wide world over. At the ripe age of eighty-five years we found this stalwart veteran hale, hearty, energetic and brimming over with good will and resolute determination to still further continue his work and travel in the interest of the great cause to which he has nobly devoted his unusually long and singularly useful life. Blessed by such advocates as the veteran "Pilgrim," the advocacy of Spiritualism is indeed secure.

CHAPTER XXIII

CONCLUSION—STRIKING INCIDENTS RELATED BY WELL-KNOWN WITNESSES

In submitting to our readers such startling incidents as the following we make no claims whatever for the narratives, which are simply inserted at the close of this volume as contributions from the highly respectable narrators who vouch for what they describe over their respective signatures. All honest testimony deserves consideration.

New York City, March 10, 1906.

Mr. W. J. Colville, Care of Banner of Light,
Boston, Mass.

My dear Mr. Colville:—Having read your request for authenticated evidences of Spirit-communion in the Banner of Light of recent date, I take great pleasure in sending you herewith a few of our many experiences, and to assure you that you may make such use of this letter and its contents as you may see fit, using my name in full. Our small circle awaits with eagerness the publication of your book, to which we have had the pleasure to be among the earliest subscribers.

To those who may doubt the truth of the statements made below, I wish to say that if they will apply their time and money to the investigation of these and kindred phenomena with as much liberality as they devote to purely material pleasures, devoid of any mental, moral or spiritual advantage, they will find the truth of the purpose of a more spiritual than material life and truths and marvels much greater and purer, than are contained in any system of theology or philosophy. I simply state facts and leave it to the reader to make his own deductions.

With best wishes for your welfare and an enthusiastic reception of your book, I have the honor to remain,

Yours very sincerely,

DR. V. VON UNRUH.

MATERIALIZATION

Two seances were held at our own house with two well known media. There being present our little circle, consisting of my friend, Dr. H. and his wife, my wife, myself and my wife's sister, who were all well known to the media, no strange influence was expected to disturb the phenomena.

The remarkable incidents worthy to be mentioned were the following: I was called in front of the improvised cabinet by the medium and saw his wife seated in a chair inside the cabinet in a deep trance. Around her feet there were two distinct accumulations of what seemed to be lace, interwoven with sparkling lights, and presently growing larger, stouter and taller until suddenly they were lifted up as if by invisible hands, and assumed the shape of a toga, within which I beheld at the same moment the shape and figure of a man and a woman, who then stepped out of the cabinet. This all was done by the light of a small red photographer's lamp, which we always use during our seances and which gives light enough to distinguish the pattern of the wall paper eight feet distant. Then there appeared a form, strange to us, who swinging her hands and arms above and around her head and occasionally rubbing the palms of her hands together, began in this way to weave out of the air a piece of lace, increasing in size every moment until it was about six by eight feet square. We were then told to grasp it at the margin and span it tightly across the space between the cabinet and our semicircle in front of it. Then slowly we let go of the lace which the spirit gathered in in the same manner as described before, and finally showed us her empty hands. We were anxious to retain a piece of such lace and asked for it; but were told that such lace made out of the air would soon disintegrate, yet if the spirit were given some silken fabric she would take out of it one thread and make a piece of lace which would keep forever. I gave the spirit my necktie from which she took one thread, still standing outside of the cabinet and began the same manipulations as before and after about thirty seconds handed back my necktie within which was enclosed a piece of lace, which is still in my possession, mounted between two slabs of glass. That there are spirits who lack the politeness of better-bred earth folk was also shown us at this seance. The medium outside of the cabinet received a sudden slap in the face, which was audible as a loud handclap all over the room; we did not know what to think of it until the medium said, some foolish spirit had slapped him in the face, but that he took such things good-naturedly, because resenting had done no good in the past and the evil-doer always apologized stante pede; but as the medium's spectacles had been broken I thought that such pranks were altogether out of place. Then we witnessed several materializations and dematerializations outside of the cabinet. In the seance room then appeared directly at our feet a small cloud of light, dangling and dancing as it were, on the carpet, then around that cloud the luminous and sparkling lace and the two uniting folding over a form in less than half a minute. After greeting and a few private remarks the spirit, claiming to be that of my friend's mother, stepped back about two feet and collapsed, her feet disappearing first and her head bowing down forward touching the carpet after which all disappeared into nothingness.—An Indian, "Little Eagle Eye" who came to me at every seance told me, that he would like to have a pair of moccasins to take them to spirit-land. I bought a pair and wrote on the sole of each moccasin "Little Eagle Eye" in ink which at writing showed up blue, but which turned black after a day or two. I gave them to him at this seance, four days after. When he appeared he said to me, "What you got for me? Me know, me see you write my name on them, blue like war paint." He at once put them on, and when he dematerialized they also disappeared and I have never seen them since. On a subsequent occasion I asked him what he had done with the moccasins, he replied that he had taken them to spirit-land.—There also appeared for me a man, wearing a high cone-shaped hat which was so illuminated as to dazzle one. He said he was "Pardee," lived under the second Egyptian dynasty and came to tell me that he was my musical guide. In this connection I wish to narrate what will be to Non-Spiritualists a very remarkable incident. A young gentleman acquaintance who came to dine with us one evening, fully a year after the aforementioned seance, and for whose entertainment I was playing the piano, turned suddenly to me and said: "Do you know anybody by the name of Pardee? I see him standing by you and he turns to me and says: I am Pardee,—and then he points with his hand towards you." We had not seen this young man for more than a year and by no possibility could he have known of the aforementioned seance or the name of Pardee. This did not astonish us, as we knew the young man to be a clairvoyant. This could not have been Telepathy, for the young man's description of the appearance of the spirit agreed with our knowledge of the materialized spirit Pardee.—I must relate one more incident that happened at our seance. "Lucy," the guide of the medium came out of the cabinet first as usual and then disappeared for quite a long while, perhaps twenty minutes. When she appeared again she said, "Friends, I must tell you something very funny; I have just been over to Mr. X's house in Brooklyn, where they were getting ready to begin their seance; when the medium in the cabinet was about to seat himself in his chair he tripped and fell on the floor and all the sitters were laughing." Lucy herself seemed to be quite amused. The next morning my telephone rang and the unfortunate medium asked me whether Lucy had told us about it and I answered that she had. He then said that his fall had been a quite painful one and that he had difficulty in walking.

Apport

For the benefit of those, who distrust professional mediums, I will give an account of one of our own family-sittings, composed of myself and wife, our two children, aged ten and eleven, and my friend and his wife, all living under the same roof. On December 31, 1905 (Sunday), we held our usual weekly seance. Soon after the beginning of our seance I felt something touching my hair and mentioned this. A few minutes after my forehead was touched by a small, hard object, which instantly dropped on the glass cover of the music box in front of me. On examination we found it to be a genuine case of apport, the object being a solid gold cross in the form of an Egyptian crux ansata, surmounted by an Ibis. The dimensions of this object are about two inches in height and one inch in breadth.

A Spirit has Her Portrait Painted

When my book, "In the World Celestial," was in press I met the heroine of it, Pearl, at a seance. She assured me that the scenes and conditions of the spirit world, as described in the book were substantially correct, and that the story as a whole, is true to life. I said to her, "My dear Pearl, I should very much like to have a portrait of you for the book." She replied, "I will try to have one painted for you." She did not succeed, however, in getting a satisfactory likeness until the fourth edition of the book was about to be issued. On the evening of January 25, 1905, Pearl met me at a trumpet seance and made an appointment with me to meet her at the home of two sisters, famous psychics, the next day, where she felt confident we would succeed in getting a portrait of her. My wife went with me to that appointment, and will sustain the statement of facts I herewith submit. The two sisters and ourselves entered the seance room, at three o'clock in the afternoon. I selected from a number of others an artist's canvas on a stretcher, twenty by twenty-four inches, which was placed in front of a south window, through which the sun was shining. One of the sisters seated herself on one side, and the other on the other side of the window, and each grasped the edge of the stretcher next to her with one hand. My wife and I seated ourselves immediately in front, and within easy reach of the canvas. We kept our eyes steadily fixed upon it to carefully witness any phenomena that might be presented. In about three minutes a cloud passed over the canvas and settled upon it, forming a pearl gray background for the picture. A few minutes later the outlines of a form appeared. This grew gradually more distinct until in about forty minutes, from the time we had taken our seats, the picture was complete. It was the portrait of a beautiful woman, in the full bloom of mature womanhood, with golden hair and blue eyes, a perfect blonde. I had known Pearl when she was a girl, and this portrait bears a striking resemblance to her as I remember her. I have met her at seances since, and she has assured me that the portrait is a correct likeness of her, as she appears in her present development. I had her picture reproduced for the fourth edition of my book, in the style known as photogravure, a new process by which photographs are made direct from the negative on white plate paper.

This experience settles the matter, with us, that spirits can have their portraits painted, by some occult process which is beyond the ken of mortal artists. Art critics who have seen this picture pronounce it above criticism as a work of art, and they are puzzled to know by what process it could have been produced, as it is different from any style of painting with which they are familiar.

The soul-inspiring truths of Spirit-return, wafted on the wings of love after the transition of my dearly beloved mother Julia Pond, have been a well-spring of joy to us. Being isolated from all people of this cult, and never having been in sympathy with the thought of Spirit-return, not having read any literature of that nature; my experiences have been phenomenal, first conceiving it imaginary, subsequently developing clairaudience. We feared dementia, not consulting a physician, but prostrated for several weeks, after which unconscious entrancement, when my husband apprehended death (as we interpreted transition). After a hard struggle, the vision was made clear, highly developed instructors were brought, embellishing me with gifts which I of myself have never sought. Singing in all voices where mortal voice of its own volition has never reached. Instruments coming through the vocal organs, also inspired writings. These manifestations proving to us the continuity of life, and the thin veil between the two worlds interpenetrating each other's lives like one great family. This innovation in our lives has been an education as well as inspiration to reach out after the aggrandizing truths which are given us through the realm of Spirit.

INTRODUCTION.

In any attempt to popularize such an essentially mystical work as the Kabbalah the main point to be kept in view is that "Kabbalah" is a word of far wider significance than is commonly supposed; it is indeed equivalent to "Hermetic" when that term is employed in a wider than ordinary historical connotation. The Jewish Kabbalah is regarded by many scholars as a work of doubtful age and still more dubious authenticity; it is therefore unwise to attempt to speak dogmatically concerning its origin in our present state of relative uncertainty concerning it. But waiving these particular questions, which rightfully pertain only to scholastic controversy, it is entirely within the scope of a popular treatise to consider the main idea which Kabbalah invariably stands for independently of moot questions regarding the authority or authenticity of any special book or books. Kabbalah Denudata is probably the best known of the Latin works in kabbalistic literature. A fairly good English translation of this work, Kabbalah Unveiled, by Macgregor

Mathers, is a familiar volume among students of things generally termed "occult," and as that treatise supplies a vast amount of curious information in a comparatively simple manner, we shall make many references to that extraordinary volume in the course of the following pages.

It may be said that Kabbalism as usually presented is a form of theosophical teaching employing a Hebrew instead of a Greek or Sanscrit terminology. That is the broadest definition which can well be given of it. Those who take a narrower view regard it is solely an esoteric reading of the Torah or Pentateuch, and many European Jews who prize a mystical tradition find in a study of Kabbalah a complete vindication of the highest spiritual claims ever made for the divine origin of the Sacred Books of Israel.

Students of Swedenborg may readily trace many resemblances between parts of the Kabbalah and Swedenborg's monumental interpretation of the Pentateuch-Arcana Celestia, in which he undertakes to show that there are three distinct senses in which every word of the Torah may be understood, though he by no means confines this three-fold theory of correspondences to the first five books of the Old Testament. The subject is one which exerts great fascination for many Bible students who feel a profound reverence for the sacred text but cannot believe that its claims to veneration are to be found in its external letter, which is often crude and barbarous. Enlightened thinkers cannot bring themselves to endorse the savage idea that the Supreme Being, or indeed that any celestial messengers, would command or even sanction wholesale massacres such as are often attributed literally to divine orders in various portions of the Pentateuch; they consequently hail with delight a canon of interpretation which assures them that the harsh letter is only like the shell of nuts or the skin of fruit, concealing luscious and nutritious food beneath a hard external covering. The statement is often gruffly made that anyone may invent an interior meaning and arbitrarily seek to enforce it upon readers, and also in that manner all so-called esoteric meanings have been given to records which originally contained no more than their obvious external statements. Though this contention is sometimes plausible it is extremely shallow, and evidences complete lack of familiarity with the real nature of all literature reputed sacred; for all venerated scriptures were written in times and in circumstances when and where the production of books was a distinguished art, and one in which only the foremost members of civil and ecclesiastical orders were proficient. It is not, however, with the genuineness, authenticity or authority of sacred writings in general that we have now to deal, but only with a strange but intensely interesting fragment thereof, one that certainly takes high place among exceptional literary curiosities and at the same time furnishes unusually deep material for thoughtful contemplation.

In Jewry there have always been esotericists who have refused to admit that the conventional superficial readings of the Torah common to Talmudists suffice to explain the hidden mysteries contained behind the veil of seeming literal history and legislation, which is all that the Pentateuch presents to the view of the average commentator. The average rabbinical exposition is either ethical, ceremonial, historical or a combination of the three. The Kabbalist by no means spurns all or any of these explanations, but insists that we have not approached even to the threshold of the most important meaning until we have pierced the traditional crust and found something far more essential beneath it. It is now pretty generally acknowledged that the first eleven chapters of Genesis are far more allegorical than literal, and it is frequently proclaimed by prominent religious ministers that we do not require a sacred volume to simply teach us ancient Jewish or other outward history. Since the time when Charles Darwin, Alfred Russel Wallace and a few other stalwart champions of the theory of evolution in its pioneer days battled for a restatement of the prevailing theory of creation, or else the substitution of a completely new theory of the cosmos, only very few persons of respectable intelligence have sought to teach that the whole Solar System, of which our world is only a minute portion, was created by divine fiat in 6 literal days of 24 hours each; but though it is now admitted on every hand that the Hebrew word yom is of varied significance, often applying to an indefinite period and at other times to only a literal terrestrial day, those who accompany the Kabbalists into the field of purely esoteric meanings are not yet very numerous, though certainly increasing. Swedenborg has not been very widely read by the average reader, still he is by no means an unknown or altogether neglected author, therefore the statement that the six days of creation enumerated in the first chapter of Genesis have a distinctly spiritual significance will not come to all as a complete surprise. To understand the Kabbalistic or Hermetic viewpoint one must change the generally accepted tenses of the prominent verbs, translating all statements out of the past into an ever-living present. In place, therefore, of the familiar phrase "God spake and it was done" we should substitute "God speaks and it is done." This difference in grammatical construction clearly emphasizes the radical distinction between 2 essentially opposite views of divine activity, for we cannot speak of operations in the past tense without thinking of something as having been performed in times gone by which is not now occurring, neither can we employ the present tense without unmistakably conveying an idea of uninterruptable continuity.

In ordinary Jewish liturgies we find many traces of the thought we are now emphasizing, and nowhere does it blaze forth more conspicuously than in such a benediction as "Blessed art thou, Eternal Ruler of the universe, who daily renewest the work of creation." Indeed the very word eternal suggests unmistakably neither beginning nor ending, but everlasting duration and consequent unbroken continuity of activity.

The characteristic words in the Kabbalah are unfamiliar only to ears unaccustomed to Hebrew sounds, and these can certainly be no stranger than Sanscrit terms in European ears, and Sanscrit words are now in some instances—karma and yoga, for example—almost an accepted part of an English vocabulary among persons who have caught even a few glimpses of theosophical literature.

As the Kabbalah is evidently a work well repaying diligent investigation, and all sorts of curious books are now undergoing examination, we offer the following series of essays simply with a view to giving the general and non-technical reader an outline idea of a treasure-house of knowledge and mystery which it would require an immense amount of diligence and patience to extensively explore. As the doctrine of Kabbalah has a thoroughly practical as well as a mysterious and also a magical aspect, we do not think it a vain endeavor to seek to cull a few fragrant flowers from this ancient and mysterious garden or to delve for a few gems within this largely unworked spiritual mine. The great search for unity and attainment of equilibrium is the leading motif of all truly kabbalistic studies, which are therefore in full accord with all the highest aspirations of our day.

CHAPTER I.

A GENERAL OUTLINE OF KABBALAH.

The best known portion of Kabbalah is called ZOHAR and the most widely circulated translations thereof are termed respectively: "The Book of Concealed Mystery," "The Greater Holy Assembly," "The Lesser Holy Assembly." The origin of the word "Kabbalah" is from the Hebrew qibel, meaning "to receive." The 70 Elders in Israel constituting the Sanhedrin, the highest of all councils, which held its deliberations within the precincts of the Temple in Jerusalem, according to an ancient tradition received their esoteric information from a school of angels in Paradise whose representatives on earth these 70 wise men considered themselves to be. It was in the midst of these greatest teachers in Israel that when a boy Jesus was discovered at the time of his bar mitzvah, 12 or 13 years of age, according to the testimony of the New Testament. To-day it is not difficult for people to readily understand in what high esteem these Elders and their teachings must have been held by devoted Israelites who sincerely believed them to constitute a company of exceptionally holy persons distinguished above all others by reason of remarkable wisdom and exceptional purity of life.

The language of the Kabbalah is partly Hebrew and partly Chaldee. The 22 letters constituting the alphabet of these 2 languages are interpreted by Kabbalists in a manner to greatly interest the many at present who attach much importance to numbers in some mystical and symbolical significance. Letters and numbers are one in these ancient languages. The following table shows at a glance the Roman characters which are the equivalents of the Hebrew and Chaldee:

Hebrew and Chaldee	Roman Characters	Significance	Number
Aleph	A	Ox	1
Beth	B	House	2
Gimel	G	Camel	3
Daleth	D	Door	4
He	H	Window	5
Vau	V	Peg, nail	6
Zayin	Z	Weapon, sword	7
Heth	Ch	Enclosure, fence	8
Teth	T	Serpent	9
Yod	I	Hand	10
Kaph	K	Palm of hand	20
Lamed	L	Ox-goad	30
Mem	M	Water	40

Hebrew and Chaldee	Roman Characters	Significance	Number
Nun	N	Fish	50
Samech	S	Prop, support	60
Ayin	O	Eye	70
Pe	P	Mouth	80
Tzaddi	Tz	Fish-hook	90
Qoph	Q	Back of head	100
Resh	R	Head	200
Shin	Sh	Tooth	300
Tau	Th	Sign of +	400

As the same rule applies to Greek, in which language also every number is a word and each letter has its special numerical value, it is not difficult to understand in the light of this fact many otherwise obscure, if not altogether unintelligible, statements in the Apocalypse and other symbolical scriptures which appear to the majority of readers to be far more like puzzles than revelations. We notice how the number of the Beast is given as 666, and how largely 7 and 12 enter into all descriptions of whatsoever denotes or attains perfection.

Kabbalistic usage suggests an original universal symbolical language which could be understood by all initiates as Masonic emblems are understood by Freemasons throughout the world. To the flippant mind the employment of symbols seems unnecessarily confusing and suggests the idea of some alleged mystery being hidden from the multitude purposely by hieroglyphists who concealed their knowledge under a veil of allegory which the masses could not penetrate. It may be a fact that certain secret societies have often done and are still doing that very thing, but the primal origin of a sign language is not to be found in any desire for concealment but, on the contrary, to afford a means for worldwide intelligible intercommunication between all the initiated.

The need for a universal language is one of the most pressing requirements of the present day, for with the rapid coming together of peoples long separated by natural as well as by racial barriers, only very recently overcome, we cannot much longer continue a multiplicity of tongues rendering some of us practically dumb in the presence of neighbors with whom we desire to work in friendliest accord. What certain mystic confraternities long ago succeeded in doing within their own sacred precincts we must yet come to do on a much larger and far more public scale. How far a study of Kabbalah may help in this direction may be a somewhat open question, but it stands to reason that if we succeed in throwing light upon the inner meaning of venerated scriptures in a manner to show that there is a hidden Wisdom of which all true religionists are partakers, in consequence of their common scriptural heritage, we shall have done something definite and substantial in the way of bringing venerators of different bibles and professors of diverse creeds very much nearer together than they have yet been generally brought. It is well known among students of Occultism and Mysticism that there has always been a sacred and secret "church within a church" in Christendom, sometimes called "The Church of the Holy Grail." In Jewry the equivalent of this has existed through the ages by means of a Kabbalah. Between the explicit and the implicit of all well-defined creeds and ceremonies there is an immense practical difference, amounting even to the tremendous distinction between the letter which killeth and the spirit which maketh alive. By means of Kabbalah we can easily show that there is no radical opposition of ceremonialism to mysticism, and that the sacrificial system is essentially symbolical only, and intended to dramatically illustrate great truths of universal import which are allegorically portrayed in a record of seemingly external rites and ceremonies. We are not attempting to convey the idea that literal sacrifices were not offered in the Temple at Jerusalem, but we do insist that there was always an esoteric party in Israel which seemingly disregarded the letter because its members clearly perceived the spiritual significance enclosed within it.

Between the esoteric and exoteric schools of interpretation there is always a meeting-place, and one not difficult to discover, but though the esoteric party always knows this, the exoteric party frequently denies it. The chief difference between them is because the esoteric is essentially immeasurably broader, and in all ways far more comprehensive, than the exoteric. Literal forms and distinctions are underlooked rather than overlooked by Kabbalists, and by underlooking we mean looking within, while overlooking may be simply disregarding or excusing.

To the Kabbalist, as to all Israelites, there is but one Supreme Being. "Hear, Israel, The Eternal is our GOD, the Eternal is ONE," is the foundation stone and the universal confession of faith in Israel, but how widely different may be the God-idea in the minds of different classes of equally avowed monotheists we all know fairly well, if we read even contemporary literature only and listen to contemporary preaching.

It is claimed by some respectable schools of Occultists that a large portion of Kabbalistic teaching is traceable to Egyptian sources and that the treasures which the Israelites took out of Egypt at the time of the Exodus were spiritual and intellectual far more than material. Be this as it may, a study of comparative language and philology soon rewards the impartial student with the welcome discovery that all systems of religion and all languages have largely a common origin; it may therefore prove eventually impossible to assign to any single tongue or system an uniquely exalted position. The Kabbalah deals with cosmology rather than with cosmogony, i. e., it attempts to deal explicitly with the operation of distinctly spiritual forces working behind the screen which veils the divine workshop and the workers therein from physical observation. The various Sephiroth, by whom the worlds are brought into existence and perpetually maintained are variously regarded by different interpreters as simply distinctly distinguishable attributes of one Supreme Creator and as distinct hierarchies or companies of celestial intelligences all working out the plan and purpose of the Supreme One. It is worthy of note that Professor Alfred Russel Wallace in his extremely valuable scientific work, "The World of Life," though he was a naturalist and a foremost evolutionist, teaches a doctrine of companies of angels so near to the teachings of Kabbalah as to be perfectly reconcilable therewith. Wallace was the protagonist among British evolutionists of a school of scientific thought which furnishes a bond of union between Materialism and Spiritualism by showing how necessary is the idea of involution as a basis for a reasonable view of evolution. The stupid use of the word evolution, as though it were explanatory of everything, has been shown up to the fullest extent by Wallace, though he was the contemporary discoverer with Charles Darwin of those very facts in natural science which led to the acceptance of the evolutionary theory throughout the Western Hemisphere during the latter part of the 19th century.

The following quotation from the famous Dr. Ginsburg's "Essay on the Kabbalah" is well worthy of serious reflection. This learned author, defining Kabbalah, says: "A system of religious philosophy, or more properly, of theosophy, which not only exercised for hundreds of years an extraordinary influence on the mental development of a people so shrewd as the Jews, but has captivated the minds of some of the greatest thinkers in Christendom in the 16th and 17th centuries, claims the greatest attention of both the philosopher and the theologian." This scholar then proceeds to mention a number of the prominent men of distinction in various fields of learning who were staunch adherents to Kabbalah, among them Raymond Lully, Cornelius Henry Agrippa, John Baptist von Helmont, Robert Fludd and Dr. Henry More, all of whom, and many others, were among the profoundest scholars of their day. The claims of Kabbalah, he contends, were by no means exclusively confined to literary men and philosophers; poets, too, have found in its ample material an inspiration to the exercise of their utmost genius, for, as Dr. Ginsburg enthusiastically exclaims, "How can it be otherwise with a theosophy which we are assured was born of GOD in Paradise, was nursed and reared by the choicest of the angelic hosts in heaven, and only held converse with the holiest of man's children upon earth." The story of Kabbalah is intensely fascinating and even awe-inspiring, for it is claimed that GOD first taught it to a select company of angels who formed a theosophic school in Paradise. After the Fall the angels graciously communicated this celestial doctrine to the disobedient children of earth, to furnish the protoplasts (projectors of systems) with the means of returning to their pristine nobility and felicity. The record of the migration of the heavenly doctrine tells us that it was originally given to Adam (not a single individual, but, as Swedenborg has said, "a church" or company of persons of a certain type bound in a particular fellowship). From Adam it passed to Noah (again a company, not a single individual), then to Abraham who took it to Egypt, where he allowed a portion of it to ooze out. From Egypt it travelled, in some measure, to several other lands, so that eventually various Oriental nations possessed some portion of it in their philosophies. It is recorded of Moses, who was learned in all Egyptian wisdom, that though he gained his first knowledge of the sacred teaching in the land of his birth, he learned still more of it during the period of wandering in the wilderness. It is further claimed that through his possession of this sublime doctrine Moses was able to settle all manner of disputes which arose among the people in the course of their desert journeyings. Throughout the entire 40 years of the journey between Egypt and Palestine it is stated that the great law-giver was in constant communion with one of the angels who constituted the theosophic school in Paradise, and that he conveyed the truths communicated from heaven through the medium of 4 of the books of the Pentateuch, but withheld all such teaching from Deuteronomy. According to the same tradition Moses initiated the 70 original Elders of the Sanhedrin into the mysteries he had received from the angels; and they in turn taught them to pupils who in due course became their successors. Of all who were initiated it is said that David and Solomon were the most deeply versed. As the doctrine was originally communicated by oral instruction only, there was no written Kabbalah till a much later date, about the time of the destruction of the 2d temple, when Schimeon ben Jochai dared to write it. Subsequently his son, Rabbi Eleazar, and his secretary, Rabbi Abba, together with several of his disciples, collated his treatises and out of them composed the book called Zohar (splendor), which is the great storehouse of Kabbalism.

The Kabbalah is usually classed under 4 heads called respectively Practical, Literal, Unwritten, Dogmatic.

Practical Kabbalah deals with ceremonial magic and gives much information regarding talismans.

Literal Kabbalah is divided into 3 parts known as Gematria, Notariqon, Temura.

Gematria is based on the relative numerical value of words.

Notariqon is a title suggestive of the Latin word notarius, meaning a shorthand writer, and the contents justify the appellation.

Temura means permutation. The methods employed for arriving at the value of words are various and intricate, so much so that it requires great patience and perseverance to work out the examples.

The Dogmatic Kabbalah contains the specific doctrine and is less of a puzzle than the foregoing; it is, however, by no means easy reading and far too mysterious to awaken much response from any others than special students who love to delve deeply into profound spiritual mysteries. The principal doctrines relate to The Nature and Attributes of the Supreme Being; Cosmogony; Creation of Angels and Men; Destiny of Men and Angels; Nature of the Soul; Nature of Angels, Demons and Element-als; Import of the Revealed Law; Transcendental Symbolism of Numerals; Peculiar Mysteries Contained in Hebrew Letters; Equilibrium of Contraries. On every one of these erudite topics minute information is offered, and when one has attempted to grasp even some small portion of the lofty inculcation, there certainly follows a sense of sublime majesty and of glorious purpose in life intensely exhilarating. It may be reasonably concluded that the Kabbalah teaches that the attainment of equilibrium is the goal toward which we are all progressing, and some authorities hesitate not to state that such is the original meaning of taking up the Cross and following a Master. None can dispute the self-evident fact that the cross, as a sacred emblem, is found all over the world and in connection with civilizations antedating by many thousands of years the beginning of the Christian Era. In Kabbalah we have an attempted solution of the mighty problems of our existence, past, present and to come. Whether so complicated and profoundly mysterious a composition will ever play a prominent part in religious unification or not is an open question, but it may certainly be fairly regarded as a storehouse of information calculated to set thinking deeply all students who have the disposition to examine it, guiding them along a path which, if faithfully followed, cannot but lead to the discovery of foundation principles upon which coming generations may erect a temple of universal faith and worship.

CHAPTER II.

INNER SIGNIFICANCE OF THE 22 LETTERS COMPRISING THE HEBREW ALPHABET.

Many and highly ingenious have been the occult and mystical meanings given to each and all of the 22 letters which constitute the Hebrew alphabet by students of Kabbalistic lore, and while some are undoubtedly farfetched and fanciful, we may reasonably decide that there is some solid foundation for many of the traditional values assigned them. The 1st letter, Aleph, like the Greek Alpha (A), signifies the Primal One, the Great Original whence all phenomena proceed. Letters, according to all Kabbalists, are not looked upon as arbitrary characters artificially invented, but as thought-pictures, symbolically expressive of mental states, too profound to be stated in words. Each letter, then, can stand alone with a distinctive value, like a figure, and we know that in Hebrew there are no figures apart from letters, each letter having its definite numerical value. As Aleph literally means an ox it has often been astrologically associated with the sign Taurus, the Bull. A has stood in Hebrew as the first letter of one of the names applied to Deity, AHIH, signifying I AM, or underived Being, the source and permanent support of all manifest existence. All Kabbalists declare that God is partly concealed and partly revealed. The letter A denotes revelation and also signifies strength, unity and concord.

The 2d letter, Beth (B), means radically a house or home and is said to refer allegorically to that inner chamber or closet into which a Master invites his disciples to enter for private prayer. This is none other than the interior sanctuary of human nature, the veritable "heart" which must be kept with all possible diligence, because out of it proceed all the issues of life. Heart and ark have the same meaning in the Kabbalah; this explains the extreme reverence shown to the Holy Ark whenever it is referred to in the Hebrew Scriptures. Beth is also regarded as the primal mother, Aleph being the father; it refers, moreover, to acquisition.

The 3d letter, Gimel (G), means a camel, which suggests fortitude and wondrous power of endurance, for that strange animal, familiarly known as "the ship of the desert," can endure hardships and privations that no other quadruped could sustain. Hieroglyphically this letter signifies a half-closed hand extended to grasp whatever may be needed for its owner's sustenance.

The 4th letter, Daleth (D), means a door or gateway. An early form of this letter was a triangle, the shape of a tent-door, which form is preserved in Greek in the shape of the letter Delta. As we study the accounts in various Sacred Writings of buildings said to have been constructed under Divine direction, according to the various Bibles of the world, we find that each of them had but a single door; this fact is regarded by Kabbalists as a matter of profound significance, and Occultists of many schools say that it refers definitely to a sole method of initiation into the Greater Mysteries. Daleth is mystically connected with the soul of the universe. On a purely physical plane it denotes the womb or matrix throughout nature; it also is associated with ideas of strength and grandeur.

The 5th letter, He (E), means a window, but it also refers to aspiration or ascending breath. The full significance of this letter is said to be an established dual base in which masculinity and femininity are united in perfect equilibrium, constituting, therefore, a foundation which cannot be removed.

The 6th letter, Vav (V), means a hook or peg, something upon which something else may be hung; the meaning extends to a central support. Symbolically Vav (or Vau) relates to Beauty, Charity and Love. Astrologers often associate it with Taurus and speak of it in connection with cervical strength, and as the neck unites the head with the rest of the body Vau has been mentioned with valve and mystically referred to as the blending point between upper and lower Manas in our interior consistency.

The 7th letter, Zayin (Z), means radically a sword or any sort of weapon, but hieroglyphically it stands for an arrow. Being the 7th letter, many have been the sacred ideas associated with it, and frequently is it referred to as the sign of spiritualized or regenerated humanity. Persons familiar with the "Tarot" will find close connection between Zayin and the Chariot in which rides the Conqueror crowned with a diadem on which are placed 3 golden pentagrams, while above his head is an azure star-decked canopy. The equivalent Greek letter, Zeta, means something sought and obtained, showing a close relation in this, as in many other instances, between the Greek and Hebrew alphabets.

The 8th letter, Heth (H), means a field, or, in somewhat wider significance, any definite place surrounded by a hedge or fence. Owing to its close alliance with hah, meaning a hook, some commentators have attached that meaning also to it; it has also been connected etymologically with the Arabic word khath which signifies something that has descended or been poured down. From these distinct but nearly related meanings this letter has been spoken of as indicating in some manner the power of mind over matter, or of the higher over the lower planes of human intellect. Poetical writers who delight in drawing out the utmost meaning possible from Hebrew letters have taken advantage of the idea of the octave note in connection with this 8th letter in the sacred alphabet and have associated Heth with the New Jerusalem and with The Garden of Hesperides wherein are gathered together the numberless souls of the righteous who have passed through Libra, the 7th zodiacal sign, and have thereby attained to the eminence of an equilibrated estate in consciousness.

The 9th letter, Teth (T), literally signifies a serpent, and as 9 is the highest of our single numerals and the serpent is allegorically an emblem of great and universal importance in the history of human regeneration—because all that the serpent stands for must be lifted up by a transmutative process in order that regeneration may be completed—much value is attached by Kabbalists to this letter. The Greek equivalent letter, Thaita, meaning a servant, truly explains the rightful place of the reptilian element in human economy. All that the serpent connotes must be rendered subservient to the higher principle in humanity, and when this right relatedness is accomplished the serpent-force, which works so much havoc when dominating or uncontrolled, becomes a valuable and necessary base upon which a glorious superstructure of noble character and high achievement can be upraised.

The 10th letter, Iod (I), means the hand. It has been designated the head of the 4th triad from unity, and the culmination of the Spherotic series. It has also been declared that from heth all other Hebrew letters proceed, it representing both the origin and synthesis of forces, therefore it symbolizes spiritual perfection. This letter, which denotes the hand, is naturally associated in idea with an extension of the active principle of life in all directions. Its Greek equivalent, Iota, stands for the lowest of one series and the highest of another. As the number 10 and its multiples occupy so extremely exalted a place in the esteem of Kabbalists the first 10 letters of the alphabet are considered much richer in primal significance than the remaining 12, but each of those has a distinct value worthy of careful consideration.

The 11th letter, Kaph (K), is the first of the 2d and (in a sense) higher series. This letter means the palm of the hand and specially denotes strength. As heth may be connected with a closed hand containing all potencies unrevealed, kaph is the same member opened out and displaying its inwrought possibilities. Here in connection with the mysterious number 11, about which we often hear remarkable stories, we are introduced to all that the opened hand signifies.

The 12th letter, Lamed (L), means literally an ox-goad, an instrument of chastisement intended to force an animal to do its full share of work should it at any time show signs of negligence. Lamech (vide Genesis IV, 18-24) is said to represent a complete personification of the qualities suggested by Lamed. Lamed represents the opening of Spring, the period when Pisces melts into Aries and the reign of the "2 Fishes" is, for that year, at an end.

The 13th letter, Mem (M), means water. It is often called the 2d of the 3 maternal letters of the Hebrew alphabet (Aleph, Mem, Shin). In its present form, which has been maintained from remote antiquity, it resembles a ripple on the surface of water. The astrological zigzag lines denoting Aquarius have the same origin and significance. Water is occultly significant of the intellectual plane of human existence and the name Moses (Moshe) literally means one who has been drawn up out of water, mystically lifted above the intellectual region to a plane of spiritual consciousness.

The 14th letter, Nun (N), means a fish, a living creature born and intended to live in water. Fish have always been closely associated with divine activities in some peculiar manner, which accounts for the similitude employed in the story of Jonah, an ancient Hebrew poem fraught with extremely profound spiritual instruction and alluded to in the Christian gospels as containing a sign of permanent value to warn all who may ever be inclined to stray from the path of divine direction. Every student of comparative religion and philology must be impressed with the persistent frequency with which fish and processes pertaining to fishing are mentioned in close connection with the life and conduct of great spiritual teachers. Joshua, who succeeds Moses and actually conducts the Children of Israel into the Land of Promise, is styled in Exodus, Son of Nun. The name Joshua signifies a guide, a leader, deliverer, emancipator, and is the Hebrew equivalent of Jesus.

The 15th letter, Samech (X), means a prop, a strong support. In Greek as in Hebrew X stands before O and there is said to be a valid Kabbalistic reason for this occurrence and recurrence of priority. An ancient Judaic tradition connects X with Cochab, a star, sometimes a comet. Treatises on alchemy abound in references to this letter, which for some reason is treated as one of far greater than average importance.

The 16th letter, Ayin (O), has 2 distinct meanings—the Eye and a fountain. In its highest connotation it stands for a symbol of the All Seeing Eye and for interior perception of truth, pure intuitive discernment of reality. In its secondary signification it refers emblematically to the outflowing of truth from some hidden realm of consciousness as water proceeds from some hidden spring when expressing itself in the constant flowing of a fountain. Ayin stands for the Cyclopean Eye. Historical associations have connected this letter with En-gedi, the "Goat's Fountain," which is about 300 stadia from Jerusalem, a place often mentioned in the Bible as the scene of important struggles, notably the strife between Saul and David (vide I Samuel XXIV, 1-4). According to Kabbalistic symbologists, Saul and David are respectively impersonations of a lower and a higher state in spiritual evolution, and as the one rises the other falls. Alchemists in their peculiar terminology refer to the same conflict when they speak of the perpetual struggle between the mystical Sulphur and Mercury, our rational and sensuous elements.

The 17th letter, Pe (P), literally means mouth, and many are the ingenious poetical dissertations extant, scattered through Kabbalistic lore, alike ancient and modern, placing this letter in the gate of Praise. The Divine Word is said to be concealed in the human mouth and the truly initiated utter forth this potential Word when they truly sound the praises of the ALL HOLY. Though we all understand clearly enough the literal humane injunction not to muzzle an ox which treadeth out our corn, by Kabbalists "Muzzle not the mouth of the ox that treadeth out thy corn" is treated as a repository of profound esoteric counsel relating to spiritual husbandry, with which external agricultural works truly correspond.

The 18th letter, Tsadi (Ts), means literally a fishing hook. The form of this letter is highly suggestive of this significance. We have found curious books on alchemy dealing with its connection with that mysterious Leviathan concerning which the searching question is raised in that wondrous epic poem known as JOB, "Canst thou draw out Leviathan with a hook?" (Job XL, 1). Tsadi, being the 18th letter, is said to share many of the qualities ascribed to the 8th letter, Heth, but to possess these qualities on a higher plane and to express them in a more definitely spiritual manner. Tsadi has been termed the spiritual hook ever baited and set in the sea of Heth. It may be remembered that the 18th figure in the Tarot, corresponding with Heth, is the Moon, which is there exhibited as standing or shining over a field in which we behold 3 living creatures —a dog, a wolf and a fish. The moon is represented as shedding blood upon the earth, and as blood contains the vital principle, in all esoteric schools it is taught that the symbol of pouring out blood signifies conveying vitalizing energy.

The 19th letter, Qoph (Q), means literally the back of the head. Hieroglyphically Qoph has been represented by an axe, a sharp incisive weapon. Alchemists attach importance to the meaning of this letter in connection with energy manifesting in manual dexterity and accomplishing the work of materialization of hitherto volatile substances. Related to Qoph we find qopha, which means to thicken or congeal.

The 20th letter, Resh (R), stands for the whole head and particularly for the front portion containing the countenance. The Tarot figure corresponding with Resh is the sign of Judgment and displays Gabriel appearing amid clouds while a resurrection is taking place, the dead being seen rising out of their graves. This is easily understood as mystical and not literal, and we have often wondered how any Bible student who has pondered over the 37th chapter of Ezekiel could find any difficulty in connecting resurrection solely with moral and spiritual revival and higher attainment, and not at all with physical resuscitation.

The 21st letter, Shin (S or Sh), means literally only a tooth, but being the 21st letter in the alphabet and 3 times 7 being regarded by all Kabbalists as an extremely sacred numerical combination, we must look below this surface definition to grasp the esoteric significance of this mysterious letter with which numerous mystical ideas and magical rites have long and frequently been associated. Shin has been engraven upon phylacteries to remind devout Jews of omnipresent Deity. This letter varies somewhat in form. When a dot is placed over its left prong it is rendered Sin, an old Oriental title of the Moon. Exodus tells us of the wanderings of the Children of Israel in the Wilderness of Sin and while they were still roaming the desert they received the Law from Sin-ai.

The 22d and final letter, Tau (T or Th), is an ancient form of the Cross. All students of comparative religion and art know well how universally employed has been this much venerated, disputed and execrated emblem. Volumes could easily and profitably be written upon every one of its manifold significations, among which the 2 of utmost importance are the ideals of unification and of sacrifice. As Tau (the sign of the cross) stands at the end of the sacred alphabet it immediately suggests a finished work or completed initiation, therefore has it been continually affirmed that an initiate dies upon the cross to his old estate when he attains hierophancy and quickly rises to a new and far more glorious condition than any he has enjoyed previously. Taking up the cross and following the Master involves passing through all the initiatory stages hieroglyphically portrayed by the employment of the 22 Hebrew letters in an esoteric or mystical manner. Alchemy rightly understood, as it was taught by Paracelsus and other profound philosophers in Europe a few centuries ago, was no mere art of converting copper, silver, and other less valuable metals into material gold, though we by no means deny the possibility of literal transmutations in chemical or alchemical laboratories. The last letter of the Hebrew alphabet suggests death upon the cross as a gateway to a new and higher life and closely associated with its deeper meanings is the truth conveyed in those sublime utterances of some great seer and sage of ancient Israel, "Better is the end of a thing than its beginning" and "Better is the day of death unto him (the righteous man) than the day of birth." Such sublime sayings as the latter of these are apt to strike the unthinking as pessimistic, because the shallow mind thinks not of death (properly transition) as only a step out of one state of conscious existence into another. Death and end, in the Kabbalistic meaning of those words, refer only to the termination of some certain stage or process in development, literally the achievement of some definite end we have had in view, then having reached that end we are ready for an entirely new beginning, but one that would have been impossible for us had it not been for all the disciplinary experience which preceded it and led up to it.

Though our brief and very imperfect description of the significance of the 22 Hebrew letters requires many additions to make it in any sense complete, we are assured that readers who are also students will find even in this bare outline much that is suggestive, and if they are fond of making experiments with letters on their own account, and also desirous of reading words and sentences in the Bible with a view to ascertaining something of their Kabbalistic or interior significance, by keeping in mind the definitions herewith supplied they may find their task considerably simplified.

As every letter has its numerical value we close this essay by appending the number belonging to each letter: Aleph, 1; Beth, 2; Gimel, 3; Daleth, 4; He, 5; Vau, 6; Zayin, 7; Heth, 8; Teth, 9; Yod, 10; Kaph, 20; Lamed, 30; Mem, 40; Nun, 50; Samech, 60; Ayin, 70; Pe, 80; Tzaddi, 90; Qoph, 100; Resh, 200; Tau, 400. The relatively large numbers between 400 and 1000 are expressed as follows: Final Qoph, 500; Final Mem, 600; Final Nun, 700; Final Pe, 800; Final Zaddi, 900.

Thousands are denoted by letters of a size larger than that employed to signify the smaller numbers. A large Aleph stands for 1000.

We notice how invariably in Hebrew literature thousands and tens of thousands are mentioned but only multiples of 10 are employed to convey the idea of large numbers beyond a single thousand.

CHAPTER III.

BOOK OF CONCEALED MYSTERY.

The Book of Concealed Mystery opens with the declaration that it is the book of the equilibrium of balance. Equilibrium, a fundamental term in all Kabbalistic writings, signifies harmony which results from the analogy of contraries, the serene centre at which, in consequence of opposing forces being equal in strength, rest succeeds motion. Equilibrium suggests an idea similar to that of Nirvana, a term which when intelligently employed conveys the thought of imperturbable repose, a state impossible for us to fully comprehend on earth because we are in the midst of perpetual tumult and continually subject to the conflicting sway of pairs of opposites. In works on ancient symbolism we often encounter the phrase, "Point within the circle," by which is intended a situation of such unalloyable serenity that though the fiercest strife be raging all around, at that point, which may be the centre of a terrific hurricane or a tremendous scorching flame, complete immunity from turbulence and danger would be, of necessity, enjoyed. The 91st psalm gives the clearest idea of this condition expressible in readily comprehended language, and to the Kabbalist the entire Psalter, consisting of 150 psalms, possesses not only an interior meaning but also a talismanic value, in consequence of which different psalms have been recited frequently in times of extreme difficulty and unusual danger for the purpose of delivering those who recited them piously and understandingly from all sorts of perils, seen and unseen alike. The real meaning of "taking refuge under the shadow of the Almighty," and being safe under the shelter of divine "wings," is only readily comprehensible when we take into account the Hermetic teaching of ancient Egypt, reaffirmed in Europe by Emanuel Swedenborg (18th century) in his descriptions of MAXIMUS HOMO (the Greatest Man) and the respective positions of different companies of angels in the celestial anatomy. All Hermetic students, and all who are versed in Swedenborg, know how plainly it is stated that companies of angels exactly correspond with distinctive portions of the human frame, so that such expressions as "the hand of the Lord," and all of similar character, are taken literally as well as figuratively. This objective view of angelic ministries is by no means discordant with much of the best modern thought; indeed it agrees perfectly with the teaching of that long-famous English naturalist, Alfred Russel

Wallace, who sets forth conceptions of this nature graphically in one of his latest books, "The World of Life," wherein he confesses to complete faith in the real existence and constant operation of those many graded orders of angels who are variously designated by varying schools of Occultists, but in all cases bear a striking relationship to the Sephiroth of the Kabbalah and the Demiurgos of the Gnostics. Certain Jews contend that the Sephiroth are only different aspects and attributes of Deity, while others who cling quite as tenaciously to fundamental monotheism, find ample space for the ministry of companies of angels, regarded as servants of the One Most High. Even a superficial reading of the accepted orthodox Jewish liturgy, in use all over the British Empire as well as in many parts of America and elsewhere, must convince every reader that, unless words are intended to convey no obvious meaning whatsoever, the faith of Israel includes an acknowledgment of many sharply differentiated hosts of beings who with love and reverence carry out, as messenger spirits, the will of the sole Creator. Cherubim, Seraphim, Ophanim, and several other angelic orders are mentioned by name in the ordinary daily prayers, and much more elaborately are they alluded to in the much longer and more complex liturgies appointed for New Year and Day of Atonement.

In the Book of Concealed Mystery a vital line is drawn between positive and negative existence. A definition of positive existence is not difficult, because it necessarily takes action into account, but to define negative existence appears impossible, because directly we attempt definitions we seem compelled to employ a more or less positive terminology. The term Ain Soph, which may be translated as the primal fount whence all manifest existence proceeds, is revealed as Ain Soph Aur, illimitable Light; but of this we can form only a dim conception. It is interesting to note how this concept is set forth alike in the first chapters of Genesis in the Pentateuch, and in the first chapter of the 4th gospel in the New Testament. In the first instance God speaks, or breathes forth, and light appears. In the second instance the essential doctrine of the Logos is fundamentally the same. Students of Plato will readily call to mind how similar was the teaching of that illustrious Greek to the inner teaching of Egyptians and Hebrews contemporary and before his day, and all who have taken delight in the wonderful breadth of doctrine manifested by Philo of Alexandria will follow without difficulty a path of unified philosophizing along which Jews and Gentiles can walk arm in arm, each contributing a glorious share to a gradually evolving doctrine which can serve to unite Hebraism with Hellenism without calling upon either Greek or Jew to surrender aught that is vital in his own distinctive view of the never fully comprehended Universe.

The Jewish Kabbalah properly expresses universal thought in Jewish phraseology, while the Greek employs his own language and symbolism in an equally intelligent and conscientious attempt to interpret the riddle of existence. The Greek love of beauty and the Hebrew passion for a rigid moral law are well known to be sharp points of distinction between the typical Greek and the typical Hebrew mental temperament. Philosophers of renown can easily teach and thrive in both camps, but the general color or tint of their philosophy is sure to differ in accordance with the natural bent of the philosophers. Though we all employ the word Universe with great frequency, such words as Pluriverse and Multiverse are by no means absent from modern philosophic literature, and we often encounter the appellation Pluralist given to a philosopher whose school of thought is sometimes designated Pragmatism, as in the well-known case of Professor William James, for many years professor of psychology at Harvard University, the American Cambridge. If controversialists would seek to remove needless obstacles out of the path of philosophical enquiry, instead of creating fresh difficulties, as they usually do in their foolish attempts to show how very widely one school of thinkers differs from another, it would not be very long before we could attain to something like a state of mental harmony in which we could cordially shake hands with each other intellectually and morally, instead of indulging in worse than useless wrangling. To take the attitude of a true Kabbalist one must be intentionally bent on unifying, never on separating, therefore acrimonious disputations are utterly foreign to the Kabbalistic temper, though they abound in works of commentary into which no esoteric spirit has entered. No words are practically readier of verification than "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," for such is the case in every possible realm of human thought and conduct. Capital punishment, and every other form of barbaric retaliation, is advocated and casuistically justified by professed upholders of a strict moral law, supposedly of divine origin, but no esotericist ever allows the righteousness of any act which does not possess and manifest the attribute of clemency, though that mild quality may sometimes be necessarily associated with the very dissimilar attribute of severity. To be clement and severe at the same instant seems to the superficial reasoner almost an impossibility, but that is only because the average intellect has not grasped the real distinction which ever exists between legitimate pairs of opposites and illegitimate contradictories. Clemency and severity are opposites, but love and hate are contradictories. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth" is altogether intelligible if we understand by chastening purifying; but if we introduce a totally foreign idea and suppose that chastening acts are performed vengefully, and that the inflictor of pain actually delights in causing suffering because he obtains pleasure from making his victims endure agony, we have introduced a fiendish element into our misconception of the right uses of chastisement to such an extent as not only to becloud but to completely subvert its original intent and meaning.

It is true, as Macgregor Mathers and other commentators have declared, that Kabbalists are utterly and relentlessly opposed to all that they consider to even border upon idolatry, but idolatry is a word often used where it is but little understood. An idol, in the objectionable sense, was originally a material object supposed to be endowed with miraculous power, set up as a substitute for a spiritual conception of Deity and worshipped as though it possessed within itself all the attributes of Deity. This is not saying that the statues and images of many ancient peoples were always idols in that sense, for idolatrous practices were gradually introduced when a nation's life was deteriorating and the people were drifting further and ever further away from primitive spiritual concepts. Ancient emblems remained long after their original significance had been lost. It is practically certain that in days long past when Hebrew prophets vigorously condemned idolatrous practices, the images ultimately worshipped had been originally no more than reminders of great heroes and heroines, and therefore quite as permissible as modern statuary erected to commemorate heroic men and women, and to suggest an imitation of all that was particularly exemplary in their noble lives. There is always a danger in aught that borders upon idolatrous practice, because the tendency to substitute the carnal for the spiritual is strong almost everywhere, though not confined by any means to those who set up graven images and bow adoringly before them.

Bibliolatry carried to an extreme is idolatrous, because it fastens attention so powerfully and exclusively upon the letter of some venerated text as to leave no room for any recognition of interior illumination. A Bible can be either a help or a hindrance by reason of the manner in which one approaches its contents. The Kabbalist is by no means a bibliolater if he clings to genuine Kabbalism and respects the continuous oral tradition, for the 70 Elders who constitute an ever-living Sanhedrin are men of exceptionally high spiritual attainments and spotless life, through whom revelation is always being outpoured. A merely historic

Kabbalism cannot have the power to exert the beneficent influence exertable by a vital Kabbalism, because the former refers everything to memories of some holier and happier age gone by, while the latter acknowledeges an ever-flowing stream of inspiration from a perennial fount which never can run dry. The form of idolatry especially abhorrent to the vital Kabbalist is that tendency toward living in memory only which is the chief blight over a large section of the religious world to-day, and it is indeed impossible to become deeply imbued with the original Kabbalistic spirit without totally disowning a mode of thought which excludes the very essentials of pure Kabbalism. It is easy enough for literalists and historians to say that with the final destruction of the third Temple in Jerusalem the Sanhedrin ceased to exist, and that with the cessation of animal sacrifices a new order was instituted; but there is no logical connection between the overthrow of a literal material pile, and the abolition of a ceremonial slaughtering of animals, with any sort of withdrawal of interior illumination from humanity; indeed it would be far easier and much more logical to contend that the overthrow of a literal structure and the discontinuance of grossly physical ceremonies marked the beginning of a period in which the Kabbalistic idea could shine forth with a glorious refulgence hitherto unknown. Concealed mystery is yet to be revealed. Nothing hidden is always to remain secret, secrecy being only a transitory requisite for growth. We find innumerable parallels in the workings of nature universally. Gestative, germinative and incubatory processes must be carried on in secret, but a moment arrives when revelation occurs and secrecy is ended. All gems and precious metals are concealed in the earth until they are excavated; in like manner important truths are veiled from general outward view while they are developing in the inner consciousness of humanity, but at length they burst forth like butterflies from chrysalids, or as young birds break through their egg shells, or as children are born into outward existence after secretion in the matrix. Though the thought of limiting God in any manner is intensely repugnant to the genuine Kabbalist, he is by no means averse to employing the Human Form as a means of portraying his idea of divine revelation. The opening chapter of Genesis declares man to be theomorphic (in the image of God), therefore a human idea of Deity is not fallacious because it is anthropomorphic (in our human likeness), though all limited concepts must be inadequate. Our ideas are necessarily limited and also growthful, for if our consciousness expands our ideas must correspondingly enlarge. Nothing, therefore, can well be more idiotic than to denounce anthropomorphic views of Deity as false because they are perforce inadequate to express all that the Divine Reality must be. The hieroglyphical figure of the Kabbalah represents various concording attributes of Deity as though God possesses an actual beard (to select only one curious example) consisting of hairs millions of miles in length. This is of course correspondential metaphor and refers, in one sense, to the position and work of a certain host of angels who are in the province of the Beard in Maximus Homo. In like manner offices are definitively assigned to various other companies of angels, and all is picturesquely outwrought as a work of symbolic art intensely fascinating and worthy of profound study and reverent consideration. The Kabbalah distinctly states that it is not given to humanity to know what God essentially is. The transcendental and immanent ideas of Deity, often sharply contrasted in theological controversy, find their meeting place in the Kabbalah in such expressions as the following: God is in all, distinct from all, greater than all. The Divine Name is ineffable, yet this name expresses only the human ideal of Divinity. In such statements as the foregoing we find an actual blending of Gnostic with Agnostic thought, and though it is generally supposed that between Gnosticism and Agnosticism there can be no intellectual fellowship, this seeming irreconcilability is only superficially apparent.

Gnostics claim an interior revelation enabling them to know all necessary truth, but as they claim progression in knowledge through incessant additional illumination, they utterly repudiate the notion that anyone can possibly know all there is to be known. Gnostics never use the word Unknowable, but Unknown is a term to which no reasonable exception can ever be taken by claimants to even the largest possible share of knowledge yet possessed by the most illumined members of the human family. "You have an unction from the Holy One and you know all things," is a New Testament statement attributed to the Apostle Paul which sounds ridiculously bombastic until it has been subjected to rational examination, when it immediately loses all absurd pretentiousness, for "all things" signify only those things with which we are called upon to deal, and it is surely possible in a world of limited dimensions for some individuals to arrive at a perfect knowledge of the uses and values of all the things they are obliged to handle in the fulfillment of their actual obligations. All things are brought to the Adam man in his primitive estate "to see what he will call them," and Adam gives names to everything, but it is rightly inferred that he does not always name things correctly. In the limitless fields of Nature every object has its proper name and definite use, and it is declared by Kabbalists that whenever the right name is given to any creature it is compelled to answer to its rightful name, but if the name be miscalled or in any way mispronounced no certain results are obtainable. To call upon the Name of the Lord is regarded as the highest act of sublime magic, and by magic is rightly meant the Great Work, knowledge of how to perform which constitutes a man a Magus. It is deemed possible for unscrupulous persons to become "Black Magicians" through knowledge of certain magical secrets, but their power is always limited and can at any time be taken from them, because they are not in alliance with celestial hierarchies and cannot receive support from the Masters of Wisdom, while the power of the "White Magician" is illimitable because he is in accord with innumerable hosts of light and the power of good to vanquish evil is infinite, while the force of evil is in reality unreal.

The Kabbalah draws a clear distinction between knowing and believing and clearly shows how a believer may have no power to accomplish wonders because he only believes that they are accomplishable but is unacquainted with the means whereby they may be wrought.

The oft-quoted words from the Christian gospels, "All things are possible to him that believeth," are somewhat misleading, because they are a mistranslation of the original and not in accord with the true significance of the mighty declaration, "With God all things are possible." When a human being is so well versed in a knowledge of unchanging law or inflexible order as to be able to set the law in motion, he can work "miracles," for a miracle properly means any occurrence which excites general wonder because the majority of people know nothing of the law which makes the occurrence possible. The stupid prattle of old-fashioned Materialists against miracles is nothing but puerile nonsense, because the whole of their argument and deduction from an established premise amounts to a complete non sequitur. The traditional materialistic hypothesis is that because the order of Nature is presumably unalterable therefore events commonly called miraculous cannot occur, because their occurrence would necessitate the suspension of a law which can never be abrogated. Were we in possession of complete knowledge of law, and of all that is possible through its working agency, we might be able to sustain such a hypothesis, but nothing is more self-evident than that our knowledge of law is very limited and subject to continual increase. It is also true that what we now think to be the law may not be so in reality, for we often walk and speculate in a very dim light and we frequently leap to immature conclusions which soon after we are compelled to modify greatly. True Kabbalists are a wise and wary people, for while they have much to say concerning wonderful results following upon the utterance of mysterious combinations of letters which have been ingeniously fashioned into awe-inspiring words, they are careful never to assume a complete knowledge of how far results may be carried by those whose knowledge is greater than their own. The famous tradition of a "Lost Word" in Masonry is in exact accord with the teachings of Kabbalah. Tradition has it that there were originally 3 Grand Masters, and only when these 3 were together could the Master's Word be uttered, for it took all 3 to speak it, because only one syllable could be uttered by any one of the 3 Masters. When one of them was slain the word could not be pronounced by the remaining 2, because only 2 syllables could then be uttered. Many foolish inferences have been drawn from this legend, the silliest of all being that the 2 remaining Masters after the slaying of one, only knew two-thirds of the sacred word and therefore could not pronounce it in its entirety; for it stands to reason that if it were spoken in its fullness whenever the 3 had been together that all alike must have heard the 3 syllables though a single voice uttered only one of them. A much better interpre tation is that it took the combined presence and united influence of the 3 to generate the mighty mystic force necessary to accomplish an august result. This we can understand, for a chord in music must consist of 3 notes, and unless the necessary 3 are struck together the perfect vibration cannot be produced.

Students of the mystery and meaning of numbers declare that there is a reference to this ancient tradition in the words of the Master of Christendom when he declares that if 2 or 3 disciples are gathered together in his name he will be truly in the midst of them. Every student of the gospels who is interested in their mention of particular numbers must also have been impressed with such statements as "if 2 of you shall agree as touching anything it shall be done," and the account of sending out disciples 2 by 2, not one by one. The number 2 holds high place in the Kabbalah and it stands for the original Cross, the anatomical figure displaying symmetry. All anatomists and sculptors know that a perfectly formed human body is truly cruciform, the width from the point of one middle finger to the point of the other, when both are widely extended, being precisely the same as the height of the body from the crown of the head to the ball of either of the heels. Masculinity and femininity are here completely expressed in the form of perfect duality. Perpendicular and Horizontal beams of a true Cross must be exactly equal. "Taking up the cross" and winning victories in this sign become scientifically and philosophically intelligible expressions in the light of this contemplation, whereas the ordinary identification of the cross with literal physical crucifixion is entirely foreign to the spirit of all esoteric teaching. So many different, though by no means discordant, meanings are attached to various numbers in the Kabbalah that it is somewhat difficult to pronounce with certainty concerning the exact value attachable to each numeral in turn, but no uncertainty prevails as to the dignity of 10 and its multiples, for the 10 Sephiroth are always enumerated and we all know that 10 includes the 9 numerals and the circle. The number 1 is representative of primum mobile, the commencement of whirling motion.

Under the general heading of the Macroprosopus (Vast Countenance) Kabbalists are accustomed to place the WHITE HEAD denoting the Ancient of DAYS, also Kether (the Crown) and Eheieh (Existence). AIN SOPH, the SUPREME BEING, is never represented by the single stroke we use to denote the smallest of our numerals, but if any emblem is introduced it is invariably the circle. The Universe is supported by 3 Pillars, JUSTICE, MILDNESS, MERCY. From the Macroprosopus proceed, as from an inscrutable height, CHOKHMAH (Wisdom) and BINAH (Intelligence). These are respectively regarded as Father and Mother Supernal. It is self-evident that the Kabbalah places masculinity and femininity on precisely the same level. so does the first chapter of Genesis both in the original and in all translations; and in the second chapter, which has so often been erroneously appealed to in attempted justification of sexual inequality, the mystical and traditional Eve, pronounced "mother of all living," is distinctly described in a metaphor as taken from the side of Adam, neither from his head or from his foot, to signify her perfect equality with him. The second triadation in the Kabbalah, called the Lesser Countenance, is composed of Chesed (Mercy), Din (Justice) and Tiphereth (Beauty). These 3 are described as forming the Moral World, the first triadation constituting the realm of pure intellectuality. The third triadation, constituting the Material World, is composed of Netzach (Victory), Hod (Splendor) and Yesod (Foundation). The 10th Sephira is Malkhuth (the Kingdom). Each Sephira is an emanation from AIN SOPH, the LIMITLESS ONE, and is also esteemed as a company of closely united celestial intelligences who form a compact body, all the members of which act in perfect unity. It is easy to see how the 9 Choirs of Angels enumerated by Catholic theologians and alluded to, more or less distinctly, in many Christian liturgies, are in vital accord with the Sephiroth of the Kabbalah, and it needs no profound or very wide research to convince any students who have a taste for comparative religion and philosophy that only in name are there practical differences in idea and terminology between the various great exponents of the leading religious systems of the world. The 10 Sephiroth are sometimes represented in 3 pillars, thus: The right-hand pillar of Mercy consists of the 2nd, 4th and 7th emanations; the left-hand pillar of Judgment consists of the 3rd, 5th and 8th emanations; the middle pillar of Mildness (or moderation) consists of the 1st, 6th, 9th and 10th emanations. In their totality the 10 Sephiroth represent ADAM KADMON, the Protagonos or original progenitor of humanity. There are 3 masculine, 3 feminine, and 4 uniting Sephiroth. The 3 masculine are on the right side; the 3 feminine on the left side and the 4 uniting Sephiroth in the centre of the Tree of Life (Otz Chaiim). There is a close resemblance in this Tree to the sacred tree, Yggdrasil, of Scandinavian mythology. Though there are 3 distinct triadations (or 2 trinities and a quaternity, according to some authorities) in the enumerated Sephiroth, there is only one trinal classification which comprises them all, and that consists of the Crown, the King and the Queen. The Kabbalah offers a reconciliation between Judaism and Christianity on a philosophical and mystical basis which must have been familiar to many of the Fathers of the early Christian Church, and it throws much light on the paradox of a Trinity in Unity. Without attempting to eulogize the whole of the so-called Athanasian Creed, one must confess that though dogmatically Trinitarian it is very far indeed from being Tritheistic, for it reiterantly declares "there are not 3 Gods, but one God." The original form of the Trinity was Father, Mother, and Child, and had that original form been adhered to in all Christian ecclesiastical art little, if any, exception could be taken to it as an endeavor to express our best ideas of Divine manifestation to human consciousness. It is the 2 exclusively male personages, one represented as much older than the other, and the Dove between them, which has occasioned much revolt, because of the total exclusion of the Mother principle and the substitution of the emblem of the Dove in place thereof. The Son born from the Father and the Mother was the ancient Egyptian idea as portrayed in Osiris, Isis, and Horus, and the Oriental portrayal of Brahma (Creator), Vishnu (Preserver), Siva (Transformer), does no violence to that primal and universal concept of the 3 expressions of absolute Unity which has led to the employment of the Triangle as a sacred symbol second in dignity to the Circle only. In Kabbalistic language the manifest universe is born from the union of the Crowned King and Queen, and before the complete form of the Heavenly Man (the 10 SEPHIROTH) was produced, primordial worlds were created which are referred to in the Hebrew Scriptures as "Kings of ancient time" and as "Kings of Edom." Edom means unbalanced force, while Israel signifies the balanced Sephiroth. The fact that worlds were formed and destroyed before the formation of our present earth is constantly reiterated in the Zohar.

The Sephiroth are designated a World of Emanations and an Archetypal World which gives birth to 3 other worlds in a descending scale of decreasing brightness. The second (Briatic) world is an immediate emanation from the highest world, Olahm Atziloth. This is conceived of as a purely spiritual realm without any admixture of what we commonly understand by matter. The 3rd World, Olahm Ha-Yetzirah, is the abode of angels, sometimes called incorporeal spirits because their forms are not discernible by our physical senses, but to unusually extended human vision they sometimes become clearly visible, and those who can discern them are, for that reason, classed as seers and seeresses. The world of action, which we objectively inhabit, is called Olahm Ha-Asiah; it is described as made up of the grosser elements derived from the other 3. Evil spirits in the Kabbalah are sometimes called "shells" and they are always referred to as the most deficient of all forms expressing intelligence. There are 10 orders of dark spirits enumerated which are in direct opposition to the Sephiroth. The idea is virtually the same as Swedenborg's memorable saying that heavens and hells stand feet to feet, because heavens are in the human form upright and hells are topsyturvy.

Throughout the Kabbalah the number 10 runs constantly, so there are 10 of everything mentioned, the unholy tens being the exact contradictories of all holy existences.

The Divine Name is composed of only 4 letters, IHVH, but the right pronunciation of this Ineffable Name is known but to very few, and to one who knows how to speak it rightly it is the means whereby the most stupendous feats of sacred magic can be accomplished. There is nothing impossible to one who can pronounce the sublimest of all names correctly, for this great and awe-inspiring Name is said to "rush through the Universe" and nothing can withstand the force of the tremendous vibration excited by the utterer thereof, if he be one who is duly qualified to proclaim it. But the mere utterance of the external sounds, as even a parrot might be taught to speak them, is of no avail. Israel Zangwill in his story "The Turkish Messiah" displays close familiarity with this ancient doctrine when he narrates how a man who was supposed to be Messiah by his deluded followers, but was actually a person of no great spiritual attainments and extremely self-conceited, pronounced the mysterious word which was said to have power to produce tremendous results, but no event of any importance followed. The same idea runs through all the venerated traditions of the Orient concerning the sacred syllable AUM, which can be pronounced in a multitude of ways, but only brings forth high magical consequences when uttered by one who is far along the road to perfect adepthood. This seems entirely reasonable, for did some awful power reside in the ordinary pronouncing of sacred names the most terrific consequences would ensue from the flippant irreverence which is so very common among thoughtless and uncultivated people, that we hardly notice the verbal profanations which would perpetually assail our ears in many neighborhoods if we listened to the unthinking and largely unmeaning speech of innumerable men, women and children who lightly utter words of the deepest spiritual import, but almost powerlessly for good or ill because of the absence of any definite intention or expectation in the will or thought of the speakers. To work holy or unholy spells one must have cultivated definite will and imagination and must act with clear purpose aforethought. The key to the working of Kabbalah can never be found in knowledge alone, though such is valuable. There must be force of intention coupled with unshaking confidence in the efficacy of words spoken or other means employed, otherwise the most elaborate ritual observances will prove of no avail.

CHAPTER IV.

BOOK OF CONCEALED MYSTERY—HUMANITY, SPIRITUAL AND PHYSICAL

Following closely upon dissertations concerning the Ineffable Name, the awe-inspiring TETRAGRAMMATON, the Kabbalah undertakes to analyze humanity in accordance with the renowned Hermetic axiom, "As Above, so Below," and necessarily by inverse deduction, "As Below, so Above." The mind which can comprehend the plan of the Universe is itself a miniature universe; thence is derived the famous and well-nigh universal doctrine of the Macrocosm and the Microcosm. It is in the Kabbalah and other esoteric works of great profundity and antiquity that we may look, and not in vain, for a reconciliation of the various seemingly mutually exclusive philosophies which have long divided the intellectual world into contentious factions. Idealism and Realism; Spiritualism and Materialism; Transcendentalism and Utilitarianism are continually pitted against each other by argumentative debaters who are very ready to assume affirma-tives and negatives respectively until the average seeker for enlightenment through academic channels is apt to exclaim, in despair of ever arriving at any intelligible solution of the riddle of existence, "a plague on both your houses."

Theosophical literature has rendered much helpful service by employing such a compound term as Spirit-Matter to designate 2 aspects of the manifestation of a Supreme Reality, called by Herbert Spencer and other agnostic philosophers of the 19th century "the Unknowable." "Infinite and eternal Energy" is a good enough term, but as Sir William Thompson pointed out in his admirable pamphlet, "The Unknown (?) God," published in 1904, a close study of nature, and most of all human nature, leads us away from the unsatisfactory Monism proclaimed by Ernest Haeckel in "The Riddle of the Universe" to a much more nearly Theistic position. The note of interrogation bracketed between the words "Unknown" and "God," in the title of the pamphlet, sufficed to express the exact shade of meaning the author sought to convey, for he was intending to discuss a question fearlessly but not to speak dogmatically; and the conclusion at which he arrived was the thoroughly sane and sensible one that we can know something, and continually learn more and more of Deity, but it is clearly impossible that we should know everything. Here we find the position of an eminent British scientist of ripe age and wide experience in precise accord with the teachings of Kabbalah, though with this difference, that Kabbalists and Gnostics claim to know already more of the Divine than Sir William Thompson claimed to know.

The Kabbalistic doctrine of angels above the present human level and unenlightened demons below it, is shared by practically all reputable Occultists, and is very plainly enunciated by Eliphas Levi in his famous work on Magic. There is no real or essential power in evil according to this arcane teaching, though it is admitted, and indeed emphatically declared at times, that persons living in the affectional indulgence of certain malignant vices while in the flesh will be tormented in the company of demons who correspond with these vices if they pass into the state beyond physical dissolution clinging to such disorderly affections. Students of Swedenborg will find numberless points of agreement with the teachings of that noble Swedish philosopher and seer as they peruse the somewhat differently worded Kabbalah, and they will also find less insistence in the Kabbalah on the perpetuity of evil in any section of the Universe than most Swedenborgians indulge in. But to the esoteric reader Swedenborg has sided with the Kabbalists entirely on more than one notable occasion, especially where he has given it forth that all the hells are as nothing before the Lord. The terminology of the Kabbalah is in many places almost identical with that of the prophetical books of Daniel and Ezekiel and with the New Testament Apocalypse. "Beast," "Harlot," and many other symbolical terms employed in Revelations, are used in obviously the same senses in the Kabbalah. Satan is Samael, the angel of poison and death; his wife is the great Harlot. All things infernal are inversions and caricatures of powers celestial, and all hells are in exact opposition to heavens. It greatly simplifies much that would otherwise appear fantastic, and well-nigh unintelligible, to reflect upon the positively universal agreement of all schools of teachers upon the word disorder as the equivalent of disease. Now if disease and disorder are the same, then order must be the equivalent of health on all planes and in all degrees of manifest existence.

The name Adonai, pronounced so frequently in all Jewish services, is almost always substituted for the unpronounced name of greatly superior excellence. This practise originated among devout Israelites to avoid all profanation of the most sacred and awe-inspiring of names, for it has been continually stated that when profane utterances are allowed discordant and dangerous results may follow; there is, therefore, excellent reason from all magical and mystical standpoints for effectually guarding against profanity, though probably a merely thoughtless pronunciation of any sacred word is too nearly powerless in any case to be a matter of much consequence. The very extreme saying that whosoever rightly pronounces the Ineffable Name causes Heaven and Earth to tremble, is not to be lightly dismissed in these days in view of the vast amount of added knowledge now becoming general concerning vibration. We can only keep open minds and maintain non-committal attitudes toward many mysteries, unless we are among the small number of a specially enlightened few who are knowing to secrets which are ordinarily unknown.

The statement that the Ineffable Name is capable of 12 transpositions, each specially effective in some special sphere, immediately suggests the 12 Signs of the Zodiac and the 12 major sections of human anatomy, as well as the 12 Tribes of Israel. There is no doubt a much nearer relationship between the Hebrew word Adonai and the Greek Adonis than most Jews would be willing to admit, because of the wide mental separation which existed for many centuries between Hebraism and Hellenism, but in the light of modern discoveries, and in view of our modern search for a common religious and philological denominator, we can see many instances among progressive and liberal-minded Jews of an increasing approach toward the position taken many centuries ago by Philo of Alexandria, who saw no reason why Judaism and Hellenism should be regarded as antagonistic or mutually exclusive. The great value of Kabbalistical researches is that they encourage students to look below surface differences to find radical agreements, and we need no teaching quite so much to-day as that which differentiates logically and practically between righteous differences and scandalous disagreements. GOD is One, but gods are many. MAN is One, but men are many. All ancient religious and philosophical systems, at their best and highest, made this distinction so unmistakably clear that we could hardly account for its subsequent obscuration if we did not know something of the fierce wars which one nation, for long periods often, waged against another, and in the thick of conflict the gods of one people were considered devils by another. The outward letter of the Old Testament is as warlike in many places as the external aspect of the Bhagavad Gita or any other Hindu Scripture, and no more so. The chief advantage of a study of Kabbalah is that it turns our thoughts inward instead of outward, and suggests to us an allegorical, and even a precisely correspondential method of interpreting all Sacred Books, somewhat after the manner of Swedenborg's Arcana Cœlestia, which agrees with the Kabbalah in many important particulars. We must always remember when reading Swedenborg that he declared that the doctrine of correspondences was widely known more than 4,000 years before his day.

When the doctrine of evolution startled the modern European world, about 1859, when Darwin's "Origin of Species" came into prominence, nearly all other religious denominations were greatly disturbed by statements made regarding the immense age of our planet and the probability that human life had existed here for hundreds of thousands of years, but prominent ministers of the New Jerusalem Church were very complacent and industriously availed themselves of the opportunity to advance their own doctrines in such a manner as to show that though Swedenborgians regard the Pentateuch as divinely inspired, it contains (as do other sacred documents also) 3 distinct senses respectively demoninated Celestial, Spiritual, Natural, the last of these 3 being only a veil over the face of the Torah, as mentioned in Exodus where we are told that Moses after descending from the summit of Sinai was compelled to veil his face because the Children of Israel could not bear to gaze upon its uncovered luminous splendor. In the light of what we are learning today about brilliant human auras surrounding exceptionally holy and enlightened persons, we can accept a great amount of such a story even literally; but in a much deeper sense do Kabbalists lay it before us. The New Testament speaks of the veil of the Temple being rent in twain by an earthquake when a Master exclaimed, "It is consummated," and while there is no improbability in such an event actually occurring, all Gnostic exponents of the Christian Gospels maintain that only as we grasp an esoteric significance can we derive spiritual enlightenment from a perusal and study of the narrative. It is not possible in these days to induce educated people to believe that the book of Genesis gives a literally accurate account of the antiquity of the human race; but it is possible to be truly scientific and at the same time earnestly seek to penetrate the glyph and discover the sublime arcane teaching which reposes behind the outer veil of all venerated Scriptures. Moses Maimonides, who flourished in Europe during the 12th century of the present era, when drawing up his famous 13 propositions which constitute what is often called the Creed of Israel, says that Moses, the greatest of Israel's prophets, beheld the divine similitude. No man can see GOD as one sees a fellow human being and continue to live on earth. "No man hath seen GOD at any time" is a text frequently quoted, but beholding the "divine similitude," in the Mosaic sense, is only discovering the true nature of humanity and realizing the force of the mighty declaration that Humankind is in the Divine Image spiritually. It is only through human nature that human beings can apprehend divine nature, therefore the anthropologist who penetrates deeply into his exhaustless task becomes, perforce, a true theosophist. The great point of difference between Kabbalistic teaching and orthodox Christian teaching is that the former is far more inclusive than the latter. Orthodox Christians dogmatically affirm that once only has a human form appeared on earth truly expressing Divinity. Kabbalists attempt to uphold no such restrictive doctrine, but content themselves with insisting upon the divine origin and essentially divine nature of all humanity, a theory which is at present brought very prominently forward in many circles without much regard to particular denominational affiliations. The chief stumbling blocks in the path of theological students who may be properly open-minded, and also temperamentally rationalistic, are placed there not so much by sceptics or agnostics as by theological professors who, while seeming to advocate so much more religious truth than the students can assimilate, are in reality excluding much that those intelligent and honest-minded young persons could readily comprehend were it placed intelligibly and attractively before them. What is known as New Theology, as well as what goes by the name of New Thought, aims at a greater inclusiveness than orthodox schools of religion and philosophy have tolerated, and the same remark holds true with reference to Eclecticism in the field of Therapeutics. It is what schoolmen have sought to cramp and confine that is now demanding illimitable liberty, and while sheer denial, or at best hopeless agnosticism, is widely prevalent even yet in some places (though not nearly so much so as toward the end of the last century), nothing is more evident than the spiritualizing tendency of the uppermost modern thought in scientific, equally with religious, circles. We now ask the straightforward question: Has the Kabbalah a message for to-day as a helper in the closely allied fields of theological and anthropological discussion? Perhaps it is only safe to say that it has a very satisfactory message for certain types of mind and none whatever for other types, but be this as it may, there is a message in the Kabbalah concerning universal human nature which is in complete accord with the highest and most practical views now entertained by many unusually deep thinkers who are also successful reformers and genuine educators. There are doubtless numerous young men who would like to enter a religious ministry, and work actively therein, did they feel that they could conscientiously subscribe to tenets which they only doubt, and as they rightfully feel that we should preach not our doubts but our convictions, they remain outside the ministry, and many churches complain of a paucity of satisfactory ministerial candidates. In view of the constantly increasing enquiry into all things mysterious, much help can be rendered to honest truthseekers by presenting them with a view of life which renders it possible to call nothing impossible unless it can be proved a mathematical absurdity. W. K. Chesterton, whose play Magic soon proved popular, boldly proclaims his belief in miracles in the old-fashioned supernaturalistic employment of the term. This famous essayist was confronted on the boards of the London theatre where his play was having a good run with flat denials of his position when he invited open discussion during the afternoon of January 19, 1914. That interesting discussion, widely reported in the leading papers of the following day, brought out sharply the need of a reasonable 3rd position, and every logician knows that 3 positions have to be taken into account in every logically sustainable argument. The Kabbalistic view, though ancient is also extremely modern, for it actually amounts to maintaining that all sorts of unexplained phenomena really take place, but the so-called miraculous is such in name only, because the immutable order of the Universe is never disturbed, and all mysterious happenings are, therefore, as rightly attributable to the operation of unchanging law as are the erratic movements of a comet whose eccentric orbit can be accurately calculated by sufficiently proficient astronomers. According to the unmistakable inferences of the Kabbalah we can all attain to as much control over outside influences as any Mental Scientist proclaims we can; but we must grow steadily until we reach the heights. The 3 continually mentioned Hebrew words, Nephesh, Ruach, Neshamah, must be logically comprehended before we can understand the Kabbalistic view of the so-called Fall of Man. Nephesh is the animating principle of all vitalized existences; Ruach is found in humanity, but does not abide or inhere in any sub-human entities; Neshamah is sometimes called "the candle of the Lord," while Ruach ha Kodesh is a Hebrew title for the divine indwelling which Christians term the Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit. The 3rd chapter of the 4th Gospel, which contains the narrative of Nicodemus, a member of the Sanhedrin, applying to Jesus for information concerning regeneration, is readily understood in the light of Kabbalah which places water in a position inferior to that occupied by air and fire; and throughout the New Testament we find the same general symbology adhered to. Baptism by water is preparatory to baptism by the Holy Breath and Fire. Wind (not water) is a symbol of this same Divine Emanation which, according to the 14th chapter of the 4th Gospel, has been with but shall be in the true disciples of an exalted Master. The name Moshe (Moses) means drawn up out of water, and mystically designates one who has been raised, through adequate initiation into the everlasting mysteries pertaining to regeneration, above the common intellectual plane to a plateau of spiritual discernment where hitherto unknown spiritual realities become clearly known, and where latent powers long dormant are quickened to conscious and operative activity. It is the Mosaic type of human being (not simply one man who lived long ago in Egypt), who experiences the glorious interview with Deity in a mystical manner through the agency of the Burning Bush at Horeb, for that "bush" is a symbol of human nature at all times and everywhere; but there are few who turn aside, as does Moses, to behold a great sight which though always observable is but seldom observed.

As the Greek word anthropos means an upward-gazer, it is only the spiritualizing or regenerating man who enjoys any appreciable degree of spiritual insight, consequently those who live only carnal lives do not see (or discern) the Kingdom of God. What a sublime contrast the Kabbalah offers to the pitiful theology which prates exoterically of baptismal regeneration and knows nothing of the esoteric splendor concealed within the mighty words so glibly used. It was not irreverence but reverence which caused Ralph Waldo Emerson to righteously hold up to scorn the detestable notion that the eternal salvation of a human soul could depend upon any sacerdotal rite. A priest might be delayed by any one of a hundred petty incidents from arriving in time to literally baptize either an infant or an adult who might be physically dying, and we ask the sacerdotalists of to-day with all sincerity if there is one among them who really believes that Limbo instead of Paradise is to be the eternal portion of any member of the human race because some priest failed to perform an act of ceremonial magic upon the outward body of some fellow human being? No wonder the doctrines of the churches are widely discredited if such hideous travesties of truth are brayed into the ears of men and women honestly desiring to find the path that leads to heavenly felicity. But while the cruel puerilities of blind theologians can only excite our pity and our scorn we ought not therefore to blatantly exclaim that the venerable and long venerated Scriptures of the world are worthless and misleading; rather let us look below the obvious surface of any or all of them, and seek until we find the gems of truth that lie imbedded in their inner meanings like gold concealed, until some miner discovers and excavates it, deep in the secret chambers of the earth. We none of us can fully know all that is implied in the majestic declaration that we are in the Divine Image. On our merely earthly side we can wailingly cry out, "What is man, the child of dust; what is man, O Lord?"; but on the other side of our nature we can exult with the author of the 8th psalm who declares, in the original, that humanity is but little lower than Elohim and is crowned with honor and glory. The Kabbalah assigns to humanity a vice-regal throne and far from considering ourselves as prostrate worms we are invited to contemplate ourselves as, at the least, potential eagles whose soaring possibilities are immeasurably greater than our best feeble language can describe.

CHAPTER V.

THE KABBALISTIC USE AND SIGNIFICANCE OF NUMBERS.

The Kabbalah lays great stress upon the number 10 as the all-expressing numeral and without some understanding of the honorable place it occupies in Kabbalistic literature it would be impossible to grasp the general idea of the Universe at all clearly from the Kabbalistic viewpoint. There are 10 Sephiroth, 10 Divine Names, 10 Archangels, 10 Orders of Angels, and 10 Orders of Demons. The 10 names of Deity are intended to convey the idea of 10 distinct attributes of Deity and 10 distinct modes of divine operation. This consideration throws much light on the use of the plural in various translations of the Hebrew Pentateuch. Elohim is in its formation a plural word, and "Let us make man in our image and after our likeness" is a familiar quotation from the opening chapter of Genesis. The Kabbalah reveals that this seeming plurality of divine personages in no way contradicts the rigidly monotheistic faith of Israel but conveys only an idea of the united action of the various attributes of Deity, and also (possibly) the agencies employed by the Divine One in accomplishing the work of creation. It is said that the attribute of Mercy is called into requisition in the creative act, while it is the attribute of Justice which preserves the created Universe; and furthermore is it declared that the various orders of Celestial Intelligences are continually employed in executing the will and plans of the Creator. The number 4 is also greatly honored in the Kabbalah, and we read much concerning the 4 Worlds which are respectively designated Atziloth (Archetypal), Briah (Creative), Yetzirah (Formative), Asiah (Material). Much also is made of the number 2, especially as regards Macroprosopus, the Great Countenance, and Microprosopus, the Lesser Countenance. As the unit is necessarily the greatest and the least,—for there can be nothing larger than One and nothing smaller than one,—the unit must always be the starting point and the final point. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end" (employing the first and last letters in the Greek alphabet), refers to the absolute unconditioned or unlimited life which is truly described in the mighty title of Deity, "I am that I am." We all speak glibly enough of infinite and eternal, but no finite mind can grasp or measure infinity and eternity, therefore we have no ground for dissenting entirely from Herbert Spencer's historic use of the word Unknowable. The absolute must be unknowable to the relative, for the simple reason that the former is illimitable while the latter is definitely limited. It is only in some conditioned revelation or manifestation that we can form any idea of the One Eternal Cause whence all effects originally proceed, and though it would be presumptuous and absurd to claim for the Kabbalah that it sets forth all that can ever be apprehended of Divine activities, it is but fair to insist that it far surpasses many other documents which attempt to perform a similar task, both in its comparative clearness of definitions and in its successful avoidance of polytheism, for it actually does describe with minute detail various hosts of subordinate entities employed by Deity without ever drifting into the hopeless tangle in which all systems become inextricably involved as soon as they lose the thought of essential unity. Modern scholarship at its highest and best is taking much account of the polytheistic systems of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Scandinavia, Greece and Rome, as well as India, and though many gods and goddesses are mentioned by name in all of them, and distinctive attributes assigned to each variety of subordinate divinities, it is always discovered that before and behind all these polytheistic concepts lies the primitive idea of a single absolute One who is in no way dependent upon those varied hosts of lesser lights, but all depend upon the Supreme Unity. Rawlinson, Wallis Budge, and indeed all distinguished writers upon ancient Egyptian religion insist upon this fact with great determination. There is nothing irrational, or in any way out of alignment with our knowledge of the world in which we live, and the wider knowledge attainable through a study of astronomy, in the Kabbalistic descriptions of celestial companies, with distinctive missions to fulfil; indeed it seems almost incredible that anyone grasping the Copernican instead of the Ptolemaic theory of the Universe should entertain the thought that only one small planet like our earth should be inhabited, or that the race to which we belong should be the only race of intelligent entities peopling the vast domains revealed to our vision by the telescope.

The eminent French astronomer, Camille Flammarion, when under 20 years of age wrote a beautiful astronomical treatise entitled "The Plurality of Inhabited Worlds," and when at the age of 70 he reviewed his youthful ebullition he declared that his half-century of research in the interim had not led him to change his views in any substantial manner, only to further elaborate them. In that curious book by Professor Alfred Russel Wallace, "Man's Place in the Universe," we find the startling theory floated that this world of ours is actually the centre of this universe, and that all other inhabited worlds therein are peopled by advanced souls who have once been embodied on this planet. This peculiar exaltation of our little earth found no favor with Flammarion, who rather harshly controverted it, though he never spoke disrespectfully of the eminent English naturalist who put it forward with considerable earnestness and apparent scientific justification. We allude to this modern glorification of our earth by a distinguished man of science to show that the high place assigned to our humanity in the universal scheme by teachers in days of old does not appear to be in conflict with the convictions of all modern evolutionists, for though both a Theist and a Spiritualist, Wallace was an uncompromising evolutionist, one whose name is rightfully coupled with that of Charles Darwin in the same field of natural exploration.

To the Kabbalist the modern doctrine of evolution is by no means unwelcome if it be made to rest upon a foundation of involution; indeed the very meaning of the word necessitates that such a foundation be logically supplied, for the Latin verb evolvere, from which evolution is derived, means to unroll, and unrolling is an unthinkable process unless something be inrolled which is subsequently unfolded. The number 7 is sacred in the Kabbalah as in all other mystical treatises, and it would be folly to urge that numbers were originally venerated without adequate reason; 7 are the colors of the rainbow and 7 are the notes in the musical scale; 7 are the days of the week and 4 times 7 are the days of the lunar month; 9 are the months occupied in perfect human gestation. Thus we see that the honored numerals 7 and 9 have their position so completely fixed in nature that we cannot accuse those who first regarded them as sacred, and considered them spiritually ominous, of having invented a theory of fanciful character. The more we study the religious and other "superstitions" of the ancients the more convinced must we become that there is a very solid foundation under all widely extended venerations, and it can never be the part of wisdom to attempt to brush them ruthlessly aside, though in numberless instances it is highly necessary to cleanse them from accumulated excrescences and restore them as nearly as possible to their original natural simplicity.

When Rosicrucians employ the 5 petaled wild rose as their fundamental floral emblem, and also pay honor to 5 in many other ways, we find them in this respect following nature very closely, for 5 are the digits on each hand, and 5 are the toes on every perfect human foot. But here again we see how right are Kabbalists in giving far greater honor to 10, for each normal human body has 2 hands and 2 feet; therefore 10 is the number of the hands and of the feet also. If we insist upon honoring 5 unduly we have only a one-sided idea of human life, for either the masculine alone or the feminine alone must be the object of our esteem and veneration; but when 10 is rightfully exalted in our symbolic usages, male and female are regarded as of equal dignity and excellence. In Masonic circles, both where the Co-Masonic idea is and where it is not accepted, 5 occupies a very highly distinguished place; "5 points of fellowship" is a well-known phrase, and in the Order of the Eastern Star the star is 5 pointed and 5 distinguished women are named in connection with it; 5 denotes cleavage of the sexes; 10 denotes their perfect unification. It would be quite permissible for advocates of sex equality to adopt a 10 pointed star as their emblem, and it might prove very useful as a symbol truly expressing a grand idea.

Numbers have always played a very important part in Jewish celebrations, and nowhere do we witness a more perfect survival of a very ancient practise than in the home service for Passover Eve, solemnly observed in all Jewish households which have not completely discontinued the impressive traditional ceremonies in which the conservative element in the House of Israel takes unwearying delight.

As there are 10 Commandments and these 10 Precepts sum up the entire Mosaic Code in which there are 613 distinct admonitions (adding up as 10), the number 10 appears in the place of glory not only in the Kabbalah and among Mystics in general. but wherever the faith of Israel is held in high esteem. Many instructive sidelights are thrown upon the Kabbalah and its special teaching with regard to the place and value of numbers in the universal scheme, when we turn to Greek and other extra-Jewish sources to learn how the Gentile nations have esteemed this same entrancing subject. Classic authors make frequent reference to numbers and the place they occupy in Nature. Among them Proclus in particular has spoken with great definiteness concerning the general doctrine of the philosophers of many lands, for he tells us that "number has always a being; one in voice, another in the proportion of things, another in the soul and reason, and yet another in Divine things." Plato and many other renowned philosophers declared that no man can possibly be a true philosopher without a correct knowledge of the significance of numbers. Simple numbers are always said to signify Divine things; numbers of tens things celestial, numbers of hundreds things terrestrial, while predictions of things to come are expressed in thousands. Though such a statement may at first seem strange, it can easily be harmonized with the idea of the number 1, suggesting absolute unity, connoting our idea of the Divine Reality, and all multiplications denoting relative inferiority. In a very curious work entitled "Numbers; Their Meaning and Magic," by Isidore Kozminsky, we receive a great deal of strange information, professedly Kabbalistic, concerning the association of numbers with astrological concepts. In that volume we read that the vibrations of 1 are solar, of 2 lunar, of 3 Jupiterian, of 4 Solar, of 5 Mercurial, of 6 Venusian, of 7 Lunar, of 8 Saturnine, of 9 Martial, of 10 Solar, of 11 Lunar, of 12 Jupiterian. The number 11 is frequently regarded as so peculiar that it stands forth in a positively unique manner and the two units constituting it must never be added so as to make 2. This ominous number has been held significant of the 11 Paths of Darkness in contrast with the 10 Paths of Splendor. In some ancient Hebrew works of unusual character it has been assigned to Lilith, the first wife of Adam. The Kabbalah, in the section known as Sepher Yetzirah, praises the number 11 highly and declares the 11th Path to be one of Glittering Intelligence endowed with special grandeur so that whosoever travels thereon to the end thereof with true understanding shall attain to the sight of Deity and live. From this statement we gather that the 11th Path is one of great difficulty and refers to a high initiation resulting only from that purity of affection which leads to the Beatific Vision according to the Sermon on the Mount and the teachings of all advanced Mystica. Concerning 12 so very much has been written and spoken that its general significance is almost universally familiar as an omen of completeness. The 12 Tribes of Israel are often associated with the 12 Signs of the Zodiac, and in Christian literature with the 12 Apostles. In the Apocalypse or Book of Revelation we find numbers employed almost exactly as in the Kabbalah, and there is a striking resemblance between the allegorical language of that mysterious concluding document in the New Testament and the figurative language common to the prophetical treatises known as Daniel and Ezekiel. 7 invariably stands for completeness where quality is concerned; 12 denotes completeness to the fulness of variety. 7 and its multiples always suggest moral perfection and spiritual attainment, while 12 and its multiples conveys the thought of a perfect ingathering of all types needed to secure a complete representation of all the varied states or conditions of humanity which must rightly federate to produce a truly compendious whole. Instead of fusion or amalgamation, the Kabbalistic idea of federation is that of perfectly harmonious co-operation; a concept much easier to grasp and provocative of no reasonable opposition.

As the number 13 is one which has been long regarded by hosts of superstitious people with aversion and dread, it is interesting to note that in truly enlightened Kabbalistic circles it is never maligned or dreaded but is regarded as significant of the understanding of truth. In the Sepher Yetzirah 13 is spoken of in connection with the Path of Unity and it is said that he who hath a right understanding of the meaning of this number possesses the key to spiritual knowledge and can exercise great power and dominion. This saying is easily comprehended if we remember the exalted place occupied by 13 to this very day, a judge and 12 jurors making 13. When a Master is seated with 12 specially chosen disciples 13 must be the number present. The dread of 13 probably arose among those who had cause to fear the passing of a verdict. If 13 be regarded as the number denoting judgment it is easy enough to see how it has come to excite fear among those who feel within themselves a sense of guiltiness. But precisely because a just sentence must expose and condemn iniquity it must also remove unjust suspicion from the innocent; consequently when the unrighteous have cause to tremble, the upright have reason to rejoice; 13 according to this interpretation can only be (seemingly) unfortunate for those who have transgressed the moral law, and even for them, if a just penalty be administered, it works for their ultimate benefit as well as for the vindication of such among the innocent as have been falsely accused. Proceeding along the numerical line, and attaching a single expressive meaning to each number as we ascend the ladder, we find 14 associated with constant motion and also with forgetfulness; 15 is associated with magic and mystery, and in the Sepher Yetzirah it is connected with the Path of Darkness (temporary obscuration); 16 is found denoting the Path of Glory and Victory for the Righteous, and we must always remember that the Kabbalah regards righteousness as equivalent to triumph over obstacles, as in the story of Parsifal, which is founded originally upon legends far older than the Arthurian; 17 has been mentioned as the number of the Star of the Magi and is found signifying the Path of the Realization of Reward by the Righteous; 18 has been allied symbolically with the Twilight and Falling Dew, and the 18th Path has been named that of the Senses; 19 is connected with ancient symbols of the Sun and is sometimes typified by an Angel unwinding Destinies; the Sepher Yetzirah styles it the Path of Spiritual Activity; 20 symbolizes the Awakening of the Dead and the Final Judgment, which terms have a deep significance in occult literature referring to the new life of those who have passed through a mystical demise and are now quickened to a life of hitherto unknown activities; the Sepher Yetzirah calls the 20th Path the road of Primordial Wisdom in general diffusion; 21 in the Kabbalah is associated directly with Conciliation; 22 being the number which completes the Hebrew alphabet is described in the Kabbalah as denoting, for those who tread the 22d Path, spiritual light streaming over the entire earth, and as the letter Tau is cruciform we find it to be the number of that Sign of the Cross wherein Initiates conquer. Though at the present day the figure of the cross is usually far from honored among Israelites, that is in consequence of its connection with persecution and its adoption by many who have been oppressors of the House of Israel as their especial badge and emblem, but in ancient times the cross as a symbol had no such painful and harrowing associations. In Egypt it was a Nilometer marking the rising and falling of the river without whose periodical overflow the land would have been desolate, and among early Kabbalists it stood for the fulfilment of initiation into the sacred mysteries, as it stood also in other mystical systems of Oriental origin.

CHAPTER VI.

KABBALISTIC VIEWS OF THE HUMAN SOUL, ITS NATURE AND DESTINY.

Eliphas Levi, the famous French author, in his "KEY OF THE MYSTERIES," gives us much valuable condensed information concerning the theories promulgated by distinguished Kabbalists concerning the Soul and its various attributes and expressions. We gather from a general concensus that the following definitions are fairly representative of the leading doctrines enunciated by distinguished Rabbis to whom a study of Kabbalah has been a constant work of rare delight and great satisfaction.

The soul is a veiled light, triple in nature. The Hebrew word Neshamah is used to designate pure spirit. Ruach is the name given to the human rational principle which occupies a middle rank between pure spirit (in essence divine) and Nephesh which signifies the animating principle in all animate existences, human and sub-human equally. For the convenience of readers whose mother tongue is English and who, though familiar with Christian terminology are ignorant of Hebrew designations, it may be safe to connect Neshamah with the idea of an abiding entity, uncompounded and indissoluble, causing many persons to use the familiar phrase, "immortality of the soul." But as the word soul is used in many connections, superior and inferior, it is necessary to explain exactly what is meant by soul before we speak of its immortality, or even of its immortability. Every chemist will readily admit that all compounds are dissoluble, but could we discover an absolute simple which had never been compounded we could logically conceive of its everlasting simple integrity. This is the Platonic idea of the abiding entity as set forth in the Phædo during the reported farewell discourse of Socrates with his friends immediately prior to his physical decease. The Hindu concept of the permanent entity is often expressed in English in such words as "Never the soul was born and the soul can die never." It certainly seems necessary, whenever we institute an enquiry into the origin and nature of widespread religious and philosophical concepts, to ask ourselves whence have the most vital among them been derived and why is it that despite all seeming evidence to the contrary they go on living, surviving every attack made upon them. Logicians never dispute the fact that for every effect there must be an adequate or efficient cause. What can be the root-fact lying behind our persistent belief in our own immortality, which cannot possibly have been derived from sensuous observation or from any process of reasoning upon the natural phenomena with which we are all perpetually confronted?

The Kabbalah carries us into fields of spiritual experience entirely removed from ordinary scientific research and speculation, and it is quite easy to see how Kabbalists maintain philosophical consistency, no matter into what profound philosophic depths they plunge, because they start with a declaration that their knowledge is communicated from celestial beings to receptive minds on earth, therefore the information they obtain is beyond the findings of unassisted human reason, but in no way contradictory to any rational inferences.

The animal man lives only in the consciousness of nephesh, which is sometimes termed the plastic mediator between the higher realms of spirit and intellect and the most external earth. Nephesh is said to be relatively immortal through a constant dissolution and renewal of forms. Ruach is progressive through the constant evolution of ideas. Neshamah is progressive without forgetfulness and without dissolution. Here we have an outline idea of 3 distinct planes of consciousness in humanity, and that these planes are widely acknowledged by thinkers and students all over the world, in varying measures of clearness, is virtually beyond dispute. From this consideration we are led luminously through many otherwise dark and bewildering mazes and labyrinths of Oriental speculation, and the doctrine of human re-incarnation—always a moot problem in the Western world—is considerably enlightened. The Kabbalah deals with 3 distinct habitations of souls: The Abyss of Life; The Superior Eden; The Inferior Eden.

From the first mentioned state souls descend into the second, and from the second into the third. The physical body is the veil of Nephesh, which is in turn the veil of Ruach, which in its turn is the veil of Neshamah. These 3 Veils are constantly alluded to in Kabbalistic writings; a consideration of them may greatly help Bible students to discover something of the esoteric meaning of the veil which Moses wore when addressing the Children of Israel after his descent from Sinai, and also of the declaration that the veil of the temple in Jerusalem was rent asunder when the Master in the gospels yielded up his spirit to the Father. The following sentences are translated quotations from the French work of Eliphas Levi:

"Light personifies itself by veiling itself, and the personification is stable only when the veil is perfect." "This perfection upon earth is relative to the universal soul of the earth. As is the Macrocosm or greater world, so is the Microcosm or lesser world, which is humanity."

We are next told that there are 3 atmospheres in which souls can dwell, the 3d of which ends where interplanetary attraction commences. This teaching accords substantially with the teachings of many schools of Theosophists and Occultists, and it agrees also with a great deal of modern Spiritualistic testimony, though Spiritualists as a rule speak of 7 distinct spheres rather than of 3 only; but the 2 numbers are easily reconcilable as 7 is the number of the prismatic hues and 3 is often given as that of the primary colors. The idea is that this earth, in common with other planets in our solar system, is surrounded by belts or zones of increasing attenuity and luminosity as we proceed outward from the physical centre of gravity; but though we who are bound to physical sense-observation regard the coarse matter of the physical plane as the solidest of all, it is really the least permanent, being of the loosest composition and most readily destructible, a fact which every modern physicist abundantly confirms. What the Kabbalah sets forth in ponderous and impressive old-world phraseology the modern professor of physics is approaching rapidly along the very different line of painstaking physical research. It is now quite usual to hear a learned scientist refer to ether as far more solid than what we commonly call matter, and we are surely all well aware that unseen substance is far mightier and far more enduring than aught we can behold with our extremely imperfect external vision. Again quoting from Eliphas Levi's admirable condensation of Kabbalistic philosophy we offer without comment the following thought-provoking sentences: "Souls perfected on this earth pass on to another station. After traversing the planets they reach the Sun; then they ascend into another universe and recommence their planetary evolution from world to world and from sun to sun."

"In the suns they remember; in the planets they forget."

"Solar lives are days of eternal life; planetary lives are nights filled with dreams."

"Angels are luminous emanations personified, not by trial and veil, but by divine influence and reflex."

"Angels aspire to become men, for perfected man is above all angels."

"Planetary lives are composed of 10 dreams of 100 years each. Each solar life extends to 1,000 years; therefore it is recorded that 1,000 years are in the sight of God as one day."

"Every week, i. e., every 14,000 years, the soul bathes itself and reposes in the jubilee dream of forgetfulness. On waking therefrom it has forgotten all evil, but remembers all good."

In the above sayings, which condense volumes of Kabbalistic teaching in a few brief paragraphs, we find the complete gist of the erudite philosophy we are seeking to explain, and though it would be indeed a too prodigious task to seek to elucidate the whole of so vast a concept, we can cordially recommend a diligent study of it to all who wish to understand in some degree the inculcations of those wise seers and sages who have left to the present generation a priceless philosophic legacy. Each reader may meditate at will upon such profound assertions as the foregoing, and none are expected to accept blindly any sayings, no matter from what exalted source they may have emanated, for if we fail to employ our reason upon what we read and hear we may accept blindly and repeat like parrots many important truths, but having only hearsay knowledge we have no root of the matter thriving in us.

The sublimity of the idea, and its perfect consonance with the heliocentric theory of the universe, at once stamps it as the outcome of highly enlightened thinkers or wonderfully illumined seers, for so majestic a view of the Universe and the progression of souls therein could not possibly have emanated from crude ignorance or from the wild vaporings of unbalanced sensitives, who rise to no higher planes of knowledge than the earthbound sphere which Occultists of all schools maintain is the temporary abode of the great mass of comparatively unaspiring human entities when they shuffle off their mortal coils. Progress is everywhere the law of life, and it seems scarcely credible that any sane individual can endorse the antiquated theological fiction of souls passing at the moment of physical dissolution into permanent states of joy or misery, light or darkness, which will endure for them eternally. The Kabbalah reasonably interpreted proclaims a doctrine of varied and progressive spiritual existence for every soul, so far enlightened and enlightening as to compel the serious attention of the most eminent intellects of to-day, to whom psychology and psychical research are making a profound appeal. Religious doctrines are everywhere in a state of flux, and on every side we note the breaking up of creeds and the discarding of theories which no amount of casuistical argument can bring into alignment with the discoveries of science and the reasoning of astute philosophers.

In the midst of the present contention the venerable Kabbalah lifts its voice and only asks for candid examination. Those who know it best, and therefore prize it most sincerely, are not afraid that its archaisms will prevent genuine scholars from penetrating below the surface of its occasionally obscure diction to discover the gems of priceless wisdom which are contained in its awe-inspiring and yet hope-inspiring mines of as yet unfathomed depth.

CHAPTER VII.

KABBALISTIC DOCTRINE CONCERNING CAUSE AND EFFECT (KARMA).

From what has been set forth in preceding chapters our readers may now be interested to trace, in some slight degree, the attitude taken by Kabbalists toward the great doctrine of Karma which has loomed so large of late before all enquirers into Theosophy, and indeed before the eyes of all readers of Sir Edwin Arnold's majestic poem, "The Light of Asia," and many other well-known works by distinguished authors who have set themselves the task of translating Oriental ideas, as far as possible, into Occidental language.

In the Kabbalah we have a good account of how those effects are produced sometimes designated "good and evil karma." When Ruach is under the guidance of Neshamah, and Nephesh is rightly dominated by the illumined Ruach, such causes are set in motion as beget delightful effects (good karma); but when Ruach is under the sway of Nephesh, in that inverted condition causes are generated which bring forth sorrowful and discordant consequences (evil karma). The Kabbalah speaks of 2 angels attached to every soul, Michael and Samael, the former being the celestial warrior who wards off all discordant influences which find their embodiment in Samael.

Though these 2 representative Angels, one commonly designated good and the other evil, seemingly as opposite as Parsifal and Klingsor, the Kabbalah by no means contents itself with simply teaching the ancient well-nigh universal doctrine that every soul on coming into incarnation is attended by a spirit of light and a spirit of darkness. There is a deeper and fuller interpretation placed upon these opposing influences agreeing with the doctrine inculcated in the epistle of James which plainly states that though no man is tempted by God to do evil there is no need for imaging an outside evil spirit as the tempter, because every man is tempted when led away and enticed by the desires of his own lower self. This teaching is stated in the Kabbalah about as follows: From Ruach and Nephesh, influenced by the good aspiration of Neshamah, proceeds Michael, the good angel of the soul; that is to say, the synthetical hieroglyph of the good ideas, the "good karma" of a man. From Nephesh dominating Ruach, and uninfluenced by the good aspirations of Neshamah, proceeds Samael, the evil angel of the soul; that is to say, the synthetical hieroglyph of the evil ideas, the "evil karma" of a man. The Tzelem (image) is double, reflecting both Michael and Samael.

The following terse and comprehensive sentences are chiefly extracted from Dr. Jellinck's analysis of Kabbalistic teachings as filtered through the alembic of the philosophy of Spinoza; they are certainly worthy of more than passing notice. The primary cause and governor of the world is Ain Soph (Supreme Wisdom), who is both immanent and transcendent. Each effect has a cause, and everything which manifests order and design has a governor.

Every visible thing has a limit, and is therefore finite; no 2 finite objects are absolutely identical. The primary cause of the world is invisible and unlimited, therefore infinite.

As the primal cause of the world is infinite, nothing can exist independently of it, hence that cause must be immanent.

As the visible world is limited and not perfect, it cannot proceed directly from the Supreme Cause, Ain Soph, still Ain Soph exercises influence over it, and that influence is exerted through the intermediation of the Sephiroth. The Sephiroth in their most intimate connection with Ain Soph are perfect, but in their severance are imperfect. All things originate with the Sephiroth, by means of their activities. The visible world has 3 distinct or discrete degrees: higher, middle, lower.

All bodies have 3 dimensions, each repeating the other; 3 multiplied by 3 gives 9, and by adding thereto "space in general," which is seemingly a concept according with the modern idea of a "4th dimension," we arrive at 10, which is the complete number of all expressions proceeding from primal unity. Concerning the number 10 it is stated that as heat, flame, sparks and color have but one basis though they differ each from the other, so the number 10 does not contradict absolute unity as an original, but as cogitation or thought, and even the mind itself as a cogitated object is limited, becomes concrete and has a measure, although pure thought proceeding from Ain Soph is illimitable, so limit, measure and contraction are attributes of the Sephiroth, which are emanations, not creations.

As Ain Soph, the source whence the Sephiroth proceed, is perfect, so are they perfect. All created objects diminish by abstraction, but the Sephiroth cannot be diminished; their activity is never-ceasing. In view of much modern metaphysical terminology which employs the familiar word reality in 2 decidedly opposite senses, it is both interesting and instructive to note how this word is employed in the Kabbalah. It is stated that each Sephira was within Ain Soph before it became a reality, i. e., before it was externalized or had emanated. The first emanation constitutes the base of the objective realm, on which all that is phenomenal is superposed. The second Sephira is described as the potency of the intellectual world, and the remaining 8 Sephiroth are described as the foundation of the moral and material worlds. The various emanations do not imply a prius and posterios, or a gradation in the Sephiroth, but the entire Sephiroth are comparable with a light which kindles many lights which shine sooner and later and variously, but constitute essentially a perfect unity.

As the Sephiroth do not set aside the unity of Ain Soph, each one of them must receive light from the preceding and transmit it to the succeeding Sephira, each in turn being both receptive and impartive. It is interesting and instructive to keep clearly in mind the distinctive qualities of the various Sephiroth, and by this means only can we clearly understand the Kabbalistic doctrine of succession and transference.

The first Sephira is called Inscrutable Height, which actually means a state and quality of existence which transcends our present comprehension, and while not necessarily unknowable is at present decidedly unknown, unless certain higher human faculties are developed higher than any that the average man or woman of to-day has become cognizant of.

The 2nd Sephira is Wisdom, the 3rd Intelligence, the 4th Love, the 5th Justice, the 6th Beauty, the 7th Firmness, the 8th Splendor, the 9th Foundation, the 10th Righteousness. As the relation between macrocosm and microcosm is everywhere insisted upon, alike in Hermetic and Kabbalistic literature, we can profitably reflect upon the foregoing order as it exists within ourselves as well as within the external universe of which man is a perfect replica. Kabbalistic and Gnostic teachings completely synthesize opposing schools of philosophy by showing the nexus or meeting place between them. It seems incredible that the same school can teach Metaphysics and Realism at the same time; but the Kabbalah teaches both equally, and in the light of its ample philosophy there is no discordance between Idealism and Realism, for the reason that a synthetic philosopher is both a Platonist and an Aristotelian, in that he can reason from spiritual cause to physical effect with Plato and also from effect back to cause with Aristotle. The Universe presents itself to the abstract metaphysician as his own interior concept, while to the Realist it presents itself as a phenomenal object to be studied by looking outward instead of inward. The Kabbalist has trained himself to look equally in both directions, consequently he can see a perfect resemblance between the world of life which he finds within, and the corresponding world of expression which he beholds without. The first 3 Sephiroth are said to form the world of thought; the middle 3 the world of soul (psyche, whence we derive psychic); the 4 last the world of body. The Kabbalist, like the Hermetist or Gnostic, always emphasizes the fact that we cannot conceive of anything we do not contain. Here we find a reasonable interpretation of universal human experiences of all varieties. There must be something in the observer corresponding with the thing observed or observation would be impossible; in like manner is it logically self-evident that were we inwardly destitute of wisdom, love, justice, mercy, and other divine attributes we should never have attributed them to any being whatsoever, because we should have no conception of them in our own minds. This is the most vital point to discuss when treating of the relation existing between ourselves and the universe which contains us. If we speak of divine attributes, as we frequently do, we must be aware of sharing and appreciating them in some degree. It would help to clear away an immense amount of fogginess in the domain of religious and philosophical controversy if we would only be as rational as the Kabbalists when we set forth to give expression to our theory of the Universe, and we presume that every thinking individual has formulated tentatively some theory of the Universe, unless he confesses to abiding in a chronic condition of complete mental chaos. We must always postulate unity and contemplate our abiding spiritual selves as indissoluble units before we can use the pronoun I intelligibly. It is absurd to say I do so and so if I have no conception of what I mean by I. It is likewise ridiculous to call upon one individual to love another without possessing some intelligible idea of what constitutes individuality, and of how individuals may be profitably co-operative. Ralph Waldo Emerson, though in many respects an idealist and transcendentalist, and familiarly styled "the American Plato," was perfectly clear on the question of individuality when he said, with deep sincerity of conviction and force of utterance, "I am I and you are you." The Hebrew Kabbalah reflects Jewish theosophical ideas, and though in some respects they agree with, at other points they radically differ from distinctively Hindu conceptions.

Judaism is essentially optimistic; whenever a Jew becomes pessimistic he wanders away from Judaism in thought if not in practise, and Jewish optimism concerns the present world in which we are now living regardless of whether certain individual Jews have well formulated ideas concerning a future state or otherwise. Judaism invariably seeks for God as revealed in universal humanity, not conclusively in any particular member of the human race, therefore the Jewish idea of divine incarnation is racial rather than particular. To turn a Jew to orthodox Christianity necessitates forcing him to give up his optimistic views of human life and adopting a theory of inherent human sinfulness utterly repugnant to the fundamentals of Judaism. Humanity is imperfect but perfectable; therefore the precept in the 19th chapter of Leviticus is an urge toward a glorious ideal "Be ye perfect, even because the Lord your God is perfect." The All-Holy One is the best term we can employ to express the fundamental Jewish idea of Deity. Faith in Israel does not signify belief but righteousness, and so all-embracing is the Hebrew word Tzedeq that it means all-round integrity. Christian students of Kabbalah will do well to meditate upon the famous saying in the epistle of James, "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," and if one gets to the inmost core of that saying it will be found to mean one who has grasped the idea of righteous balance, i. e., of the equal development of all excellencies in a symphonic character. The philosophers, who according to Plato, will hold the balance of power in an ideal Republic are, as the Greek original intends, those in whom love and wisdom, justice and mercy, are so equally blended that there can never be even seemingly a conflict between those equally divine attributes, which are latent in all humanity and which only need calling forth into active expression to bring about the establishment of the long predicted reign of righteousness on earth. The Kabbalistic idea of the correspondence between the different parts of our human constitution and the Sephiroth is worthy of high regard. The first sephira finds its correspondence in the soul, considered as a pure uncompounded simple, an absolute indivisible unit, therefore truly immortal. The 2nd sephira is related closely with the vitalising energy or interior breath (spirit) proceeding from the primal unit and perpetually going forth into all sections of our interior organism and constituting the life thereof. The 3rd sephira corresponds with human rationality; the 4th with the connecting link between the rational mind and the exterior organism; the 5th with the animal soul, the seat of every carnal appetite; the 6th sephira operates through the blood; the 7th through the bones; the 8th through the veins; the 9th through the flesh; the 10th produces the skin; this is, of course, in an order of proceeding downward, for the Kabbalah teaches, as does Swedenborg, that highest correspondences are with interiors and lowest with exteriors. There is no idea of vengeance or vindictive punishment in Kabbalistic teaching, but there is a stern and uncompromising doctrine of cause and effect. We are not arbitrarily rewarded or punished for virtues or vices, but the law of sequence is never violable. The great stumbling-block that people place in the way of clearing up many difficulties concerning "karma" is that they import into the idea of exact retribution an utterly foreign element, vindictiveness. No matter to what creed or school of thought people may have attached themselves, unless they have developed unusually clear intellects, and also unusual freedom from widespread misconceptions, they talk about being "punished" for something, and then proceed either to whine and whimper or else to resign themselves to a supposedly hard and cruel inevitable fate.

In Shakespere's day the false idea of one divine attribute being in opposition to another, in the sense of mutual antagonism, held sway over the minds of multitudes, therefore Portia, in The Merchant of Venice, voices the prevailing theological fallacy in the oft-quoted words, "In the course of justice none of us would see salvation." Recommending a prisoner at the bar "from justice to mercy" is a common expression to-day, but it is an utterly misleading one, for justice without mercy, or mercy without justice, can never bring about the true welfare either of an individual or of the State. It can never be either just or merciful to inflict wrong on any one, or to excuse any from paying the price of necessary educational and reformatory penalties after they have transgressed a moral precept. Correction and chastisement are words of originally beautiful significance, but they have been so travestied, and their meanings so hideously obscured, that an average Christian congregation can hardly understand the magnificent words from an epistle in the New Testament "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." But if we substitute the equivalent word purifieth, the significance ought to be obviously clear. Marie Corelli, in her wonderful novel, "The Soul of Lilith," puts into the lips of a very attractive young man, Feraz, a true exposition of the outworking of the karmic or sequential law, for he startles those with whom he converses by assuring them that far from praying to be excused from necessary disciplinary suffering he prefers to pray that he may receive his full share of it. Everything finally depends upon the attitude we take toward the conditions we are in whether we can harmonize their existence with an optimistic philosophy of life or otherwise. No matter how hard a trial may be, or how immediately sorrowful a situation, if we can but see in it some means toward real betterment it is impossible for us to give place to despair. Dante was right when he said that over infernal portals stood the phrase "Abandon hope all ye who enter here," and many theologians have classed despair as the most heinous among mortal sins.

Taking the doctrine of the Kabbalah to an afflicted person whom we desired to comfort, we certainly could not ignore the fact that some adequate cause has produced the existing painful complications; but we should certainly assure that sufferer that trials are tests, not punishments, and that victory is to be gained over them and by means of them. There are many erroneous views of karma entertained at present both by those who profess to teach its action and by those who dislike the very mention of the word. The Kabbalah goes to no extreme either on the side of mildness or severity, but teaches with uncompromising fairness that the order of the Universe is at the same instant both mild and severe; but it is never cruel or vindictive, and never can be.

From the pragmatic standpoint the Kabbalah has indeed much to commend it, and from the ethical viewpoint it is impossible to reproach it. Mysterious it may be; unfamiliar to English ears in phraseology, and perhaps archaic rather than modern in form of presenting fundamental verities, but as a contribution to synthetic philosophy it is the container of manifold suggestions of the utmost permanent value; therefore we rejoice in the publication of a magnificent literary curio by Arthur Edward Waite, "The Secret Doctrine in Israel," to which we call the serious attention of our readers in our next chapters.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SECRET TRADITION IN ISRAEL.—THE ZOHAR.—THE SERPENT AND FALL OF THE ANGELS.

Perennial interest seems to attach to the serpent as a symbol, on the one hand of wisdom, and on the other of all that is lowest and vilest in the universe. The Kabbalah is by no means silent regarding the mystic meanings of this strange emblem of the means whereby humanity gains experience, and through experience wisdom, power and liberty, but not without trial and conflict and a seeming fall from original innocence. Innocence and purity are not the same, and because the vital distinction between an innocent state and a purified condition has been frequently lost sight of, an immense amount of false and pessimistic teaching concerning alleged human depravity has exerted a depraving influence in the world. The glyph in Genesis in which the serpent figures very prominently is an allegory intended to set forth, as in a parable, the struggle which takes place within ourselves when we hear 2 voices urging us in opposite directions at the same moment; and as we cannot possibly obey both, yielding to one necessitates rebelling against the dictates of the other. Tennyson's exquisite poem, "2 Voices," is unsurpassed in English literature as a contribution to a practical study of those opposing tendencies in human nature of which we are all conscious, and which can never be really explained away by any process of subtle or casuistical reasoning. But though we cannot explain away the conflict, we think we can, with the aid of the Kabbalah, throw some light upon what it signifies. Ever since the Christian Church gave countenance to the atrocious doctrine of everlasting misery, and thereby departed from the Universalism of Origen and other noteworthy doctors of early centuries, it has involved itself in hopeless confusion over all such subjects as Sin, Redemption, and other doctrines which from the Gnostic standpoint involve no difficulties which cannot be met and mastered consistently with faith in Supreme Love and Wisdom. Milton's "Paradise Regained," and passages in the Roman liturgical office for Holy Saturday, show clear traces of their early origin, but the beauty of the original is always seriously marred wherever the hideous nightmare of unending, and therefore useless, misery for any soul is a doctrine preached or even tolerated. The Fall of Angels is said in the Kabbalah, and in much other esoteric literature, to have antedated the Fall of the Human Race, but all these angels "who kept not their first estate" were, according to Origen and other "merciful doctors," suffering expiatory penalties, and through the agency of such suffering were being gradually brought into harmony with divine order. It is well known that the most distinguished theologians in the English Church to-day have no sympathy with that Augustinian theology which blighted Christendom in the 5th century. The age of the Zohar, or Book of Splendor, a most important Kabbalistic work, may be disputed, but whenever and wherever it may have been actually put together, and it is unmistakably a compilation rather than an original work produced by a single author, the teaching it contains is both ancient and universal, Jewish and extra-Jewish, though never anti-Jewish. Some Christian commentators in recent years, particularly among Frenchmen, have endeavored to prove that it is partly a Christian work, but the proffered evidences are unconvincing, though it contains much that agrees perfectly with many of the best and purest teachings found in the writings of the earlier "fathers." No real scholar to-day would think of pronouncing the first 11 chapters of Genesis literally historical, and it is with their esoteric containment that the Zohar most interestingly deals. Judaism shared with other religions a tradition of an earthly Paradise in the long ago, and the Hebrews as a people shared many beliefs with other nations, therefore we need not be surprised to find abundant traces of the same traditions and beliefs in many different sacred writings of varying ages and local origins. A. E. Waite informs his readers accurately enough that "an adequate study of the Zohar on the subject of angelology, the fall of the angels, the hierarchy of demons which came about as a consequence, would begin in Talmudic literature and would be itself an undertaking of no inconsiderable magnitude, for behind that literature lies all Oriental belief." (The Secret Doctrine in Israel, page 80.) That the Kabbalah teaches that there is a sense in which God is the author of "evil" cannot be denied, but all Bible students who treat the Bible fairly must face that mystery, put with amazing boldness in the 45th chapter of Isaiah, written undoubtedly in the post-exilic period in Israel's history, i. e., after the return to Palestine at the end of the Babylonian captivity. If we postulate a Supreme One, "Creator of heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible," to quote verbatim from the Nicene Creed, we must hold God originally and ultimately responsible for all that occurs in the Universe, and that the Kabbalists do not shrink from doing. But though it seems very terrible to hold Deity to account for ir-remediable evil, the Kabbalah knows of none such, and regards all experiences through which angels and men can pass as radically educational. It makes all the difference imaginable whether one regards evil as permanent or only transitory, and whether one sees in it a possibility of conversion into good, as in music we know that all discords are resolvable into harmonies. Robert Browning's magnificent poem, Abt Vogler, is a beautiful English version of Zoharic teaching which reaches its climacteric in the thrilling words, "There shall never be one lost good, and for evil so much good more." Browning trod securely where Milton seems less definitely pronounced, and where Tennyson only fervently hoped. Whatever may be the exactly correct definition of the term "Christ," the Universalism of the writer commonly called Paul the Apostle is unquestionable if we credit the splendid affirmation included in the canticle for Easter Day according to the usage of the Church of England, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." How shamefully those sublime words have been watered down and travestied until they have lost nearly all of their original significance, is a sad and shameful story which needs no rehearsing here, but in a treatise on Kabbalah it is necessary to say at least a word concerning that union of Hebraism and Hellenism which is as conspicuous in some of the Pauline epistles as in the philosophy of Philo of Alexandria. Though there are many points of technical difference between Greek Gnosticism and Hebrew Kabbalism these differences are far more superficial than fundamental, for both systems acknowledge a hierarchy of celestial intelligences through whose instrumentality the Supreme One guides and operates the Universe, and both systems have much to say about the fall of angels and men from an estate of simple innocence, their passage through trials and sufferings to a height they had never previously attained, and the ultimate triumph of righteousness over error in so perfectly complete a mannner that no vestige of wrong shall ultimately remain to mar the spiritual symmetry of the Universe. Christian Gnostics simply said that the work of restoration and glorification would be accomplished through the Christ, while Jewish Kabbalists employed another terminology. No Gnostic ever speaks of "vicarious" atonement, sacrifice or redemption, for the idea of vicariousness is utterly foreign and repugnant to the Gnostic and also to the Kabbalistic mind. We feel deeply indebted to A. E. Waite for the extreme lucidity with which he has expressed the Kabbalistic idea of the 2 Trees, especially of the Tree of Temptation, in the following luminous paragraphs which quickly follow our recent quotation:

"God created that Tree the eating of which meant that the full understanding of the evil side of things entered into the life of humanity, but the saving clause is that it imparted also the knowledge of good. There can be no question that from this point of view the Tree of the Trespass is a synonym or image of the Written Law, for this is prohibition above all things, which defines evil and separates that which is so imputed from what is recognized as good. It is understood, however, that the definition is on the formal side and stands therein at its value, without reference to essentials."

In the Kabbalah, though we have so much dissertation concerning the Sephiroth, or emanations from the Supreme One, we find no exact parallel with the Demiurgos of the Gnostics or the 9 Choirs of Dionysius. The Demons of the Kabbalah are practically identical with the Infernal Hosts of Swedenborg, which constitute those Hells which are inverted Heavens. The Swedenborgian idea of heavens and hells standing feet to feet, is pure Kabbalism and also Gnosticism, but a large number of commentators on Swedenborg insist that he teaches the endless wilful continuance of hells, which is an utter perversion of the original concept. There are 2 philosophical explanations of the origin of this grievous misconception—one is that the relation between cause and effect being essentially unalterable, the same cause must produce the same effect no matter in what world or age it may operate; the other interpretation of the root of the idea of perpetual evil is found in the supposition that there are always some rudimental worlds or experimental stations in the universe, therefore, though no individual soul or group of souls remains in an infernal state everlastingly, there are always some individuals and groups in that condition. This idea is conceivable, and if we take our little planet as a sample of all worlds and our individual progressive experiences as universally typical, we find no difficulty in accepting such a view. Lucifer is Lightbringer, Satan is Adversary; these 2 opposing titles are applied to the same Archangel at different times, Lucifer when he is functioning as dispenser of divine knowledge and Satan when he is acting as the Tempter of humanity. In some rather doubtful portions of Kabbalistic literature we read a great deal about evil (fallen or inverted) angels comingling with humanity and introducing sorcery and all manner of mysterious abominations upon earth. This uncanny subject, which is of very doubtful authenticity, is treated very fully in Laurence Oliphant's "Scientific Religion," also in "The Perfect Way or the Finding of Christ," by Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland. It is not an agreeable theme to contemplate nor is it a profitable subject to pursue; we simply allude to it in passing but have no wish to develop it as it has invariably proved a source of much unwholesome and gruesome speculation. The following quotation from A. E. Waite's erudite work (page 87) is a splendid summarization of Kabbalistic teaching concerning the 2 serpents, diametrically opposed the one to the other, which figure so prominently in the Hebrew, Greek and many other Scriptures. "As there is a serpent below which is still at work in the world, so there is a sacred serpent above which watches over mankind in all the roads and pathways and restrains the power of the impure serpent. It is one of the adornments of the heavenly throne." This expressive and enlightening declaration seems adequate to explain why the serpent is so generally feared and detested and is at the same time a badge of the disciples of Æsculapius and regarded as a symbol of healing force and regenerative energy. The serpents in the sand, according to Exodus, severely injured the Children of Israel while journeying through the Wilderness to Canaan, but the antidote to their affliction was supplied by Moses pointing them to an uplifted image of the cause of their affliction. The serpent essentially is the carnal or sense nature in us all, which must be upraised and transmuted; it therefore becomes our initiatory discipline to elevate each his own serpentine attributes, and by so doing accomplish Magnum Opus, the mighty work of alchemical transmutation, not in an external sense of converting metals into gold, but in the esoteric sense of gaining perfect victory over all animality.

CHAPTER IX.

BIBLICAL TRADITIONS KABBALISTICALLY CONSIDERED.

To the average reader of the Bible to-day—and that marvelous collection of ancient literature is certainly undergoing careful reconsideration—there are only 2 possible views of such stories as that of the Deluge and many other startling narratives, viz., that they must either be rejected as mere legends of an unscientific age or else be regarded from the standpoint of esoteric canons of elucidation. The Fall of Man we have already incidentally considered, and we think sufficiently to suggest a meeting place between the 2 seemingly opposed doctrines of the Fall and the Rise of humanity, concepts which at first seem inevitably irreconcilable. From the Kabbalistic, as from the Rosicrucian and other kindred points of view, the apparent discrepancy melts into harmony as though we were gazing upon 2 sides of a single shield, each side decorated with an inscription, one relating to spiritual involution, the other to physical evolution. The poet Whittier's famous lines,

> "Step by step since time began
> We see the steady gain of man," refer to evolutionary development on the form side of our existence. The fall of humanity out of original innocence is by no means inconsistent with this cheering concept. The Kabbalah, in common with all Hermetic writings, takes the individual as a type of the race and includes all human experiences in a sublime comprehensive synthesis, expressible in the wide-embracing phrase: AS ABOVE, SO BELOW, AND AS WITHOUT, SO WITHIN. Involution pertains to the descent of spirit into matter; evolution is the process whereby incarnated spirit makes its way onward and upward to self-conscious celestial blessedness. That particularly prominent emblem, the double triangle, which holds the place of honor in Judaism which the cross holds in Christianity and the crescent in Mohammedanism, expresses in a perfect symbol, the idea of equipoise, and when the sacred letters denoting the Divine Name are placed within it, it fully conveys the idea of the immortal spiritual entity and its outward and inward manifestations. The descent of spirit suggests no trip resulting in a sort of tumble down a ladder, but a gradual process of orderly descent. But whether we believe in a fall or in a descent we have to face the fact that humanity is in a sense "down and out," and it is for us to do all in our power to work our way out of our present low estate by climbing upward to celestial eminences. It cannot be unimportant whether we believe in a "disgraceful fall" or in a coming downward and outward for experimental purposes, for the first idea is utterly depressing while the latter is highly invigorating. It is the most positive duty of all who have a definitely encouraging and inspiring message to deliver to humanity to give it unhesitatingly in these days when many are struggling in the morass of pessimism or else laboring to reconcile harsh theological dogmas with scientific revelations. We can easily understand the Kabbalistic and Rosicrucian attitude toward a past age when humanity was much more palpably guided and upheld by spiritual overseers than now, because of the requirements of racial as well as of individual infancy which are being gradually outgrown. A child of 18 months must be provided for in all ways, while the same child having attained to the age of 18 years may be fairly sent out into the world to earn a living. Nothing is easier than to protect infants from falling by taking entire charge of them, but we cannot treat young men and women in any similar manner, and if we could and did we should most certainly arrest their physical, intellectual and moral development.

The Kabbalah, in common with practically all esoteric literature, presupposes a life for humanity prior to earthly generation, not altogether unlike Maeterlinck's conception in "The Bluebird," where he presents a mystical vision of souls awaiting terrestrial embodiment.

The Koran, which tells us that each individual's destiny is fixed before birth, is not utterly fatalistic by any means, and Jewish sages have declared that all things are regulated by Divine Providence except the use that we may make of our opportunities. This view harmonizes many conflicting theories satisfactorily, and it is largely borne out by the united facts of inner consciousness and outward experience, for we all feel a sense of responsibility for how we disport ourselves in the midst of circumstances which seem to be in no way of our own ordaining.

While the Kabbalah has a great deal to say about a spirit of evil as opposed to good, we need to remember that the view of evil taken by all enlightened Kabbalists is twofold, evil being mentioned both positively as an inversion of good and negatively as a privation of good. Nakedness denotes destitution, simple lack of raiment, while acting in disobedience to a divine direction implies inversion of faculty. It appears self-evident that these 2 kinds of evil are within us to-day, not in the absolute but certainly in the relative sense, and it is only by admitting these facts and resolutely determining to vanquish the solicitations of the lower self that we can rise to a realization of our inherent spiritual potencies. You cannot brace a young man or woman to become a victor over seductions by telling one who is setting forth upon a life career that there are no temptations to be met, but you may legitimately term them illusory in the last analysis, because they proceed from ignorance and from false valuations. Whether we believe that we have fallen into carnality or that we are rising out of it, we are assuredly convinced, if we think in the least deeply, that we are now being urged by the indwelling spirit to outgrow our sensual impulses and mystically transmute the serpent into the eagle. It is often urged, from the pragmatic or utilitarian standpoint, and not without much show of reason, that so long as we attain desired results it matters not how we may have reached them. This contention, carried to its logical extreme, results finally in the dangerous declaration, "the end justifies the means," which is both a truth and a fallacy according to the sense in which the sentence is employed. The Kabbalah with its uncompromising stand for undiluted righteousness is careful to insist that all means employed in the outworking of the world-plan are righteous means, therefore it is always holding up before us the penalties which follow upon transgression of a holy law which it is our privilege to obey gladly and completely. The Kabbalah does not postulate human weakness or sinfulness, but takes a decidedly heroic view of human nature; it therefore does not hesitate to enforce a doctrine of consequences which are commonly styled rewards and punishments,—terms which are often grievously misleading, because they convey to most people an arbitrary conferment of reward and infliction of penalty which can at any time be changed by Almighty fiat in answer to the supplications of pleading humanity. Why did God permit the expulsion from Eden, the Flood, and many other terrible calamities which have overtaken the human race, are queries constantly raised, and seemingly very difficult to answer, but only because certain fundamental fallacies hold back the average questioner from perceiving the true answer. The Kabbalah knows nothing of an angry, impetuous or capricious Deity, and therefore never attributes acts of vengeance or petulance to the Most High. But, pursues the caviller, if you do not believe that God becomes angry you deny the plain statements of the Bible, an objection to which we dare to offer a decided negative. The Bible is largely a record of human experiences; its letter, therefore, is written in accommodated language, entirely true to human experience but not declarative of the real attitude of the Divine Mind. It is not God who changes, but man's view of Deity that alters, and it seems impossible to conceive of a growing humanity while excluding the thought of changing human concepts. It is not "the Thing in Itself" that varies, but our idea thereof, consequently it appears to those who are in the condition called the state of "the wicked" that God is continually wrath with them, but let them turn from their wickedness and God's wrath is no longer a concept of their imagination. Our minds are like inverted mirrors when we are in error; we behold things upside down, as objects are reflected in a stream. Did we not correct the evidence of our external vision when gazing at reflections we should invariably state the position of things in reverse order, and it could not be otherwise. The original Christian doctrine of Atonement was not foreign to Kabbalistic teaching, for it is found stated in the New Testament that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself," not Himself unto the world.

It is this rightly inverted viewpoint that makes Kabbalistic teaching so wholly acceptable, in the main, to scientific thinkers and true philosophers who read all histories in a wider light than that of their merest letter and most particular applications.

Considering this external world in the light of an experimental station where souls are (so to speak) "tried out" we have little if any difficulty in accepting the essential doctrine underlying the following impressive statement from Waite's remarkable volume (page 93): "As regards what theology would call the matter of the sin there is no need to add that the apple is not understood literally. It is called sometimes the fruit of the vine, that is to say, grapes; but this is a veil also and is to be understood as the explanation of a certain mystery of knowledge, which belongs to the domain of sex. These are the fruits which are said elsewhere to be agreeable, on the authority of Genesis, but they trouble the spirits of those who make bad use of them, as Noah did in the case of his own vine. He who rode upon the serpent, the Tempter Spirit or Samael, who is said to have descended from heaven so mounted, as if he were an accredited messenger, approached Eve and testified that the Holy One created the world by help of the Tree of Knowledge; that by eating thereof, and so only, was He able to create the world; and that if the woman ate of it, on her own part, she would attain the same power."

This extraordinary quotation seems to throw some light on the Satan (Accuser) of the Book of Job, which is a singularly fine specimen of Hebrew epic poetry. Another excerpt from "The Secret Doctrine in Israel" (page 95) reads as follows: "Recurring to the substitution of a mystical vine for the apple-tree, another tradition certifies that Eve pressed grapes and gave the juice to her husband. The opening of their eyes was to behold all the ills of the world."

Regarding Cain and Abel the Kabbalah states that the image of Abel was from above and that of Cain from below. There is much resemblance between the teachings of the Kabbalah and the doctrines of Swedenborg, especially as regards the typical characters in Genesis being "churches" rather than single individuals.

Turning now to the account of the Deluge we find in the Kabbalah a great deal of curious speculation and secret doctrine relating to some curious intercourse between spiritual beings and terrestrialized humanity, but those commentators who put as rationalistic an interpretation as possible upon these legends see in them only a forcible argument against the intermarriage of Jews with Gentiles, and in a wider sense, of the elect with the profane. It appears perfectly clear that the Kabbalah regards physical generation as an evidence of descent into a lower condition than the primitive estate of humanity, but the descent having been accomplished, and it having become necessary to agree to it, the marriage covenant must be established and relations between the sexes kept as pure as possible.

According to the Zohar, humanity gradually travelled a downward path until a definite "mystery of iniquity" was reached, when an overwhelming physical catastrophe became necessary to rid the planet of the grossest of its impurities and afford the race an opportunity for taking a fresh start upward.

Intermingled with a perplexing mass of complicated mystery, we find in the Zoharic account of the Deluge a considerable amount of sound philosophy, as, for instance, when we are told that the Holy Land was not flooded. Literally such a statement is not necessarily improbable, for we have no authentic history of any completely universal inundations.

The story of Noah's Ark viewed esoterically is highly suggestive of that symmetrical development of human character necessary to secure exemption from calamity. The Ark must be made of a strong and enduring wood, and it must be built of 3 stories and a cubit above. Here we have plainly suggested the idea of 4 planes of consciousness—Physical, Mental, Moral, Spiritual. As there must be a stairway from one landing to another, and the 7-hued rainbow is prominently mentioned in connection with the establishment of a Divine Covenant with Noah, we can, at least poetically, describe the Ark of Safety as having a red first story and a yellow 2nd story reached by an orange stairway; then a green stairway leading to a blue 3rd story, and finally a violet observatory reached by an indigo ladder.

The character of Noah, and his alleged drunkenness, is interestingly and mildly dealt with. Noah plants a mystical vineyard and partakes freely of its produce, but his determination all through is to try experiments with a view to discovering wherein consists the sin of the world, and if possible to find a remedy. Noah's humiliating state while intoxicated refers only to his destitution of adequate knowledge, even after much research, and this ignorance was exposed by his failure to have found the sought-for remedy.

Turning now to the Babel legend we find the Zohar by no means silent concerning the confusion of tongues. The original single sacred language was that of universal symbolism, which remained intact so long as unity of purpose prevailed among those familiar with the hieroglyphics, but directly rivalry and jealousy crept in, confusion of speech and ambiguity of interpretation so far resulted that the work of tower and temple building was frustrated and the elaborate schemes of the ambitious designers were brought to naught. Here we find a close parallel with the Oriental doctrine of the sin of separateness, which only means mutual antagonism.

Comparatively few persons, apart from special philosophers, ever discriminate at all clearly between distinctiveness and separateness, yet in our commonest speech we readily suggest the accurate shades of meaning as, for example, when we say that 2 persons have had a separation and yet we know that they are no further apart geographically than when they were on terms of close mutual friendship.

To build the Tower or Temple of Solomon necessitates perfectly co-operative action on the part of spiritually federated workers; the Tower of Babel, which can never attain completeness, is the synonym of amalgamated discord.

It is delightful to find in the course of our Kabbalistic studies that this curious mystical work is thoroughly abreast with the best modern ideas of universal language, and much else that bears closely on the practical unification of humanity. We read in the Zohar that "a day will dawn when the Lord will change the tongues of all peoples into a single pure tongue, so that all may invoke His Holy Name and all pass under His Yoke in one spirit." This prediction is virtually made during the recitation of the Olenu, which forms an important part of every Jewish liturgy. There is no dogmatic unanimity in Israel regarding ways and means, but the prevailing sentiment is universally the same throughout Jewry as concerns the final outcome. Judaism holds within it the vital germs of universal religion—the Unity of God and the Solidarity of Humanity.

Talmud or Midrash may appear very external and excessively ritualistic, but Kabbalah delves deeply into the heart of Israel's veiled and guarded mysteries and introduces us, though not always very clearly, to a magnificent Arcana.

CHAPTER X.

ABRAHAM, MELCHISEDEC, MOSES AND THE LAW.

The Sacrifice of Isaac, commemorated by Jews throughout the world on the first day of the month Tishri, called Rosh Hashana and Day of Memorial in Jewish calendars, marks the birth of Judaism because of the emphasis placed upon a spiritual vs. a carnal idea of sacrifice. All barbaric peoples offered literal human sacrifices, and some savage tribes continue the practise still. Abraham, considered historically, was probably a Chaldean Chief about to conform to the barbaric usage of his place and time; but a bright spiritual light broke in upon his consciousness and he came to perceive that the true offering of sacrifice is by consecration to high ideals, never by the shedding of literal blood. Even the grossly carnal mind, which fails to see a spiritual significance in any narrative, ought to be able, if endowed with even the most ordinary reasoning ability, to see in the story of Abraham and Isaac a radical departure from all belief in the efficacy or legitimacy of human sacrifice. Even the sacrifice of animals,—against which only vegetarians have a right to protest,—was so restricted in Israel that the unblemished beasts, which were alone available for sacrificial purposes, were to be offered only under very definite restrictions. Practically the whole of Jewish prophetical literature discards the literal practise of sacrificing in toto and urges only spiritual offerings. This is essentially the Kabbalistic or esoteric view, which raises and internalizes the whole matter to such an extent as to do away completely with final vestiges of barbarity.

If animal food is to form any part of human diet it is surely desirable that animals slain for food should be in the healthiest condition possible, therefore kosher meat is preferable to trefa; but when we are out of kitchens and eating places and engaged in spiritual contemplation in a sanctuary we ought to be prepared to discard literal interpretations and behold something of the sublime inner verities which external narratives enshrine.

The Zoharic view of Abraham and his spiritual mission is intensely interesting for all who are seeking to discover something below the surface of the familiar literal narrative. The Call of Abraham viewed Kabbalistically is a spiritual summons to depart utterly from old ways of thought and action and enter upon a truly regenerate life. By so doing this illustrious patriarch becomes a "Father of the Faithful" and heads an Order whose intention it is to enlighten the entire world as far as possible. We see now something of the original idea of divine election, for Israel in Abraham is called to fulfil an educational mission, that in Isaac and his posterity all families of the earth may eventually be blessed.

The Kabbalah tells us that Abraham was endowed with a spirit of wisdom far beyond the ordinary, and this enabled him to accomplish a mystic journey from his native land to a new country, the situation of which was spiritually revealed to him. The mystical interpretation of the command, "Go into a land that I will show thee," is that the man who obeyed it would henceforth occupy himself with spiritual pursuits and become a spiritual leader of humanity. It however appears that Kabbalists, in common with all Israelites, have long regarded Palestine as a specially sacred country and the true centre or heart of this planet. The career of Abraham in Egypt opens up a wide field for speculation, for in all senses of the word Egypt is the antithesis of Palestine and Christian equally with Jewish Scriptures treat this marvellous country esoterically as well as literally. Such passages appear in the New Testament as "Out of Egypt have I called my Son" and "In Egypt and in Sodom where the Lord was crucified." The Biblical accounts of Egypt are diverse and convey glimpses of the land of the Nile during many stages of its fluctuating history. At one time Egypt is presented as a centre of light and liberty, and at another period as a land given over to demoralization and slavery.

If this statement of varying conditions is applied mystically to the external in contradistinction from the internal man it is assuredly an instructive simile, for the outer man is subject to varying control, sometimes swayed from without and sometimes directed from within. But far more mysterious and spiritually significant than Abraham is Melchisedec to whom he offers a sacred oblation.

The mystery surrounding Melchisedec is actually impenetrable if we regard this marvellous character simply as a historic personage, for it is stated that this "King of Salem, Priest of the Most High God, has neither father nor mother, beginning of days nor end of life." There are 2 senses in which this statement is credible: it may refer to an illustrious Order of immemorial antiquity and it may also relate to the spiritual entity regarded as an immortal unit, a pure simple, uncompounded and everlasting. The 110th psalm says, "Thou are a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec," and in the Epistle to the Hebrews the author draws a sharp and vivid contrast between the Order of Melchisedec and the Order of Aaron. According to the Kabbalah the former has to do solely with internal and the latter with external affairs.

The Abrahamic Covenant, involving literal physical circumcision, necessitates ceremonial observance and obedience, but a covenant of a purely spiritual nature does not necessarily take any outward ritual into account. The agelong controversy over Levitical and Prophetical Judaism is not ended yet, though it was at its height in Palestine 18 or 19 centuries ago. This controversy was acute when some of the Pauline Epistles were written, as internal evidence abundantly proves. Saul of Tarsus after espousing an esoteric form of Christianity, in which we find a commingling of Hebraic and Hellenic elements, seeks to settle disputes between Mystics and Ritualists by deciding that all external observances must be left to individual discretion, and when one is "in Christ" and has become "a new creation" he is no longer subject to any external law.

That there is a certain amount of danger to morality in an utter disregard of outer ceremonial has always been admitted, and for that reason wise teachers of the esoteric schools have always insisted that it is only subsequent to some very definite spiritual illumination that one can safely become a law unto himself. In Waite's remarkable book from which we have already quoted, we find the following interesting reference to the significance of the Covenant (page 119): "The Sign of the Covenant constitutes the foundation of the Sacred Name and of the Mystery of Faith—the root of the notion being probably the shape of the letter Yod with which the Name commences, or this at least is the material root." Then proceeding to a far more interior definition, the same author tells us "By the fact of circumcision man enters under the wings of the Shekinah." Now as it is well known that the literal rite is only a simple sanitary surgical operation, performed frequently by Gentile surgeons who attach to it no spiritual or religious significance, a person thus circumcised is not thereby admitted into the House of Israel; it stands to reason that something far deeper than an outward act was originally intended by The Sign of the Covenant. No uncircumcised person can lawfully eat the Passover. But as the literal rite pertains to males only, and in all truly esoteric fellowships qualified males and females are placed on a footing of complete equality, we see at once that all the elements in the essential Covenant pertain to a spiritual realm with which, however, the external world can be brought into complete representative correspondence.

Concerning Melchisedec, to whom Abraham does obeisance, Professor Piazzi Smyth, at one time Astronomer Royal of Scotland, says in his extraordinary volume, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid," that he was the divinely inspired agent employed as architect of that stupendous, awe-inspiring pile. Theosophically viewed this assertion is not difficult to credit because the Order of Melchisedec closely corresponds with the Great White Lodge of Adepts who possess a knowledge of the abiding Mysteries far beyond the loftiest imagination of the uninitiated religious as well as unreligious world.

Addressing our attention now to Moses, whose name in Hebrew, Moshe, means drawn up out of the water, we find by reference to the Zohar that his career begins and ends in mystery. Kabbalists give honor to the tradition that "Shekinah reposed on the nuptial bed of his parents," but there is no suggestion of any "miraculous" conception. It is further declared that Shekinah never deserted him throughout his life of 120 years, and when this was ended he was transported by angels to Paradise. No definitely consistent stories are related of what became of his physical remains, if there were any. Some traditions assert that his physical body was dissipated and therefore none remained to find and bury. Other traditions declare that Moses was the first man on earth who attained to moral perfection, but this is disputed; the general concensus of agreement being that he was not perfect, but approached more nearly to perfection than any other prophet.

Moses Maimonides, who compiled the 13 Articles of the Jewish Faith in the 12th century of the present era, says that Moses was the greatest of all the prophets who arose in Israel, for he beheld God's similitude. Much quibbling has been indulged around this saying, which probably means that he was a very prince of anthropologists; for if humanity is spiritually in the Divine Image, one who has truly fathomed human nature has beheld God's similitude. It is stated in the Zohar that Moses was directly illumined by interior enlightenment instead of being only the recipient of truth conveyed measurably through angelic ministrations.

The original root of the distinctively Mosaic idea of an elect people with a mission to fulfil on behalf of all humanity, is clearly traceable in the assertion that it is by Moses that all nations have received a knowledge of the way of salvation which is indeed through faith, but faith according to Israelitish teaching is not belief in any doctrines, but fealty or fidelity, which constitutes righteousness; a righteous man therefore is not a "believer" but one who morally "walks uprightly."

While there is an outer Law which it is desirable that all mankind should know and observe, there is also an inner Law which Moses communicated to the "very elect." The letter of the Law "killeth,"

but the spirit "giveth life," according to a New Testament authority.

The Pentateuch read in its letter only certainly does have a great deal to say about slaying animals for sacrifices, and also it ordains a death penalty for men guilty of serious offences; but when the spiritual meaning is unveiled a totally different idea is conveyed to the studious reader. Great attention is given in the Kabbalah to the Oral Tradition, which is never committed to writing but handed on from one generation to another by teachers who in turn appoint successors to the Oral ministry.

It is said that Moses ascended Mount Sinai clad in the vesture of Shekinah, that is how he ascended safely at a time when no other dared approach even to the mountain's base.

Students of Occultism, and all interested in the fascinating question of a possible protecting shield of aura, will see at a glance what deep significance may attach to the Exodus story, which needs to be regarded far more as an allegory than as a literal narrative.

The 91st psalm throws much light on immunity, and modern science is wrestling with the problem of how to attain and maintain a permanently aseptic condition. Danger and safety are purely relative terms, relating entirely to varying degrees of susceptibility and the reverse.

A Kabbalistic tradition affirms that when Moses brought down the Law to the people, Israel was reclothed with a cuirass formed from the letters of the Sacred Name which was the protection of Adam and Eve while in a state of unsullied innocence. In order to obtain the proffered blessings of the Holy Covenant Israel must take the solemn vow, "All that the Lord hath commanded we will do." Sanctification was impossible without complete obedience. We can now gain a clear view of the difference between Ceremonial and Ethical Judaism, though the 2 are by no means essentially at variance.

The Zohar gives a description of the 2 Tables of Stone on which were engraved the 10 Commandments which is positively unique and has doubtless an important esoteric meaning. It is related that Tables were given to Moses on the Sabbath and that they were "created prior to the formation of the world by the coagulation of the sacred dew which is said to fall on the Garden of Apples. They were written before and behind, and were symbolized by the leaves of proposition." One account describes them as transparent while another speaks of them as containing writing resembling "black fire on white fire." The writing in front must be read from behind and that behind must be deciphered from before.

Concerning the breaking of the original Tables, the Kabbalah does not admit that Moses broke them, but they were broken, and the letters disappeared, on account of the people's unworthiness, so that if anyone picked up the scattered fragments he would find nothing engraved thereon. The shattered Tables are said to have contained the Oral together with the Written Law, but the bulk of the people was not worthy to possess so priceless an inheritance, therefore the Inner Law returned to Heaven, but the Written Law was given again on new tablets that remained unbroken and from which the letters did not disappear. It was only into concealment that the inmost teaching went; it was therefore perpetually preserved as a secret tradition in Israel accessible to the worthy though completely veiled from the unworthy. The Veil over the face of Moses which he wore only because of the inability of the people to gaze on his unscreened countenance is hereby adequately explained.

The strangely disfiguring horns which mar Michael Angelo's famous painting of Moses are due to a misinterpretation of the radiant beams of light which streamed from his face after the descent from Sinai, and in a much more interior sense this luminous emanation refers to the effulgence of the Law which must be veiled, as to its interior significance, from the mental vision of a people who would be only dazzled and confused, and therefore not edified, by a disclosure of its interior meanings beyond their power to comprehend. It ought not to be difficult to discover the why and wherefore of an inner and an outer doctrine if we do but take into account the necessity for giving graded instruction to pupils as they are prepared to receive it, "line upon line and precept upon precept." The outer Law is both ethical and ceremonial; the inner Law deals with spiritual problems, comparable with higher mathematics.

The Zohar compares the traditional law which has proceeded out of the written law, to an ass, the typical burden-bearer, and many are the figurative allusions to Messiah riding upon an ass, particularly upon a white ass. This symbol teaches that in all external things there will be manifested an equity in judgment which will bring the external world and all its concerns into complete alignment with the loftiest spiritual ideals.

"Speak ye who ride on white asses, ye who sit in judgment," is a significant quotation from the 5th chapter of Judges.

Concerning the Oral Law we are told that though it is the source of every imaginable blessing to the upright it would act as a poison to the unfaithful, therefore it is mercifully withheld from them. Nothing can be more readily demonstrated than the pernicious results of misuse of many things in themselves excellent, and we surely need not to be told that in the handling of instruments and chemicals due preparedness is an absolute necessity. There are many Kabbalistic sayings which quickly throw light upon the enormous difference between spirit and letter. The following is a good sample illustration: There is a tradition that angels buried the body of Moses outside the Holy Land, and that no man knoweth the place of his sepulchre. This sepulchre allegorically alludes to the Mishna, which is called "a maidservant who takes the place of her mistress." The Secret Doctrine was interned in the Written Word and remained with the 70 Elders who expounded it secretly. Moses never waned in strength as years rolled by, therefore when he made his farewell address to the Congregation, though he had reached the ripe age of 120 years, his vigor was youthful and his vision unimpaired. All who pay heed to a doctrine of Correspondence, such as Swedenborg enunciated and elucidated, will readily unravel much of the Kabbalistic mystery and they will not be confused with the mingling of outer history with esoteric doctrine, because they will never lose sight of the Hermetic axiom, "As Within so Without." A reasonable consideration of Kabbalistic methods of conveying instruction soon sweeps away the fog which obscures practical metaphysical teaching from the comprehension of a multitude of people who are seemingly too dense to see that there can be no outward effect without an adequate interior cause; and likewise that every hidden cause presses forward into corresponding exterior effect.

There is a prophecy that Moses will reappear on earth at the end of a long age, he having already received the mystical degree termed Binah, but not yet the still higher degree Chokmah. The Zohar declares that Moses did not die as the result of any transgression but through the fulfilment of a supreme mystery, and the same tradition declares also that his successor, Joshua, was similarly free from active sin and from its consequences. Lifting as far as we can the veil of allegory which shrouds the tenets of the Kabbalah we find in whatever direction we turn a radiant hope held out to humanity that through the mysterious processes of spiritual transmutation the serpent and all it signifies shall become in deed and truth the means whereby an erring, because imperfect, race shall attain through symmetrical development of all powers and faculties to a Paradise of blessedness far exceeding in joy and wisdom any primeval Eden out of which a primitive people were expelled. The true Sanctuarists, or Illuminati, are the agents by which universal redemption is to be expected.

DOCTRINE OF THE 3 TEMPLES OF THE MESSIAH.

Though, as we have pointed out repeatedly in previous chapters, the Kabbalah aims at a spiritual or mystical view of all subjects with which it deals, Kabbalists as a rule never attempt to cast discredit on external narratives. The 3 Temples which rose and fell in Jerusalem are allowed therefore to have been material structures as well as glyphs of interior realities far transcending all exterior erections. In the florid Oriental metaphor with which Kabbalistic literature abounds we are told that the inner sanctuary of the Temple constitutes the heart of the world and that Shekinah dwells therein as a faithful wife abides continually with her virtuous husband. The design for the Temple was drawn in Heaven and shown to David, by whom it was shown to Solomon. The Temple was erected on 7 pillars and the craftsmen followed exactly the divinely revealed design point by point until the structure was completely finished. There was a sense in which the work was self-executed, because the builders were led by inspiration to do precisely as the unseen Architect intended. The Temple was erected to fully externalize the supernal union between God and Israel. The various sections of the mighty structure set forth the idea of the earth inhabited by various Peoples encompassing the Holy City, the abode of Israel. Concerning the 2 earlier Temples than the one which enjoyed considerable longevity the Zohar states that the 1st was not perfectly constructed because of the sin of the people in the Wilderness, and the 2nd was imperfect on account of sin at the time of Ezra. Going still further, the Kabbalah informs us that the truly abiding Temple, which can never be destroyed, is indeed "a house not made with hands," consequently it remains unaffected amid all terrestrial permutations. The Temple of Solomon was symbolic of penitence and prayer, and its overthrow is regarded as a result of impenitence by the strictly orthodox in Israel, though among "liberal" Jews there are many who shed no tears over its destruction, therefore they celebrate no fast of Ab, a day of great lamentation among those who adhere to the strict letter of uncompromising orthodoxy. Taken in their exterior meanings only many Kabbalistic references to the Temples are far from clear, but it requires no very wide acquaintance with the significance of metaphor to discern a deep interior meaning worthy of the highest regard. The figurative references to "sun" and "moon" may throw much light on the obscure passage in Joshua which states that he commanded the sun and moon to stand still and they stood still a whole day. The sun is always significant of the source whence humanity derives illumination, spiritual and physical alike; the moon typifies earthly regnancy which shines only with borrowed light. In the Zohar we are told that "the sun turned away from the moon and enlightened it no longer; then there was no day without sufferings and lamentations." But no sooner have we heard the wail over what is lost than our attention is joyfully turned to better days to come, even to the Messianic era in which "the moon shall resume its primal light." (Here are plain allusions, though figuratively conveyed, to a temporary separation of civil government from spiritual direction, to be followed by a resanctification of all secular affairs.) We extract the following paragraphs from A. E. Waite's elaborate account of these traditions and prophecies (pages 137-140) to give our readers an exact illustration of the curiously involved manner in which Kabbalists have foretold the coming of a glorious event which they are by no means alone in jubilantly anticipating. "The Holy One will remember His people Israel and the Temple shall be rebuilt. Formerly it was based on severity and wrath, but it will be restored in charity and will be founded thereon. Meanwhile, since the destruction of the sanctuary here below, the Holy One swore never to enter the Jerusalem above until Israel returned into the Jerusalem below. No blessings have gone forth either in the world above or in that which is below, for these worlds depend on one another. The consolation of the elect is however that, in the absence of a place of sacrifice, devotion to the study of the Law will bring the forgiveness of sin more readily than the burnt offerings of old."

To the diligent student of the implications of peculiar language the foregoing mode of expression suggests a vital Truth, viz., that while sacrificing animals encouraged an idea of vicarious offerings, a study of the Law necessitated individual effort on the part of students, therefore greater enlightenment must follow upon the latter than upon the former course of action. Whichever way we look at the declaration we cannot fail to note its luminous prophecy of a future more glorious than the past, and not only for Israel but through Israel for all the human race. To the zealous Zionist the literal rebuilding of Jerusalem and recolonizing of Palestine must mean much, but there are many earnest and devout Jews who care but little for the actual rebuilding of any city and should there be a general flight to Palestine there would be vast numbers of influential Israelites who would not join in it. In the spiritual meaning of the terms Zion simply signifies an abode of holiness and Jerusalem an abode of peace, therefore the Law goeth forth from Jerusalem and from Zion, figuratively speaking, and from nowhere else, because peace and holiness are inseparable and where these are absent humanity cannot grasp divine ideals so as to fulfil them in actual expression. The mystical Temple is an organic human federation in which every member occupies the place of a particular stone assigned to a special niche. When this Temple is completed on earth the most glowing predictions of the most ardent prophets will be realized, for in that Lesser Holy Assembly, corresponding with the Greater Holy Assembly in spheres unseen by mortal vision, the Divine Will will be literally done on earth as in the Heavens. The coming of Messiah is regarded by Kabbalists as an initiatory or inaugural event. Messiah is conceived of as "God's righteous servant," the title, therefore, is sometimes applied to a single individual and at other times to a holy convocation made up of Illuminati. The spiritual Israel, through whom the entire world is to be regenerated, is composed of the righteous of all nations, not of race-Jews exclusively. The word "Jew" is sometimes used in a far more than ordinarily comprehensive sense, and when so employed it is taken to designate any man or woman who has attained to a realization of truth in a fuller degree than common, and who is included in the mystical organization of the truly faithful. Messianic prophecies have often been interpreted expansively as referring to a period when general enlightenment will be the rule, but as leadership is never a negligible subject we can readily perceive how much nearer together in essential agreement are 2 schools of thought usually supposed to be at total variance. Though some over-zealous Christian students of Kabbalah have stated that the Zohar makes mention of a Messiah who has appeared already, such an inference seems unwarrantable from the exact wording of the several texts, all of which unmistakably refer to a Golden Age which has not yet come, and which is to be a period of Messianic regnancy. The elect are said to hope always for the advent of the Man of Holiness, but here again we are confronted with the evident legitimacy of a broader rather than of a narrower interpretation, for all Jewish literature abounds in corporate descriptions and rarely if ever makes it evident that the advent of only a single personality is predicted in any prophecy.

The burden of agelong foretelling is that through the Sanctuarists or the inner mystic element in Israel, the whole human race shall be immeasurably blessed. The Virgin (young woman) of the 7th chapter of

Isaiah who conceives and bears Emanu-El is a figure of a holy nation whose pure offspring is to rule the entire world in righteousness. Though the singular Man is a word often introduced, the noun is as much plural as singular in English as in Hebrew, therefore the "man more precious than fine gold" may refer to a holy company quite as readily as to any one peculiarly illustrious individual. During the Messianic period, probably coeval with its very commencement, conversions to the faith of Israel will be very numerous; this does not, however, need to be taken narrowly, for it is only confession of the absolute unity of God and willing obedience to the Moral Law that can be said to constitute the essence of true religion from the Jewish standpoint, whether the Kabbalah be or be not consulted. Many glorious mysteries long concealed are to be revealed when the gladsome day dawns on which the veil will be removed which has for so many centuries overlain the Sanctuary, and as the happy period draws nigh even little children will penetrate to a wonderful arcana. If we are bound to consider a great variety of Kabbalistic traditions and predictions we may be led to suppose that several Messiahs are to be made manifest in differing degrees of splendor, and to each one of these will be assigned some special mission in the world's regeneration; 4 Messiahs are familiar to students of Kabbalah, called respectively

Son of Jesse (highest of them all); Son of Ephraim (who is referred to as a warrior); Son of Joseph, and Son of David. Sometimes the 2 latter seem to be but 2 titles applied to the same individual.

In view of the mental excitement now abounding over the likelihood of the speedy appearance of a World-Teacher who will inaugurate a new era in religion and statesmanship, and prove an arbitrator between different nations now presumably hostile to each other's interests, it may prove somewhat edifying to follow the Kabbalists in a few of their ingenious and intricate predictions, all looking to ultimate enlightenment and pacification of our (at present) storm-tossed world. The Ass upon which Messiah is to ride is variously dealt with as a symbol of peace and also (as the lower nature of humanity which is to be totally subdued) but in no way mutilated or destroyed by the one who rides thereon. Even when we are told that it is a "demon that shall be curbed" we need feel no surprise for the "mystery of godliness" may well be associated closely with the complete subjugation of all those animal impulses which when rampant and dominant are the cause of unspeakable misery and degradation to the human race.

All manner of curious doctrines familiar to readers of Occult, Spiritualistic, and kindred literature are dealt with in the Zohar; particular reference being made to the theory of spiritual counterparts. In A. E. Waite's exhaustive treatise, "The Secret Doctrine in Israel" (pages 146-7), we read: "The time of the coming of Messiah will be when all souls who are kept in the treasury of souls against the day of their incarnation shall have actually come hither in flesh. Thereafter it would seem that new souls will be incarnated in Israel. Then shall the chosen people deserve to find—and shall not fail herein—the beloved sister-soul predestined to each from the beginning of creation." Intruders are to be utterly banished, and by intruders in the esoteric sense we may well understand whatsoever would mar the harmony of human relations in the Golden Age. "Out of the heart and the mind shall the Intruders be cast, once and for all, and the soul shall find the Spouse." "It is a forecast of that time when the Mystery of Union, which is now a Mystery of Faith, shall have entered into realization in experience on this earth of ours, and as in the world above there is no distinction between Shekinah and the Holy One, so in that which is below there shall be such a spiritual communion between the Lover and the Beloved that the voice of the turtledove, which is the Canticle of Canticles, shall be heard everywhere, and of that time it may be said: The male with the female, neither male nor female." What follows is so extremely curious, and as it affords so realistic an example of Kabbalistic teaching, that though many readers may pronounce it of dubious authenticity we present it as an interesting matter for consideration in highly condensed form, and especially do we refer it to the thoughtful attention of any who enjoy speculating upon the significance of numbers.

When 60 years shall have passed since the 6th century of the 6th millenary it is foretold that heaven shall visit the Daughter of Jacob. In the 70th year Messiah shall be made manifest in Galilee. There are 5 great portents announcing this sublime event: (1) The rainbow (now tarnished) will shine with amazing brilliancy "like a betrothed lady adorned to meet her spouse." (2) A star will appear in the East and swallow up 7 stars in the North. (3) A fixed star will appear in the midst of the firmament and will be visible for 70 days. It will emit 70 rays and be surrounded by 70 other stars. (4) The city of Rome (or Babylon) will fall to pieces. (5) A mighty king will arise and conquer the world. War will be declared against Israel, but the Chosen People will be delivered. There is one tradition to the effect that the 70 celestial Chiefs who rule the 70 nations of the earth, will marshal all the legions of the world to make war upon Jerusalem, but they will be overthrown by the power of the Holy One. The Messiah will draw the whole world to him and bring about a perfect union between the heavens and the earth.

Israel Zangwill, in one of his remarkable semi-historical novels, "The Turkish Messiah," gives a thrilling account of a wave of fanaticism which at one time broke over some parts of Europe in consequence of the arrogant claims of a curious man who made many people believe that he was indeed Messiah. Such a character may be, in a degree, sincere, because it is surely possible for an extremely self-conceited individual to persuade himself that he is in some special sense a messenger of Heaven, but, as in the case of the central figure in Zangwill's instructive tale, such bombastic personages flare up like the proverbial rocket and soon die down like the proverbial stick. In the Kabbalah we find the source of Zangwill's most dramatic incident, which refers to the fanatic claimant to Messiaship pronouncing the most glorious and awful Name without producing any result whatever, though it is made to appear that his pronunciation of the awe-inspiring Tetragrammaton was technically correct. The Zohar fully confirms the prediction made in many sections of Kabbalistic literature that through human transgression heaven and earth have been in some way separated, and that whenever Messiah appears on earth and speaks the unifying word the breach will be completely healed and God and Man will be in perfect unity. Messiah is said to be now dwelling in a spiritual Eden from which he is expected to come forth into outer manifestation and establish a corresponding terrestrial Eden. There is now a secret place called poetically "The Bird's Nest" where Messiah dwells, awaiting his manifestation in the external world. This symbol of the bird suggests the sacred Dove mentioned in Genesis and which throughout Christendom is accepted as a lawful emblem of the Holy Spirit (in Hebrew, Ruach ha Kodesh). Though the doctrine of vicarious suffering, as commonly understood by orthodox Christians, is foreign to the spirit of Judaism and totally at variance with the plain teaching of many of the greater prophets, notably Ezekiel, there is a sense in which the Kabbalah appears to teach that Messiah is the sin-bearer on behalf of Israel in particular, and finally of all humanity; but there is a secret doctrine, now becoming considerably open, in which we may interpret this idea much more helpfully. In avowedly esoteric circles the inner doctrine concerning atonement and forgiveness is very clearly explained, and the time has now fully come when these deeper meanings must be given to the world. Let us dismiss from our minds completely all ideas of imputation and substitution in the old sense and contemplate the going forth of a tide of healing virtue perpetually from a Messiah who is altogether virtuous. That is exactly the idea conveyed in the Christian Gospels when read in their original simplicity. Virtue is said to stream forth from a sacred Person and enter into all his wearing apparel, and then flow forth to many sick and suffering sorrowers who approached him with conviction that they would be healed. We have only to turn the now prevailing doctrine of infection and contagion into a health-ward channel to comprehend at a glance the original concept, which is indeed sublime. As much reliable medical testimony is to the effect that diseases are communicable, though not always communicated, so is there testimony of a higher sort to the effect that health in the fullest meaning of that wide-embracing term is communicable and frequently communicated. This knowledge so far antedates the commencement of the Christian era that every student of much earlier records than any portion of the New Testament, finds overwhelming evidence to the happy prevalence of confidence in spiritual and other healing ministries in ancient Israel and among the classic Greeks and many other distinguished peoples.

Messiah is regarded as Healer par excellence, and his ministry is to incline the hearts and minds of multitudes to righteousness in every conceivable direction. Many modern plays which readily have achieved extensive popularity embody much of the Messianic spirit, notably such truly elevating dramas as Kennedy's "The Servant in the House" and Jerome's "The Passing of the 3rd Floor Back." Either of those stories will give any thoughtful reader of the book or witnesser of the play an excellent outline idea of how Messiah is to do his work when he appears, according to the best traditions.

We are beginning to return to an ancient holy conception of the inseparable connection between inward holiness and outward health, and though we must all confess that many intentionally upright persons are suffering from grievous ailments, modern thought is rightly attributing these maladies to an undue submissiveness to wrongs in the present social disorder which can and must be rectified. If sensitive yielding persons are frequently the victims of unholy contagion, those same persons can surely be liberated from present afflictions by the advent of a holy health-giving effluence which will prove antidotal to all inclement influences. Messiah is only the Leader-in-chief of a noble numerous army of coworkers who will all pull together to establish and maintain the rule of health and righteousness on earth, and we cannot have the former without the latter or the latter apart from the former except spasmodically, and then but temporarily and in illusory appearance only. The Kabbalah foretells every possible blessing as on its way to the whole human race through the coming of Messiah, who is the representative of a spiritual Israel. The Zohar declares that God created humanity for the express purpose of manifesting the Lesser Countenance, a term which when translated into our immediate vernacular, means definitely a Divine revelation in the form of a regenerated Humanity.

This Lesser Countenance is the Son of God, not one individual alone, entirely unique and therefore everlastingly different from all other members of the human solidarity, but an Elder Brother, a Holy Firstfruits, whose triumphal resurrection, ascension and glorification in the mystical sense, is typical and representative of the ultimate glorification of the entire human family. Broader and narrower views of Messiaship are not necessarily conflicting, and in these days of unwearying conflict in the realm of thought it is surely useful to seek a common denominator, so that all who are striving to increase fraternal love and true comradeship among individuals and nations may intelligently co-operate as far as possible. The clannishness and arrogance, which mar the letter of nearly all theologies, need to be broken through and swept away so that the interior truth long concealed behind these obscuring and separating veils may shed its benign radiance over the weary waiting world. More and more is it becoming evident that we are close upon the dawn of a new age, unless destruction is to overtake our planet.

Though the Kabbalah is by no means the only prophet of the rising dawn, it is a stalwart optimistic witness whose testimony is well worth considering as that of a powerful voice calling especially to Israel, and ultimately to the whole world through Israel, to work righteousness and trust in the power thereof, and thus prepare the way for the Messianic Age of universal concord and efficient happy industry. — Amen.

CHAPTER XII.

KABBALISTIC TEACHINGS CONCERNING THE SOUL, ITS NATURE AND ITS DESTINY.

Now that so much controversy is centering around the idea of the soul, its origin, nature and destiny, and the most widely divergent views on many points are being put forward as parts of a present-day revelation, it may be a matter of historic interest, at least to many readers, to gain some outline view of how Kabbalists have taught and philosophized on this vast and always fascinating subject. A. E. Waite, who treats every topic with extreme exhaustiveness of detail, has devoted several chapters to this gigantic theme to which we can only give a few pages, but in the following condensed summary we think it will not be difficult to find several salient points stated intelligibly.

The doctrine of spiritual pre-existence is taught by all Kabbalists, but on the question of re-incarnation, and of the resurrection of the body, there is considerable divergence of thought and expression. The Zohar distinctly mentions the many mansions or abiding places in the Father's House as they are alluded to in the 14th chapter of the 4th gospel. The exact wording of that familiar portion of the New Testament bears overwhelming testimony to the fact that a Master addressing disciples was reminding them of a doctrine with which they were already acquainted, otherwise how can we account for the phrase "if it were not so I would have told you"? Paradise is said to have "no other mission but to come into this world," which means that the souls constituting a society or sphere prior to incarnation must leave their blissful state of innocence and descend (not fall) into material conditions for purposes of self-conscious development. Practically all the Fathers of the early Christian Church taught pre-existence, no matter whether they had received their philosophic basis from Hebraic or Hellenic sources, for Jews and Greeks alike proclaimed this doctrine, somewhat as it is poetically and dramatically portrayed by Maurice Maeterlinck in "The Bluebird." The soul, according to Kabbalistic philosophy, has to be stripped of its paradisaical body that it may be clothed with a terrene envelope, and every soul wends it way earthward sorrowing, as though proceeding into exile; but this world is a school, a workshop, a laboratory, but in no sense a place of punishment. As the doctrine of Karma is so much to the front in these days in many places, and the object of terrestrial existence is always an undecided point, except among those who are truly illumined inwardly, it would be a great help toward clearing mental ground for subsequent discussion did we rid our phraseology straightway of all burdensome and erroneous ideas that any soul is being "punished" by incarnation; indeed it would be an immense help to clear thinking if the ugly word punishment were banished from our vocabulary, for it is excessively misleading and imports harsh notions into theology which find their correspondent expression in barbaric usages which are a disgrace to assumed civilization and productive of nothing but strife and degradation wherever they are introduced. Consequences are pleasant or unpleasant according to the nature of the cause whence effects proceed; and as this world is a school, neither a hell nor a heaven, we are all experimenters and while we cannot do any permanent injury to the "framework of the universe," which, according to James Russell Lowell, is certainly "fireproof," we can temporarily inconvenience ourselves by our mistakes, and when we pay educational and corrective penalties we are very foolish if we impugn the goodness of the Eternal and embitter our own lives by morosely regarding suffering as either useless or vindictive when it is in every case instructive in the last analysis. The Kabbalistic idea of how souls come to earth agrees remarkably well with the foundation of the doctrine of affinities which has led to much error on account of a grievous misinterpretation of the primal concept. We find in the Zohar a familiar teaching on this intricate theme if we have read anything of the ancient doctrine of counterparts which is still vigorously upheld by many authors and powerfully illustrated by Marie Corelli in her thrilling story of spiritual adventure, "The Life Everlasting." All souls awaiting incarnation are arranged in pairs; the one destined to inhabit a male body is placed by the side of one ordained to animate a female form, therefore those who find each other on earth as true counterparts have been previously united in a paradisaical state. The Kabbalistic idea of an ideal marriage is essentially sublime and it throws light upon the use of a plural Hebrew word translated "thou" in the commandment concerning the Sabbath. Every thoughtful reciter of the 10 commandments must have wondered why there is no mention made of a man's wife when the next commandment calls upon all children to equally honor their father and mother, and in the earlier instance son and daughter, man servant and maid servant are distinctively enumerated. The real answer is found only in the doctrine of complete unity in the married state, so that husband and wife are no longer twain, and neither one or the other is head of the family, the family being headed by father and mother equally. This is the only solid base on which domestic felicity can be reared, and it is the only tenable position in these gradually enlightening days in which sex equality is being fought for in many lands with courage and vigor so tremendously in earnest as to compel the attention of even the most reluctant among belated politicians.

From a Superior Eden into an Inferior Eden, says the Kabbalah, does the soul descend. Wordsworth's exquisite ode, "Immortality," voices well this ancient thought, and surely human experience abundantly confirms it.

We often hear to-day of the possibility of prolonging existence in our earthly bodies as long as we may desire, and many are the references in modern literature to Enoch and Elijah, 2 of the most mysterious of biblical characters. The Zohar mentions these as belonging to a small select company who are capable of ascending into heaven by a transmutative process without laying down their physical bodies by an act of death. The familiar Shakesperian quotation from Hamlet's soliloquy, "when we have shuffled off this mortal coil," suggests far more the idea of a voluntary act than of yielding to the scythe of a grim destroyer. In the majority of cases souls are said to have some difficulty in exercising dominion over their external shapes, and this marks the distinction between ordinary persons and the illustrious patriarchs. As a human entity embodied on earth is composed of Nephesh, Ruach and Neshamah, and neither Ruach nor Neshamah suggest sinfulness, sin is exclusively of the lower principle. This assertion throws much light on the saying, "sin is of the flesh," for while flesh itself does not commit sin, the animating principle of the flesh, or lower mind, is that which goes astray. The 3 degrees are superposed one upon the other, but ordinary men and women have not discovered Neshamah. The finding of the higher principle within is what is meant by the Gnostic phrase, "finding the Christ," the higher self of our humanity. Discovery of the soul is through the gateways of reverence and penitence. Nephesh forms the body and directs exterior procreation. Ruach causes Nephesh to act intelligently. Neshamah is the highest force in humanity and issues from the mystical Tree of Life. It is interesting to note how the Kabbalah treats the Bible characters in an altogether super-historical manner. Abraham represents the inmost soul; Sarah the secondary soul; Isaac the intellectual principle; Rebecca the vital principle. The Bible read in such a light as this is entirely above the reach of historical criticism, for its narratives are resolved into poems and parables and take on a significance vastly wider than any merely literal interpretation can logically attribute to them. Many superficial thinkers are greatly perturbed over the fact that it is now abundantly proved that no great spiritual teachings are solitary and that all Sacred Scriptures have numerous points in common. There are two hopeless positions still maintained in quarters where spiritual freedom and enlightenment have not yet dispelled the gloom of bigotry and ignorance; one untenable attitude being that some single religious system has a monopoly of truth, the other that all spiritual histories are fairy tales without foundation in solid reason. The only ground that can be taken and held invincibly against all onslaughts is a position that proves impregnable against attack because it answers more rationally and satisfactorily than any other questions continually being raised in consequence of constantly widening archæological researches and discoveries. Bibles and religious ceremonies were originally intended to set forth everlasting verities and to celebrate perpetually recurring mysteries, not to simply commemorate events fixed arbitrarily in history or to relate biographical narratives exclusively relating to certain personalities.

Kabbalism is an unfailing fount of inspiration to the student because it interferes in no way with free scientific investigation and historical research and always affords food for contemplation concerning the perpetual renewal of human experiences of divers kinds as generation follows generation, so that while pupils graduate schools remain relatively permanent for the accommodation of successive troops of scholars.

Though a triadic classification of human containment is as frequently encountered in the Kabbalah as in any other occult literature, the 7-fold classification is by no means absent therefrom, and it is as easily understood, together with the 3-fold, as it is easy to comprehend the well-known division of a single ray of white light into 3 primary colors and then into 7 prismatic hues. 4 is also greatly dwelt upon by Kabbalists and it would not be difficult to discover traces of a root-idea closely resembling the theosophical division of the human individual as expressed on earth into a higher triad and a lower quaternary.

Concerning spiritual progression here and hereafter the Zohar states that the soul of a man who has consecrated himself to a study of the Law on leaving his earthly body goes to a blissful abode by the pathways of the Law, so that his knowledge acquired on earth is of use to him hereafter, but those who have wilfully neglected to obtain knowledge go astray along roads that lead to Geburah, a state of suffering. Symbolically speaking, the Law goes before the soul which has delighted in sacred study and opens all celestial doors before it. The Law remains with the soul until the day of resurrection when it will be that soul's defender. The resurrection is open to various interpretations, and it does not appear certain that all Kabbalists have entertained precisely the same idea concerning it. From one viewpoint it appears to refer to the end of a cycle or period of time, and is therefore connected with spiritual harvesting; in that case the resurrection of the body signifies an attainment of a regenerate state, and this applies to a body of souls as we speak of a corporate organization which of necessity includes many individual units.

Concerning those who have made a diligent study of the Law it is declared that after the resurrection they retain or recover a full knowledge thereof, and this must be taken in connection with the affirmation that the Law is altogether wise and true, therefore the idea is that all truth once appropriated will be forever retained, but error will be forgotten in a day of universal illumination. A broad hint on the persistence of dominant affections is found in the declaration that those who have lovingly and industriously busied themselves with studying the Law on earth will continue to study it hereafter; and as the Law is to be applied to an adjustment of all conditions for the good of all, this legal occupation promises beneficent results if such truly celestial lawyers are to have charge of human affairs in a coming brighter era. The doctrine of 7 spheres is found in the Kabbalah, which mentions 7 celestial palaces in which a great Mystery of Faith is contained; 6 of these palaces can be investigated by human understanding, but the 7th is inaccessible to human reason as at present unfolded. When the souls of those who have lived on earth uprightly pass into the spiritual estate they enter the first palace and in it they are gradually prepared for the 2nd. and so on up the scale. The 2nd palace is ready to receive immediately they pass from earth those souls whom we call martyrs, those who have suffered valiantly in a righteous cause and have chosen thus to win a martyr's crown rather than submit to tyranny and refuse aid to their brethren struggling for emancipation. To attain this spiritual altitude they must have cultivated a thankful together with a heroic spirit and not have neglected continual aspiration. Messiah visits souls in this 2nd sphere and draws them upward into a 3rd estate. The 3rd sphere receives those who have suffered very greatly on earth through no fault of their own; the effect of their anguish having been the acceleration of their development, so that they have literally become quickly ripened through an excess of heat or pressure, as flowers and fruits can be more quickly brought to fulness of bloom and mellowed when extra heat is used to force them. The souls of young children are also found there and Messiah soon draws such into the 4th sphere which is an abode of great happiness and contains the souls of those who have "shared the sorrow of Zion," and also those who have been slain in holy warfare. The 5th palace is the place of "true penitents who have restored their souls to a state of purity, and of those who have sanctified the Name of their Master by meeting death for His glory." The 6th sphere contains those who have been filled to overflowing with divine love and have, in a special manner, proclaimed the Divine Unity. The 7th estate is like unto that Heaven of Catholic theology where the completely sanctified enjoy the Beatific Vision.

Concerning re-incarnation there seems no complete unity of sentiment, though many allusions are made to the process. It does not seem that the Kabbalah teaches in the least dogmatically that all souls now embodied on earth must return for another terrestrial journey, but it does emphasize the fact that when some specific work which can only be done on earth has not been fulfilled an opportunity is afforded for another earthward pilgrimage. Probably the great majority of Kabbalists insist that reincarnation is usually necessary, for it is only they who need no more of earthly discipline for whom it does not exist. One significant expression reads: "Seeing that he also is flesh," which is interpreted to mean still subject to the dominion of flesh, or to encasement therein, for no soul can be flesh though it can be clothed therewith. The literal meaning of many Kabbalistic sayings regarding Palestine would make spiritual gradation a question of geography, for we read many times of the high estate of souls who pass away in Palestine and the far inferior condition of all who leave the flesh elsewhere; but this use of the name of a beloved country must be understood metaphorically as referring to a spiritual Holy Land, which is an interior condition regardless of place of physical abode. Judaism always teaches that "God's people are all the righteous," and that Gentiles who live uprightly have full participation in the blessedness of the world or life to come; it therefore follows that those commentators mischievously confound letter with spirit who harp upon the geographical allusions in the Zohar. Mysterious allusions to 2 souls animating a single body at the same time can easily be disposed of in the light of spiritual overshadowing. For example, the soul of Abel is said to have animated Seth and the soul of Rachel, at her physical decease, to have animated her son Benjamin, but there is nothing in those statements properly suggestive of any other idea than that of spirit-communion of a very intimate character. Though the doctrine of a literal resurrection of physical bodies is always practically inconceivable, it being surrounded with insuperable difficulties, Kabbalists have speculated widely concerning it, but the conclusions at which they have generally arrived are too vague to be easily defined. There are 4 ideas concerning physical resurrection which are comprehensible: (1) Re-incarnation, which implies taking a new physical body. (2) The upbuilding of a new body around the permanent atom or nucleolus of a former body; a doctrine taught by many Gnostics whose views on the resurrection are by no means at variance with physical science regarding the perpetual changes being wrought in the physique from day to day, so that possibly in a single year or less (in 7 years at utmost) every particle of the physical structure has been remodeled except the permanent atom, which is always the sole potential physical body. (3) The attainment of a body which can be immortalized because of its perfectness, and therefore one which does not decay. (4) Materialization of a body by one who has learned the secret of mastery over all material elements. A passage in the Zohar reads: "If these bodies have fulfilled meritorious works they will continue, but if not they will return to dust."

Concerning Sheol (the Underworld) there are many traces of similarity to ancient Egyptian doctrines in the Kabbalah. Many things are veiled from humanity while in the flesh until transition approaches, then the mystic curtain is lifted to some extent and the soul catches glimpses of the state upon which it is about to enter; 3 messengers are said to attend a deathbed, or its equivalent, and they take account of the entire life of the one who is about to pass away. The departing spirit acknowledges the correctness of the record and signs it. In accordance with its own signature is each soul judged. Nothing can be fairer than the doctrine embodied in this statement, for it unmistakably implies identity of doctrine with the famous passage in the Apocalypse: "My reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be." Having crossed the mystic threshold the soul soon recognizes many it has known on earth. The Zohar states that at the time of death man is able to see his departed friends and to recognize them clearly. If his life has been, on the whole, worthy they salute him with great joy, but if the preponderance of his life has gravitated toward evil then he beholds those whom he formerly knew who are expiating their offences in a kind of purgatory. (Everywhere character is made the test, not belief in any doctrines.) A general thesis is that everyone while living on earth forms a definite connection with the unseen world and the nature of that connection, through the working of the undeviating law of attraction, determines state or condition in the hereafter. Though such a word as "everlasting" is sometimes used by Kabbalists concerning the duration of future suffering, it always means long-enduring simply, it being employed in a popular sense in which we call durations everlasting which are beyond our present computation. But much more frequently in the Kabbalah we read of specified periods allotted to corrective chastisement, which is often limited to 12 Kabbalistic months. Concerning hells they are said to exist chiefly for those who have committed the 3 most grievous sins, viz., murder, incest and idolatry. Fire and ice are both mentioned symbolically in connection with penal sufferings, much as we find them in Dante's Inferno. All men are to be acquitted eventually and Satan is to return to his primal Luciferean state. The Zohar advocates prayers for the departed and accounts them of avail. Such in very brief is an outline of a few of the more prominent among an enormous mass of Kabbalistic teachings.

Many a bulky volume could easily be filled with illustrative citations, but the object of this modest treatise being only to give the general reader a taste of a few Kabbalistic solids and delicacies, we refrain from going further into detail here and now, though the hundredth part has not been told. As the Kabbalah is truly a profound theosophical study—and by no means a single book or treatise written all at one time, or even by a band of collaborating authors who have collectively and successively agreed on all subjects —we are justified in taking its inculcations into account more as varied contributions to a theosophical mosaic than as sharp definitions of established doctrine couched in unalterable symbolic figures.

The very elastic nature of some of the language employed by certain Kabbalists has led some Christians to claim it as a Christian as well as a Jewish work, and there are many passages scattered here and there which are closely aligned with mystical, though not with literal dogmatic Christianity. It is, however, reasonable and moderate to consider the Kabbalah as a whole as a theosophical compilation belonging to the Jewish school, and as it is a leading tenet of acknowledged Theosophy that persons of all creeds and nationalities can be federated into a spiritual fellowship, from the often puzzling pages of the Kabbalah many a valuable sentence may be drawn which, when supplemented by citations from other sources, may serve to illustrate afresh and forcibly how true is the declaration now coming to the front in all enlightened circles, that there is a Wisdom Religion, absolutely universal, and that an acquaintance therewith, even in slight measure, will do immeasurably much to break down offensive and dangerous barriers between different sections of the human race.

Looking around us everywhere to-day we see manifested the direful results of false religious concepts, the falsity of which is clearly demonstrated by the havoc they produce. It is surely a practical question, and one of intensest moment to us all, to seek to promote mutual understanding among individuals, parties and nations, seeing that when not actually engaged in warfare we appear to be perpetually on the brink of hostile outbreaks all over the world, and that largely because we cling with bigotry and stupidity to a policy of mutual mistrust and recrimination which can produce no other effect than to endanger the peace and safety of all communities.

Children need to be instructed in the essentials of universal religion. Text books should be wisely and impartially compiled showing wherein all the Bibles of the world fundamentally agree and how we may find a common denominator. Universal religion is like universal language, it does not insist upon itself alone any more than a study of Esperanto forbids us from acquiring a knowledge of other languages and conversing in various tongues. But we cannot all learn to speak several languages fluently, consequently it is highly desirable, and rapidly becoming imperative, that we should all be able to speak and write an international language in addition to our mother tongue, whatever that may be. The symbolism of the Kabbalah is for those who understand it a sign language in which all can converse, and we know how much more nearly universal symbols can be than words, for if we draw the shape of any natural object familiar to us all by sight, though we cannot understand each others' speech we can soon learn to converse with each other freely by writing under the drawing the different words we severally employ to designate the object. Masonic symbolism holds Freemasons together all over the world, and it is a well-known fact that ritual observances serve to keep many bodies of people together who without these outward bonds would soon lose mutual sympathetic touch. The mysteries of the Kabbalah are quite unfamiliar to a large percentage of Jews, including many broad-minded and cultured sons and daughters of Israel, but there has always been a Secret Tradition in Israel, as there has been in Christendom also, and equally among professors of different Oriental cults. Never can there be uniformity of thought and practise among growing intellects, but spiritual unity there always has been and ever must be among the truly enlightened. To become uniform would destroy all natural beauty and lead to the abolition of all that is fair in art, for contrasts there must be or naught but monotony can be conceived. Let us now present in the concisest possible manner a few of the definite doctrines we have culled from our very hasty and imperfect delving into the deep mystical waters of the Kabbalah. Once more paying our respects to A. E. Waite, and acknowledging our indebtedness to his intensely scholarly work, "The Secret Doctrine in Israel," we offer this final excerpt from the chapter entitled "Conclusion on Jewish Theosophy." "It is worth while formulating its irreducible minimums as follows: (1) The Communion of the Divine Duality, Ineffable Male and Female, in the supernal world, generates human souls, male and female, in Its own likeness, who assume flesh—according to a law of succession. (2) They are intended to find one another in earthly life and to enter into marriage therein; but there are various interventions which postpone and even seem to frustrate the general design, yet it is accomplished unfailingly in the case of those who keep the Law. (3) The souls return into the spiritual world and are reunited forever therein. (4) The keeping of the Sex Law, which is part of the Secret Doctrine, ensures the procreation of those who may be called Children of the Doctrine, assuredly a peculiar people."

We have not greatly touched upon the distinctly magical elements which many students declare abound throughout all Kabbalistic writings—the Kabbalah as a whole is indeed sometimes designated an "arbatel of magic"—and the same title has been applied by magicians to several books of the Bible. That many students of magical arts have endeavored to reach magical results with the aid of the Kabbalah is beyond question, but it is a very open question among impartial delvers how far the original purpose of the Kabbalah is connected with magic. As magic is called by the most enlightened among its advocates Magnum Opus, we can readily see how High Magic may pertain to a marvellous degree of control over the elementary forces of Nature, and this dominion is only to be gained by a measure of self-culture and self-control on the part of the magician very far beyond the ordinary. White Magic is altogether commendable, for it signifies the exercise of unusual powers with benevolent intent and for the accomplishment of beneficent ends. Black magic is rightly condemned wholesale, because it means a perversion of powers with malevolent design for the fulfilment of maleficent results. As all faculties are good in themselves and all can and should be consecrated to holy services and utilized for worthy ends, it properly becomes all religious and ethical teachers to discriminate at all times and in all circumstances not so much between outward words and actions as between the motives which prompt the utterance of words and the performance of actions. More and more is the world coming to realize the stupendous force inherent in unspoken desire. Mental speech is often far more effective to accomplish far-reaching results than the most powerful bursts of outward oratory, and as we come increasingly to realize that our thoughts and aspirations are immeasurably more potent than any of our exterior performances, we shall grow to attach something like the importance the theme deserves to a consideration of the lives we live in secret.

Reputations may be bought and sold in an earthly market-place, but character (which is interior) alone regulates our association with unseen forces and entities.

Those whose aspirations are pure and whose thoughts are noble have nothing to fear from unseen influences, unless they weakly yield submission to fears that paralyze the intellect and throw the mind open to all manner of miscellaneous influx.

No matter to what race or society we may belong, if we are true to the inner light as far as we perceive it, and wish well to all our neighbors, we are on the high road to health, joy, peace and prosperity in the fullest and deepest meanings of those vastly comprehensive words.

PREFACE.

THIS little work has been prepared in great haste, amid a multitude of pressing duties. A selection has been made not quite at random from an immense mass of manuscript which has been steadily accumulating for more than a year under the reporter's hands. As the best reporters are not usually quite accurate and as extemporaneous speeches, even though delivered under inspiration, often contain some sentences which have too local, immediate and personal a bearing to render them valuable for permanent preservation, it has been found necessary to review the whole of the matter at first selected for this book with the utmost care, so as to eliminate as far as possible the less important and include the more important material. With a view to covering as much ground as possible in the fewest number of words, large portions of some lectures have been entirely omitted, and parts of others have been introduced wherever consecutiveness of ideas would permit. In a few instances a lecture appears almost word for word as it was delivered, but for reasons already stated, about twenty lectures have been employed in the formation of the twelve here presented. The publisher cannot hope to have succeeded to any great extent in making a very valuable book for study and reference, still without in any degree overestimating the value of its contents, it is only true to declare that the essential sum and substance of the teachings given in the classes will be found in the following pages. Those whose minds are fertile as well as receptive, those to whom one idea suggests another and who have the gift of tracing conclusions to their sources, and following thought further than its outward dress can convey it, will doubtless be able to successfully treat themselves and others, if they carefully read and meditate upon the contents of this volume, as a perfect system of treatment is definitely outlined in its pages. The main object of the work is, however, to stimulate inquiry, awaken earnest thought, and remove prejudice and misconception. To the liberal, fair-minded and aspiring elements in the world's population, this little work is earnestly and lovingly dedicated and addressed. The prayer of the publisher is, that it may stimulate in some degree the noblest aspirations of men, women and children, to help each other and assist in some slight measure in turning the thoughts of old and young alike from the perishable unrealities of sense to the true realities of spirit. As the author is not a dogmatist, claims no right, and has no wish to force others to his conclusions, the hope is not expressed that his words shall be regarded as a criterion for the efforts of others.

The reader's sincere friend,

W. J. Colville.

PERSONAL SKETCH

W. J. COLVILLE'S LIFE AND LABOR.

COMPILED FROM A NARRATIVE BY CHARLES BLACKIE MONCRIEFF.

W. J. COLVILLE, whose name has long been a household word on two continents, was born on the ocean between Europe and America, in the early morning of the 5th of September, 1859. His father was an Italian, his mother a Frenchwoman, connected with one of the oldest and most influential families of France. Her maiden name was Marie Lavinia De Mordaunt. Though born of parents of foreign race, his early life being spent almost entirely in England, W. J. Colville bears no very conspicuous trace of his descent, though on close acquaintance with him, no one can fail to detect traces of his origin, not so much in manner or accent as in character and disposition. In personal appearance, W. J. Colville is not singular, he is of average height, well framed but rather slightly built, with fair hair, blue eyes and a clear fresh complexion, though not apparently of a robust constitution. His temperament is wiry and elastic in the extreme; he enjoys excellent health and has amazing powers of endurance. His early life was comparatively uneventful-ful; his mother passed to spirit life when he was an infant, his father, when he was only eight years of age. His childhood was spent chiefly in London and in Brighton, England, among persons of decidedly slender intellectual attainments and members of the Anglican State Church. From them he received no bias whatever toward spiritualism or any progressive school of thought, but, without apparently any assistance from visible surroundings, his innate mediumistic powers showed themselves in a most remarkable manner when he was only five years old. At that tender age he used to see and converse with his mother, whom he could not have remembered physically, as she passed to spirit life when he was only a few weeks old, at most. Not understanding anything of spirit communion, and a beautiful lady appearing to him who told him she was his mother, looking perfectly natural to his vision, he believed the story of her death and burial to be a false report and imagined her to be yet living on earth. Not quite understanding how she came and left the house without observation, he spoke to his guardian about the matter, who being both an incredulous and superstitious woman, denied the possibility of the vision with one breath and expressed genuine fear with the next, for the child described his mother so perfectly that no one who had ever seen her could doubt that the picture was taken from life or some mysterious experience with the departed. These visions came and went for about a year and were then discontinued for no apparent reason and with no apparent cause. During the interval between five and fifteen years of age, W. J. Colville was sent to school very irregularly, and received in a preparatory academy a rudimentary training in what are universally considered the necessary branches of education. Though possessed of much natural quickness of perception he was not a very apt scholar, as the routine of the schoolroom and the presence of a number of children exerted a deterrent influence on his intellectual development; moreover, during those years he was not in the best of health and was frequently kept away from school for various reasons. Spiritualism was first brought to his notice May 24th, 1874, by a placard announcing that Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond (then Mrs. Tappan) would deliver an oration and poem under the influence of her spirit guides. He was attracted to the hall out of curiosity simply, but while there became so vividly conscious of a spiritual influence working upon himself as well as upon the speaker, and coupled therewith, an intense desire to become an inspired lecturer and poet himself, that immediately on his return home after the meeting, he was influenced to recite poetry on topics suggested by persons gathered round the supper table, during which recitation he felt himself lifted out of his body into the air, though his physical frame remained so stationary that his feet seemed almost as though they were glued to the floor. From that day till the autumn of 1876 he exercised his mediumship in private, creating much interest in the highest circles of society, for it was a truly amazing thing for an almost uneducated boy of sixteen to discourse off-hand on the profoundest themes presented to him by critical and specially invited audiences; no matter what the subject might be, he handled it fearlessly and eloquently, and displayed such amazing knowledge on rare and intricate topics as to call forth the admiring wonder of all assembled. In February, 1877, he was introduced to the publisher of the Medium and Daybreak, James Burns, of 15 Southampton Row, Holburn. Mr. Burns called a meeting in the lecture room at the above address and published an account of it in the next issue of his paper, and also engaged W. J. Colville to deliver public addresses in a large hall on Sunday evenings, which addresses called together large and deeply interested audiences, and being published sufficed to create so much interest in the youthful speaker that letters came from all parts of England making him offers to occupy the platform in almost every center where enterprising spiritualists were to be found. His career in England for a year and a half was a phenomenal success. Wherever he went he won laurels even from the opposition, and it was with many sad farewells and prayers for his speedy return that his many friends in England saw him depart for America in October, 1878. Landing in Boston October 31, he was met by representatives of the society of spiritualists assembling in Parker Memorial Hall, and was by them informed that his reputation had preceded him so as to win for him an engagement in that splendid edifice for four Sunday afternoons. His first public appearance in America was in that hall, on the 1st of November, 1878, before an immense audience. From the moment he opened his lips his success was assured. The Banner of Light published glowing accounts of the proceedings and gave lengthy reports of his lectures from week to week. Engagements poured in from all parts of the country, and though Boston has been his headquarters ever since, and he has in that city a large constituency of regular listeners, who are unwilling to spare him for a single Sunday, except during the summer vacation, he has traveled very extensively over this continent, speaking many times in nearly all the large cities and in many of the smaller cities, towns, and villages throughout the east and west. He has twice revisited England during the past few years, and has also paid several visits to Paris. Wherever he goes he draws the most thoughtful and enlightened elements in the communities, never failing to arouse and sustain the deepest interest in the work he is so ably inspired to carry forward.

Perhaps the most noticeable of all his triumphs was his reception in California, last summer. The Golden Gate, published in San Francisco, and the Carrier Dove, published in Oakland, paid him the highest of high compliments, while the San Francisco Chronicle and other leading daily papers gave long and complimentary notices of himself and his work. One of the most astonishing features connected with his speaking is his utter insensibility to fatigue in the discharge of his arduous and multiple duties. While in California he frequently spoke thirteen times a week and grew strong upon it. It is almost impossible for any person attending a very few of his lectures to form a just idea of his style and manner on the platform. He has no fixed style, but vividly portrays the individuality of the inspiring influence at the time. On some occasions he remains almost motionless, at another time he speaks with great fire and energy and indulges in rapid and intrepid movements on the stage. Sometimes his accent is the purest English, at other times it is decidedly French or German. From this cause alone have arisen the most divergent accounts of his appearance and manner while speaking, all of which were founded on some particle of fact. It is this amazing versatility in style and the almost unlimited range of subjects with which he deals, that causes those who know him best to compare him to an inexhaustible fountain of ideas and language. To question the fact of inspiration in his case is to present to the world an unsolved problem, for the solution of which no known rule exists, or at least none can be found. His prominence as a teacher of metaphysical healing leads us to enquire how he became so able and influential an exponent of Mental and Spiritual science as applied to health. The facts are very simple and easily told. When a child his constitution was delicate, and he was often in the doctor's hands, but never under any circumstances can he remember deriving the slightest benefit from any material remedy. Whenever notice was taken of his ailments he grew rapidly worse, but when left to himself an influence would come to him and restore him, but he must be left entirely by himself, unmolested by the thoughts as well as the bodily presence of others, to reap the full advantage of the subtle ministrations of this unseen power. Sometimes a strange person would heal him without knowing it; and often he would be led to certain places and people by an instinct similar to that which leads a cat to search for catnip when feeling indisposed. When about sixteen years of age, he became closely connected with a young gentleman who had studied Theosophy and whose natural healing gifts were truly marvelous, and at that time he gained a pretty thorough initiation into various occult systems of medicine. Noting, however, that mesmerism is a dangerous power, his mind reverted to what is now called Metaphysical healing, and though he does not accept all the theories of the Christian Scientists, and positively opposes Mrs. Eddy's views on spiritualism, as set forth in her remarkable work, Science and Health, he found so much in the metaphysical theory in harmony with his own intuitive knowledge and actual experience, that yielding to the earnest solicitation of many friends, and the strong pressure of a spiritual influence, he undertook the work of instructing classes of students in Spiritual science, giving them thorough practical information and suggestions and always on moderate and generous terms. Though fully alive to the advantages of a good social position and the wherewithal to carry on necessary work in this world, and possessed of great business ability in many directions, W. J. Colville cannot be called mercenary by any one who knows him. He never demands extortionate prices for his services, and is always ready to welcome those who cannot pay to all his meetings without money and without price. In private life he is many-sided. He has great conversational powers, and can make himself very agreeable, but frequently he does not try to entertain. This may be largely accounted for by an instant's consideration of his manifold public and other duties. His sphere is public life and literary labor, and he really has little if any time for social gossip. Notwithstanding this feature of his character, few people have more warm personal friends than he, and as he enjoys the society of cheerful persons of both sexes and all ages, goes to places of amusement whenever he has time and opportunity, he cannot be said to be anything of a recluse. In appearance and manner he is decidedly French, and has all the quickness and vivacity of that nation. As a writer he is fully as effective as a speaker, and writes as rapidly as he can talk, ideas pouring in faster than a pencil can write them. The above may be taken as a very meagre pen picture of one of the most remarkable public speakers of the age, one who has doubtless a great future before him, for though he has been before the public a considerable number of years, and has won a world wide reputation, he is still in the bouyancy of youth, and looks so juvenile on the platform that many persons find it difficult to believe he is as old as the years since his birth have made him. His greatest virtue in the eyes of many is the whole-souled interest he takes in the work of others, and his utter absence of jealousy or rivalrous ambition, but then, those who stand at the head in any line of effort, have small incentives to envy their brothers or sisters.

LECTURE I.

MIND CURE: ITS FACTS AND FALLACIES. INCLUDING A FRIENDLY REVIEW OF A LECTURE BY DR. STEBBINS, PASTOR OF FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH, SAN FRANCISCO, UPON THE SUBJECT. DELIVERED IN ASSEMBLY HALL, SAN FRANCISCO, SUNDAY, SEPT. 26, 1886, BEFORE AN IMMENSE AUDIENCE OF REPRESENTATIVE CITIZENS.

THE very title of our lecture should be sufficient to prove to all strangers who may be here that we do not endorse all the vagaries of the Mind Cure system, and that we do not stand pledged to declare that Mind Cure, as it has been ordinarily interpreted and expounded, is the universal panacea, or that all the ills to which human nature is or can be subject can be disposed of by a few simple applications of what Dr. Evans has called mental medicine. Mind Cure always appears to us a very inadequate expression. We use the term Spiritual Science, as being far more expressive, or even Mental Science, if you like the word "mental" better than "spiritual," though it positively expresses less. The word "mental" literally signifies intellectual, while the word "spiritual" goes deeper into the soul of man, and treats upon the purely moral and affectional qualities of the spirit: the word "mental" being confined to what you may term the mind or intellect, signifies something different from what we term the spirit, which expresses the moral intuition rather than the intellectual elements in human life. Spiritual Science relates to the whole of life and will: to narrow it down to Mental Science is to lower it, as Spiritual Science is a much ampler term, while Mental Science is much more than simply Mind Cure. Mind Cure gives a great many people the idea that you undertake to cure insanity and nothing else; and while it is true in a certain sense that all diseased people are insane — because sanity is health and insanity is the absence or reverse of health — and while those who heal by mental methods ought to make a specialty of healing those whose disorders are avowedly mental, and whose ailments have baffled the skill of physicians and shown themselves invulnerable to all the attacks made upon them by Materia Medica, at the same time it appears to us that Mind Cure suggests the idea that there is no science about it and that there are no scientific qualifications for healing required on the part of those who pose before the world as mental healers. Now, nothing can be farther from the truth; for if true Mental and Spiritual Science is to take the place of the old medical systems, if instead of a Materia Medica we are to have spiritual remedies, those who are to be the successors of the old-school physicians will not be ignorant and unenlightened people, who, by some peculiar form of incantation, can perform wonders, but rather do we need the most learned men and women, the wisest, the most level-headed, the most generous, pure-minded and spiritually-unfolded, to embark in the great enterprise of the physical, mental and moral redemption of humanity.

There are some people who suppose what is popularly termed Mind Cure is something that anybody and everybody can learn in a few lessons; and while a medical student has to go to college and study for years and pass difficult examinations before the faculty will award him a diploma, it is supposed by many that any ignorant person, any charlatan or imposter, can pose successfully in the role of a mental healer, and that those indeed who are genuine healers, so far as there can be any mental healing at all, are illiterate persons, the popular impression being that illiteracy is no disqualification for mental healing.

Now we do not for a moment deny that an illiterate person, a person who has never passed through college, or a person who has never had what may be called a good liberal education, if well disposed, generous, kind-hearted, sympathetic, and spiritually-minded, can do a very large amount of good. But such a person is highly cultured in the spiritual faculties. A person who is highly moral, very generous, sympathetic, and in love with humanity, one who will work at any sacrifice to himself for the good of the world, is one who has an education or an unfoldment far beyond any education that can be gained by merely attending school or college. There are many learned men with their degrees and diplomas who are lacking altogether in the finer sensibilities of human nature. There are many doctors who go forth from the colleges full of nothing but pride and conceit. They have, it is true, a smattering of medical information, but are anything but moral and anything but spiritual, and are the very people whom you would not like to introduce into the bosom of your families if you really knew them. There are many people everywhere who have been highly educated, who have graduated with honors from the most renowned universities in the world, who instead of being spiritually-minded, are carnally-minded to a remarkable degree; and as it requires a spiritual person, one who is noble-minded, one who has something to commend him to humanity far in advance of outward attainments, to touch the deepest springs of human nature, we should decide that even an illiterate pauper might be in a very true sense educated or unfolded far more than a literary man who was lacking in all that is finest and noblest in human development. Therefore do not understand us to say that an illiterate person cannot be a successful healer. But while many illiterate persons are successful healers, those illiterate people are people who have a great deal of character, a great deal in them which is truly admirable on account of their unusual moral and spiritual qualifications; and this spiritual education, which raises one above the literati of wordly renown, must be regarded in an especial sense as a revelation of God to the world.

But leaving this matter of literacy and illiteracy, in the scholastic sense, and proceeding to the question of what the necessary qualifications really are for a good moral or spiritual scientist, we should say that no education can be too rich and varied, no knowledge can be too profound, no intellectual culture and no experience can be too great to duly qualify one to enter into what may be termed the metaphysical profession. We consider it a very great mistake when people suppose that in the far East and in Palestine, in the days of Buddha and of Jesus, that the greatest healers and teachers of the period were unlearned people. It is true they may have gained their knowledge intuitively rather than through collegiate courses; it is true they may have been enlightened by a purely spiritual development of their intellectual understanding, and may have had, therefore, an illumination rather than an external education, but it is emphatically stated in the New Testament that it was a great surprise to all the people round about that Jesus was eminently literary. They inquired, "Whence hath this man letters, seeing he has never learned?" What does it mean to have letters, but to be well up in all literary matters, to be an authority on literary subjects, to display literary, even scientific knowledge?

You are told that when Jesus was twelve years of age, he entered into the temple and disputed with learned doctors of the law who constituted the Sanhedrim, the very highest council in Israel, and made an impression of the profoundest nature by answering the wise men's questions, and also asking them questions in return. Their wonder and astonishment was that his erudition was so perfect, his knowledge so profound. You are told plainly in the records that Jesus, that great and wonderful man, who, between thirty and thirty-three years of age, performed those wonderful cures that defied duplication by his contemporaries, though he had possibly never studied in the colleges of the world, was nevertheless highly educated. He had gained his education somewhere and somehow, for it was the surprise of the learned men of the day that he knew so much; the marvel of the people at large was that he was so literary, being only the son of a village carpenter.

We are told in Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia," that when Gautama Buddha, who afterwards became the Savior of Asia, was brought before the most learned men in his father's kingdom, though only eight years old, he knew more of science, of mathematics, of history, more of the deepest subjects which the learned were wont to discourse upon, than his preceptors; the sign and seal, the credential of his divine mission was, that he knew more than any one else in the kingdom. No premium whatever has been placed upon ignorance in the Jewish or Christian Bible, nor in the great records of the far Orient; but on the other hand, those who have been called and have shown themselves able to respond to the call to teach and to heal have either through ordinary avenues of instruction received information of a literary and scientific kind, or in some mysterious manner, commonly styled marvelous or miraculous, through the opening of their spiritual understanding, have come to a knowledge of the truth in all its ramifications and applications. Therefore we maintain in this age that we do not endorse a company of ignoramuses who pose in the role of teachers and healers; we do not desire that superstition and quackery should prevail over reason and common sense. We do not endorse those movements that decry learning and extol ignorance, but on the other hand we declare that in the future, when the world becomes more spiritualized its universities will teach far more than they teach now, professors will know vastly more than they know now, the successors of the modern clergymen and doctors will be far more learned men than any who have yet occupied pulpits or adorned the medical profession; and as the word doctor really means a teacher (it is simply a Latin word meaning a teacher), the original intention was that the doctor should educate his patients instead of treating them in some mysterious manner with minerals and drugs. The very fact that doctors of medicine were spoken of, as well as doctors of divinity, proves that the word doctor was intended to convey the idea that patients were to get well through their own understanding of truth, by their acquaintance with the laws of being, not by continual dosing and experimentation.

If, therefore, the true position of the modern doctor is understood, and any man or woman is entitled to write M.D. after his or her name, they should be teachers of medicine — not administerers of drugs, but teachers of the people in the science of health. We are told of an Oriental monarch who kept continually by his side a celebrated physician whose work it was always to keep the king in health, and who would be decapitated if the king fell ill, but had large revenues as long as the king remained in good health. While the penalty of decapitation we should not advise for infliction upon the doctor who allowed his patient to become ill, we can see far more reason why a doctor should be paid for keeping persons well than permitted to run up long bills, the longer the illness lasts, the longer and the more the patient suffers, the longer time it takes the remedies to work. Doctors nowadays are very frequently paid for killing patients, or, at all events, for not prolonging their lives or even ministering to their comfort. Among the funeral expenses the doctor's bill is generally a very large item, and many a poor widow left with children dependent upon her, unless she has to do with a very benevolent physician, has found it very hard work to satisfy the claims of the doctor and the undertaker, who are usually very closely allied in their business — so closely that an outsider might almost suppose they were partners. The doctor's bill and the undertaker's bill are often sent in together; and as the doctors of all countries have grown rich upon the ailments of the public, as they have grown rich by keeping people always in their hands, as the family physician has been often only the family doser, the family experimentalist upon the lives of its members, a panderer to the family hysteria, there can be no doubt whatever that in the light of modern civilization, which educates every boy and girl in the country, that professors of the science of health, teachers of the science of being, those who might well be called Ontologists, will soon take the place of the Physicians and Druggists of past days. Wherever civilization spreads the druggists begin to make their living out of Soda Water rather than drugs. Many Apothecaries have already learned that in a healthy and intelligent population they must depend very largely upon their soda water fountain for their revenue, and there are many of the best druggists in the country who make much of their profit upon the fancy articles they sell, such as toothbrushes, soap, sponges and other things people continually need, and which metaphysics has not attempted to do away with. Wherever persons become enlightened they take less and less medicine. One of the most influential and learned men in America and a great ornament to the medical profession, Oliver Wendell Holmes, made a statement almost equivalent to the following: That if all medicines had been thrown into the sea it might be good for man but bad for the poor fishes. There are a great many doctors who by diligent study have come to the conclusion, and have openly made the statement, that the less medicine taken the better. Such doctors are of course in no sense quacks or impostors. Those honorable and scientific gentlemen who adorn their profession are those who instruct their patients how to keep well a great deal more than they advocate dosing or taking medicine. If you take a really learned doctor's advice it will often prove well worth a great many times his fee. If you observe those rational laws which the doctor lays down for you concerning diet, exercise, fresh air and proper moral conduct, it may have been a very good thing for yourself and your family that you called in an intelligent, scientific man when you or any one else felt indisposed. If a doctor is really qualified, if he is what the term "doctor" implies, he is a teacher of health and a teacher of morals; such a doctor, though he be ever so wealthy, though the revenue he draw from his profession be ever so great, must be numbered among the instructors of the rising generation and the benefactors of the less well informed.

We therefore utter no words of contempt or abuse when we speak of wise and noble men who abound, we are happy to say, in the various schools of medical practice, in all of which we have found the most intelligent and liberal-minded persons of our acquaintance. But those fussy and superstitious doctors who are always dosing their patients are a nuisance to society, and even though they have a diploma they are the greatest quacks of all.

We affirm that Mind Cure in and of itself means simply that the mind must cure whatever is wrong both in mind and in body, and that the universal specific is mental and not physical. "Who shall minister to a mind diseased?" is the question continually asked by sufferers. How long will physicians continue to treat ailments which are purely mental as though they were bodily? is a question that comes up in all our popular literature. We need greater sagacity and a much wider sweep of intelligence to reach the mind than merely to reach the body; the endeavor to tinker up the flesh while the mind is ill at ease is of no use whatever. The endeavor to cure people of dyspepsia when it is not their food that disagrees with their stomach, which is not out of order except as an after consequence, for their ailment proceeds from mental unrest, from grief, disappointment and unhappiness, from something that weighs upon the mind, a heavy load upon the heart, a sting of conscience rebuking them for an error, is all in vain when you rely on pills, powders and balsam. If you could get at the reason why people suffer from dyspepsia, if you could get at the reason why good food makes them sick, or remains undigested, if you could get at the reason why they are unhappy and unable to obtain relief, you would then be able by dealing with and removing the cause of the unhappiness to heal them. If you could not remove the thorn from the mind, which afterwards produced the semblance of a thorn rankling in the flesh, you would at least be able to do what a spiritual teacher was able to accomplish in his own case — help them to receive from heaven grace sufficient to bear it.

If you could reach the innermost springs of human nature, find out why people are miserable and touch their mental and their moral condition, it would be surprising to see how many wasting lungs would cease to waste, how many pallid cheeks would begin to glow again with the bloom of health, how many dull, sad eyes would be lighted with the fires of youth, happiness and peace, how many poor, miserable dyspeptics would enjoy their food, and find that anything that was fit for man's consumption agreed with them.

If we can touch the springs of action, and go directly to the sources of trouble and annoyance, by reaching the realm of causation instead of forever dealing with effects, we are able to change the condition of a person because we change the source whence that condition flows.

Mind Cure, even in its humblest forms, even in its seemingly unscientific application, has, without doubt, produced results far beyond any that could be produced by any form of drug medication or mineral administration. Not only is this fact claimed for Mind Cure by those who are its acknowledged advocates and defenders, but in Dr. Stebbins' recent lecture be made no attempt to deny it, while a recent writer in one of the popular magazines, Dr. Buckley (in The Century, June, 1886), who is a Christian minister, declared that cures which were performed either by faith, by prayer, by spiritual mediums, or through visits paid to the shrines of Romish saints, were all of them in many instances well-authenticated cases of recovery.

There is no doubt either in the scientific or religious world today that what is called Mind Cure is a great fact, and where Dr. Stebbins seems to us to have made a misstatement is, in supposing that this wave of mental healing is a mere transitory appearance, and that while it is here today it may not be here tomorrow. Dr. Stebbins and all other ministers and (to use his own language) all doctors may make up their minds that it has come to stay. It has always been in the world, but in ages of religious darkness and superstition it has been shrouded, and never until quite recently taught as a science to the world in general.
